

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

CURLES et al. v. WADE & BRIMBERRY et al. (No. 2115.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 17, 1921.)

1. Wills \S 602, 603(3)—Devise held to give fee, defeasible upon death without children.

The words in the first item of the will vested in George Grover Jones an estate in fee simple, defeasible upon his dying without a child or children. Gibson v. Hardaway, 68 Ga. 370; Daniel v. Daniel, 102 Ga. 181, 28 S. E. 167; Chewning v. Shumate, 106 Ga. 751, 32 S. E. 544; Hill v. Terrell, 123 Ga. 49, 51 S. E. 81; Kinard v. Hale, 128 Ga. 485, 57 S. E. 761; Nottingham v. McKelvey, 149 Ga. 463, 100 S. E. 371; Slappey v. Vining, 150 Ga. 792, 105 S. E. 353; and see, for general discussion of similar cases, Hertz v. Abrahams, 110 Ga. 707, 36 S. E. 409, 50 L. R. A. 361; Anderson v. United Realty Co., 79 Ohio St. 23, 86 N. E. 644, 51 L. R. A. (N. S.) 477, 494, note.

2. Wills \S 636(3)—Provision that land shall be held in trust is executed when beneficiary becomes 21.

The trust created for George Grover Jones became executed on his arriving at the age of 21 years, which, under the agreed statement of facts, he has attained. Hollis v. Lawton, 107 Ga. 102, 32 S. E. 846, 73 Am. St. Rep. 114; Phillips v. Lowther, 111 Ga. 852, 36 S. E. 596.

Wills \S 634(3)—Persons to take in case devisee died without children have no vested interest and are not entitled to enjoin waste.

Interveners had no vested interest in the property, and were not entitled to the relief sought by them.

4. Waste \S 5—One having qualified or base fee cannot be restrained.

Having held that George Grover Jones, under the will of his father, took a qualified or base fee in the land, it follows that the court did not err in refusing to interfere by injunction to restrain waste by him or by those proceeding under valid contract authority from him. Matthews v. Hudson, 81 Ga. 120, 7 S. E. 236, 12 Am. St. Rep. 305.

Error from Superior Court, Mitchell County; W. M. Harrell, Judge.

Suit by T. W. Curles and others against Wade & Brimberry and others. An injunction was refused, and plaintiffs bring error. Affirmed.

The will of James Jones, dated March 9, 1894, provided in the first item as follows:

"I give, bequeath, and devise to my son, Geo. Grover Jones, the following property, to wit: [Describing, among other things, three lots of land, which form the subject-matter of this suit.] It is my will that all the above property belong and the title vest in my son, Geo. Grover Jones immediately after my death; but if he should die without a child or children, then in that case the above-described property be divided equally among my nieces and nephews."

The fourth item provides:

"It is my will that all the land given to my son Geo. Grover Jones be held in trust for said George Grover Jones, by my brother, A. H. Jones until my son becomes thirty (30) years of age."

James Jones died in 1897. On June 17, 1915, Grover C. Jones by his guardian and D. B. Davis and A. H. Jones as executors of the will of James Jones and as testamentary guardians of Grover C. Jones, granted to Stripling & Ledbetter the right to cut and remove from the land "the pine timber suitable for sawmill purposes and for cross-tie purposes and for wood purposes and for other purposes similar thereto, growing, which measures 12 inches in diameter, two feet above the level of the ground." On December 18, 1915, a similar grant was made by the same persons to Wade & Brimberry, covering all the other timber on the property. On December 21, 1916, Grover C. Jones, D. B. Davis, and A. H. Jones as executors of the estate of James Jones, and A. H. Jones as trustee for Grover C. Jones, conveyed the land by deed to T. W. Curles. On December 11, 1916, fourteen of the nephews and nieces of James Jones joined in a deed conveying to Curles whatever interest they might have in the property. The timber grant to Stripling & Ledbetter was transferred, on June 10, 1919, to Curles. On June 26, 1919, Curles filed a petition against Wade & Brimberry, a partnership, and the individual members thereof, alleging that they had entered and begun cutting and removing the timber measuring less than 12 inches in diameter 2 feet above the level of the ground; that Grover C. Jones had no right to convey the land or timber unless and until he had a child, and upon his failure to have a child the title would vest after his death in the nephews and nieces of James Jones; that the acts of Wade & Brimberry constituted a trespass against petitioner, who is the absolute owner of the land and timber thereon; that the defendants are insolvent, and unless they are restrained by injunction from cutting and removing the timber he will suffer irreparable loss and damage; and that the damage already done amounts to $1,000. The prayers were for injunction, and for judgment for the amount of damage already done.

Upon the hearing the following facts were agreed upon: George Grover Jones was the same person as Grover C. Jones; he is living and married, but has never had any child; he was sui juris at the time of the execution of the timber leases mentioned. The plaintiff bought the land and acquired the transfer of the Stripling & Ledbetter lease after the lease to Wade & Brimberry had been recorded, and with knowledge of it. Dink, Roy, and Gus Jones, minors, intervened through their next friend, alleging that as nephews of James Jones they had an interest in the property, contingent upon George Grover Jones dying childless; and that they cannot maintain an action for waste. They prayed that the defendants be enjoined until the happening of the event which would remove the contingency, the birth of a child to George Grover Jones; and that they be permanently enjoined in the event he should die without having had a child. The court refused to grant the injunction, and the plaintiffs excepted.

E. E. Cox, of Camilla, for plaintiffs in error.

Peacock & Gardner and E. M. Davis, all of Camilla, for defendants in error.

GILBERT, J. Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

BERCKMANS v. TARNOK et al. (No. 1913.)
(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 17, 1921.)

(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

1. Corporations §560(1)—Court may vacate or modify receiver's contracts with consent of other party.

The court has power to vacate or modify any agreement or contract made by a receiver appointed to liquidate the assets of a corporation under Civ. Code 1910, § 2245, and to direct the making of another agreement with the consent of the other party to the contract.

2. Corporations §560(5)—Court held not to have abused discretion in granting extension of time to purchaser from receiver.

Where a receiver appointed under Civ. Code 1910, § 2245, to liquidate the assets of a corporation sold property under an order of the court on deferred payments secured by a mortgage, and upon maturity of the purchase-money notes the purchaser was unable to pay, the court held not to have abused his discretion in granting an extension of time, over the objection of a minority stockholder, and in refusing to order a foreclosure of the mortgage.

Error from Superior Court, Richmond County; H. C. Hammond, Judge.

Suit between E. F. Berckmans and Sigmond Tarnok and others. Judgment in favor of the adverse parties, and Berckmans brings error. Affirmed.

W. K. Miller, of Augusta, for plaintiff in error.

Cumming & Harper and Alexander & Lee, all of Augusta, for defendants in error.

GEORGE, J. Under Civil Code 1910, § 2245, a receiver was appointed for the purpose of liquidating the assets of a corporation expiring by limitation of time. The business of the corporation was that of a nurseryman and horticulturist. There came into the hands of the receiver horticultural stock growing upon lands owned by others. Some months after the appointment of a receiver, the court ordered the receiver to make a sale of the corporate property in its then condition, the sale to be made on time, and the deferred payments to be secured by a mortgage on the property sold. To this order, its terms and conditions, all persons owning stock in the corporation consented. The property was sold by the receiver and purchase-money notes taken for the deferred payments, secured by mortgage on the property sold. Upon the maturity of the purchase-money notes, the purchaser advised the receiver that he was unable to pay the same, and that he would have to surrender the possession of the property unless an extension of time was granted. The receiver applied to the court for direction; and the court, after notice to all parties at interest, and over objection of a holder of the minority of the stock in the dissolved corporation, ordered that the extension of time as requested by the purchaser be granted, and directed the receiver to prepare and present to the court a contract and mortgage carrying out the terms of the judgment. Held:

[1] 1. The court has power to vacate or modify any agreement or contract which the receiver has made, and to direct the making of another agreement, the opposite party to the contract consenting. High on Receivers (4th Ed.) § 186, and cases cited in note.

[2] 2. Under the evidence in this case the court did not abuse his discretion in granting the extension of time asked by the purchaser, and in refusing to order the receiver to foreclose the mortgage as prayed by the objecting party.

Judgment affirmed.

All the Justices concur.

(151 Ga. 145)

RICHARDS v. NEAL et al. (No. 2129.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 17, 1921.)

(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

Appeal and error \S 1005(2)—Approved verdict supported by evidence conclusive.

A judgment refusing a new trial will be affirmed when there is some evidence to support the verdict.

Error from Superior Court, Gordon County; M. C. Tarver, Judge.

Action between W. A. Richards and J. A. Neal and others. Judgment for the latter, and the former brings error. Affirmed.

A. L. Henson, of Calhoun, Maddox, McCamy & Shumate, of Dalton, and M. B. Eubanks, of Rome, for plaintiff in error.

J. G. B. Erwin, Jr., of Calhoun, for defendants in error.

BECK, P. J. There is no assignment of error upon any ruling of the court pending the trial, or upon any portion of the court's charge to the jury; and, there being some evidence to support the verdict, the judgment of the court below refusing a new trial is affirmed.

All the Justices concur.

AVERETT et al. v. BOUTWELL. (No. 2022.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 16, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Appeal and error \S 336(1)—Not dismissed because one defendant not made plaintiff in error.

The motion to dismiss the writ of error, because one of the persons named as a defendant in the petition was not made a party plaintiff in error, is without merit. Jones v. Larimore, 149 Ga. 825, 102 S. E. 526.

2. Injunction \S 34—Sale of property as part of estate not enjoined, there being adequate remedy at law.

The petitioner having an adequate remedy at law available, the grant of an interlocutory injunction against selling or interfering with the possession of the property was error.

Atkinson, J., dissenting in part.

Error from Superior Court, Crawford County; H. A. Mathews, Judge.

Suit by J. J. Boutwell by next friend, against Ed. Averett and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Reversed.

J. J. Boutwell, by next friend, brought an equitable petition against Ed. Averett, Mrs. Georgia Hamlin, Mrs. Lula Johnson, and Mrs. Lella Averett, alleging that A. V. Averett, deceased, had given to petitioner a certain mule; that the defendants, as heirs at law of A. V. Averett, were threatening to take possession of the mule, and had advertised the same for sale as a part of the estate of A. V. Averett; that petitioner was just getting ready to commence his crop, and if the mule should be taken away from him he would be unable to proceed, and his damages would be irreparable; that the defendants are insolvent; and that he has no remedy at law. He prayed that the defendants be restrained by injunction from interfering with his ownership and possession of the mule. The answer filed by Mrs. A. V. Averett, who was the mother of the plaintiff and the widow of A. V. Averett, admitted all the allegations of the petition. The answer of the other defendants denied all material allegations of the petition. The evidence introduced by plaintiff tended to support the allegations of the petition (except that the only evidence on the question of insolvency related to Ed. Averett). The evidence offered by the defendants was in contradiction of the allegations of the petition, but they did not offer any evidence on the question of their solvency. Upon the hearing the court granted an interlocutory injunction, and included in his order a requirement that "the defendant Bus Hamlin" [in whose possession the mule then was] deliver the same to Boutwell upon his making bond for the forthcoming of the mule and to answer any judgment which might be rendered for hire of the same upon final trial. Ed. Averett, Mrs. Hamlin, and Mrs. Johnson excepted, assigning error upon the judgment on the grounds that it is contrary to law and the evidence and the principles of equity, because the plaintiff has an adequate remedy at law; because the facts alleged in the petition do not entitle the plaintiff to the relief sought; because the evidence does not authorize injunction; and because the requirement as to delivery of the mule was directed to one not a party to the petition for injunction.

The defendant in error moved to dismiss the writ of error, because Mrs. Lella Averett, a party to the petition for injunction and substantially interested in the outcome of the case, had not been served with the bill of exceptions, and had not acknowledged or waived service.

Ross & Ross, of Macon, for plaintiffs in error.

Martin & Martin, of Macon, for defendant in error.

GILBERT, J. Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur, except ATKINSON, J., who dissents from the ruling in the second headnote.

LOGANVILLE BANKING CO. v. BROADNAX et al. (No. 1942.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 16, 1921.)

(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

1. Judgment \S 839—Transfer of judgment and execution need not be under seal.

Under Civ. Code 1910, §§ 4274 and 5969, authorizing the assignment of judgments and executions, a written transfer of a judgment and the execution issued thereon need not be under seal.

2. Judgment \S 850—Assignee of judgment and execution entitled to be substituted in claim case.

Under Civ. Code 1910, §§ 4274 and 5969, where plaintiff during the pendency of a claim case transferred the fi. fa. and judgment on which it was based, without recourse, the assignment passed title to the judgment and execution with all of its resulting incidents, including the right of the assignee to be made a party plaintiff and proceed with the prosecution of the case and recover damages if the claim was interposed for delay, and it was improper to order that the case proceed in the name of the original plaintiff for the use of the assignee.

3. Judgment \S 850 — Assignor of judgment cannot proceed against one interposing claim to property for delay.

Where during the pendency of a statutory claim case plaintiff transferred the fi. fa. and judgment without recourse, he could not proceed on his own account against the claimant to recover damages on the ground that the claim was interposed for delay.

Certified Question from Court of Appeals.

Suit between the Loganville Banking Company and J. C. Broadnax, trustee, and others. Judgment for the adverse party, and the Banking Company brought error to the Court of Appeals, which certified questions to the Supreme Court. Questions answered.

J. H. Felker, of Monroe, for plaintiff in error.

R. L. Cox and O. Roberts, both of Monroe, for defendants in error.

FISH, C. J. [1] A plaintiff may, bona fide and for a valuable consideration, transfer in writing a judgment and the execution issued thereon to a third person; and the transferee has the same rights as the original plaintiff had, and the transfer or assignment need not be under seal. Civil Code 1910, §§ 4274, 5969. See Thompson v. First State Bank, 102 Ga. 696, 29 S. E. 610.

[2] (a) Where a statutory claim case is pending in the superior court, and the plaintiff transfers, in writing not under seal, a fi. fa. and the judgment on which it is based, "without any recourse on us whatsoever," such assignment passes to the assignee the title to the judgment and the execution with all the resulting incidents of the assignment, which include the right of the assignee, as such, to be made a party plaintiff in the case, to proceed with its prosecution to subject the property levied on, and to recover damages from the claimant if it should appear that the claim was interposed for delay only; and it would not be proper to order that the case proceed in the name of the original plaintiff for the use of the assignee.

[3] (b) After such assignment the original plaintiff in fi. fa. could not proceed on his own account against the claimant for the purpose of recovering such damages.

The foregoing rulings are made in response to questions certified by the Court of Appeals.

All the Justices concur.

HINES, Director General of Railroads, v. McWHIRTER. (No. 11210.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1. Jan. 27, 1921.)

(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

1. Carriers \S 408(4)—Evidence sufficient to support verdict for loss of trunk by passenger.

In an action by a passenger, for loss of her trunk, evidence held sufficient to support verdict for plaintiff.

2. Trial \S 253(3)—Instruction not erroneous as depriving Director General of defense when sued for loss of trunk.

In an action against the federal Director General of Railroads, operating the A. road, for loss of a trunk in the custody of a terminal company acting as agent for such A. road, and for another, the B. road, instruction held not erroneous as depriving defendant of the defense that the trunk was lost by the terminal company as agent for the B. and not as agent for the A. road.

3. Carriers \S 408(7)—Instruction held not erroneous as requiring defendant carrier to satisfy jury he never received trunk.

In an action against the federal Director General of Railroads operating the A. road for loss of a trunk while in possession of a terminal company acting as agent for the A. road and another, the B. road, instruction that if defendant operating the A. road had satisfied the jury's minds the trunk was never delivered to him, then plaintiff would not be entitled to recover any sum whatever, held not erroneous as requiring defendant to satisfy the jury that he, as operator of the A. road, never received the trunk, etc.

4. Carriers \Rightarrow 408(7)—Instruction not erroneous as imposing unduly high burden of proof on defendant, sued for loss of trunk.

In an action against the federal Director General of Railroads operating the A. road, for loss of a trunk by a terminal company, agent for the A. road and also for the B. road, instruction that plaintiff's presentment of a baggage check given her by defendant operating the A. road makes out a prima facie case for her, the burden shifting to defendant, held not erroneous as imposing on defendant, for lack of statement that he must show by the "preponderance" of the evidence that the trunk was never delivered to him, a higher burden of proof than imposed by law.

Error from Superior Court, Madison County; W. L. Hodges, Judge.

Action by Ruby McWhirter against Walker D. Hines, Director General of Railroads. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Judgment affirmed.

The court charged the jury:

"I charge you that if the trunk in question was lost or destroyed while in the possession of the Atlanta Terminal Company, and that said Atlanta Terminal Company was acting at the time of such loss or destruction of such trunk as agent for the defendant Seaboard Air-Line Railroad Company in handling of passengers and baggage, then I charge you that the plaintiff should recover in this case the value of such property lost or destroyed, and that you should so find by your verdict."

Defendant claimed such charge was error because it was admitted by defendant that the Atlanta Terminal Company was the agent of the Seaboard Air-Line Railroad Company at the former's terminal station in Atlanta, in the handling of passengers and baggage, but defendant contended that the terminal company was also the agent of the Southern Railroad Company at the same station in the handling of passengers and baggage, that the trunk never came into the possession of the Atlanta Terminal Company as agent for the Air-Line Railroad Company, and that the latter's baggage check was never placed on the trunk, but that it was lost by the terminal company as the agent for the Southern Railroad Company while the latter's check was still on it, so that the Air-Line Railroad Company never received the trunk and defendant was not liable for its loss, defendant's claim being that the charge deprived him of such defense, and was an instruction to find for plaintiff if the jury should find that the terminal company was agent for the Air-Line Railroad Company at the time the trunk was lost, irrespective of whether it then held the particular trunk as agent for the Air-Line Railroad Company or as agent for the Southern Railroad Company.

The court also charged the jury:

"On the other hand, if the defendant company has satisfied your mind that the trunk, was never delivered to it, then the plaintiff in this case would not be entitled to recover any sum whatever"

—defendant claiming such charge was error, as requiring him to satisfy the minds of the jury that he never received the trunk without charging that defendant should show by preponderance of the evidence that he never received the trunk.

The court also charged:

"As stated above, when the plaintiff presents a baggage check given to her by the defendant company, then that makes out a prima facie case, and she would be entitled to recover of the defendant company if there is no other evidence introduced. The burden is then shifted to the defendant to show that the baggage was never delivered to it, or that it never lost or destroyed it."

The defendant claimed such charge was erroneous, as placing on him the burden to show the trunk was never delivered to him as operator of the particular road, without charging that he must show by the preponderance of the evidence the trunk was never delivered to him; the claim being that the charge imposed on defendant a higher burden of proof than imposed by law.—Statement by editor.

Berry T. Moseley, of Danielsville, and Erwin, Erwin & Nix, of Athens, for plaintiff in error.

Clarence E. Adams, of Danielsville, for defendant in error.

LUKE, J. [1] 1. This action was against the Director General of Railroads, based upon alleged negligence of the Seaboard Air-Line Railway. It appears from the evidence that on June 4, 1918, the defendant in error purchased a ticket from the agent of the Southern Railway Company at Dunwoody, Ga., to Atlanta, Ga., and also delivered to said agent her trunk, for which she received the company's baggage check. It further appears from the evidence that the trunk was delivered to the Atlanta Terminal Company, which was the baggage agent of the said railway company. On the following day, June 5, 1918, the defendant in error purchased a ticket from the agent of the Seaboard Air-Line Railway from Atlanta, Ga., to Comer, Ga., and surrendered the baggage check referred to the Atlanta Terminal Company for one from Atlanta to Comer, Ga. The petition alleges that the defendant in error has never received the trunk from the Seaboard Air-Line Railway. It appears from the evidence that the Atlanta Terminal Company was acting as the agent of the Seaboard Air-Line Railway in the issuance of said baggage check, and was also the agent of the Southern Railway Company in receiving same. This is shown by the contract existing between the various railroads coming into the Atlanta Terminal Station. The verdict of the jury in favor of the plaintiff was not without evidence to support it.

[2-4] 2. We have examined all the assignments of error, and find no error requiring a new trial.

Judgment affirmed.

LOUISVILLE & N. R. CO. v. LOVELACE.
(No. 11580.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2.
Feb. 15, 1921.)

(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

1. Appeal and error \S 1099(1)—Former decision is the law of the case.

The holding on a former appeal that the overruling or dismissal of an oral motion for a new trial terminated the court's jurisdiction and that certiorari might be brought within 30 days of the judgment is the law of the case.

2. Courts \S 190(4)—Petition for certiorari to municipal court need not point out grounds of motion for new trial and exceptions unnecessary.

While a petition for certiorari to review a judgment overruling an oral motion in the municipal court for a new trial must state the grounds of the motion and contain plain and distinct assignments of error upon each ruling complained of, yet, where the petition complains only of the original verdict and judgment, it is unnecessary to point out the grounds of the motion or to except to the action of the trial judge in overruling them.

3. Courts \S 190(4)—Petition for certiorari must set forth errors of law.

Where the original judgment of the municipal court of Atlanta is alleged to be erroneous, the petition for certiorari must specifically set forth the errors of law complained of, except where it is alleged to be erroneous because of some erroneous antecedent ruling or decision.

4. Courts \S 190(3/2)—General exception to judgment sufficient when erroneous because of antecedent ruling or decision.

Where a final judgment of the municipal court of Atlanta is alleged to be erroneous only because of some erroneous antecedent ruling or decision, a general exception to the judgment is sufficient on petition for certiorari, provided specific assignments of error are made and preserved to such antecedent rulings.

5. Courts \S 190(8)—Admission of evidence in municipal court not ground for reversal if fact proved by other evidence.

Even though testimony be inadmissible, its admission is not ordinarily ground for setting aside the judgment of municipal court on certiorari if the fact shown thereby is supported by other legal evidence to which no objection was made.

6. Carriers \S 135—Measure of damages for loss or destruction of shipment or specific part thereof stated.

Where a suit is not for deterioration or depreciation in the market value of a shipment, but for the total loss or destruction of the whole shipment or a specific definitely ascertained part thereof, as of a specified quantity of potatoes alleged to be wholly decayed and worthless, the measure of damages for unreasonable delay is not that given in Civ. Code 1910, § 2773, but the full market value of the goods at destination at the time when they should have been delivered with interest, deducting any unpaid cost of transportation.

7. Courts \S 190(8)—Instruction in municipal court on measure of damages referring to "reasonable value" instead of "market value" harmless.

An instruction in municipal court on the measure of damages for delay in transportation of potatoes which used the term "reasonable value" instead of "market value" was harmless, where there was no evidence of any difference between reasonable and market value, and there was ample evidence of value in excess of the amount recovered (citing Words and Phrases, Market Value).

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, Second Series, Reasonable Value.]

8. Courts \S 190(8)—Verdict in municipal court for damages for delay less than would have been warranted not so excessive as to be reversible error.

In an action for delay in transportation of potatoes involving the question of their market value, a verdict in municipal court for an amount smaller than would have been warranted by some of the evidence will not be set aside as excessive, especially where the excess claimed is only the difference between $118.50 and $130; the question of value being peculiarly for the jury.

9. Trial \S 252(1)—Inapplicable instructions properly refused.

Requested instructions which, so far as not fully covered by those given, were inapplicable to the facts, were properly refused.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; Geo. L. Bell, Judge.

Action by T. A. Lovelace against the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Tye, Peeples & Tye, of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error.

McCallum & Sims, of Atlanta, for defendant in error.

JENKINS, P. J. [1] 1. In a former decision in this case (24 Ga. App. 616, 617, 101 S. E. 718) it was held and became the "law of the case" that, "after an oral motion for a new trial in the municipal court of Atlanta has been finally disposed of, either by having been overruled or dismissed, the jurisdiction which that court had over the case thereby ceases, and the original judgment stands as final," and that, where in that court a "motion for new trial is made and overruled, certiorari afterwards lies to the original judgment rendered therein, if presented within 30 days from the rendition of the judgment," in order to correct errors of law. See, also, Johnston v. Brenau College, 146 Ga. 182, 91 S. E. 85; Johnson v. James, 19 Ga. App. 118, 91 S. E. 220; Young v. Broyles, 16 Ga. App. 356, 85 S. E. 366.

[2-4] 2. While a petition for certiorari to review a judgment overruling an oral motion for a new trial in the municipal court of Atlanta must state the grounds of the motion, and contain plain and distinct assignments of error upon each ruling complained of, so that a general assignment of error upon the ground that the judgment overruling the motion for new trial was "contrary to law, the principles of equity and justice," and without stating what grounds of error were urged in such motion, will not suffice (Green v. Patterson, 25 Ga. App. 374, 103 S. E. 437; Holcomb v. Finch, 25 Ga. App. 261, 103 S. E. 38; Citizens' Banking Co. v. Paris, 119 Ga. 517, 46 S. E. 638; Civil Code 1910, § 5183), yet, where the petition for certiorari complains only of the original verdict and judgment, it is unnecessary to point out the grounds of the motion or to except to the action of the trial judge in overruling the same. Louisville & Nashville R. Co. v. Lovelace, supra. However, where the original judgment is alleged to be erroneous in itself, the petition for certiorari therefrom must specifically set forth the errors of law complained of, except in a case where the final judgment is alleged to be erroneous only because of some erroneous antecedent ruling or decision, when a general exception to the judgment itself will be sufficient, provided specific assignments of error are made and preserved to such antecedent rulings. Lyndon v. Ga. Ry. & Electric Co., 129 Ga. 353, 58 S. E. 1047. The petition for certiorari in the instant case complies with these rules of practice.

[5] 3. Even if testimony as to a certain fact be inadmissible under the application of the strict rules of evidence, its admission is not ordinarily a ground for setting aside the final judgment, if such fact be supported by other legal evidence to which no objection was made. Matthews v. Richards, 19 Ga. App. 489, 91 S. E. 914 (2); Southern Ry. Co. v. Ward, 131 Ga. 21, 61 S. E. 913 (4); County of Butts v. Hixon, 135 Ga. 26, 27, 68 S. E. 786 (2); Copeland v. Ruff, 20 Ga. App. 217, 92 S. E. 955 (1).

[6] 4. Where a suit is not for deterioration or depreciation in the market value of a shipment of goods, but for the total loss or destruction of the whole shipment, or of a specific, definitely ascertained part thereof (as of so many bushels of potatoes alleged to be wholly decayed and worthless), the measure of damages for unreasonable delay in transportation, defined by Civil Code 1910, § 2773, as "the difference between the market value at the time and place they should have been delivered and the time of actual delivery," is not strictly applicable; and in such a case the measure of damages is equivalent to what the rule would be where the property is not delivered or is lost in transit—that is, the full market value of the goods at destination at the time when they should have been delivered, with interest from that time, deducting (if unpaid) the cost of transportation. Albany & Northern Ry. Co. v. Merchants' Bank, 137 Ga. 391, 73 S. E. 637 (5); Atlantic & Birmingham Ry. Co. v. Howard Supply Co., 125 Ga. 478, 54 S. E. 530 (2); Southern Express Co. v. Briggs, 1 Ga. App. 294, 57 S. E. 1066 (4).

[7] 5. While a charge, "If you find for the plaintiff, he would be entitled to recover of the defendant the reasonable value of the potatoes in Atlanta, Ga., if they had been delivered to the plaintiff in a marketable condition in a reasonable time after delivery to the carrier," might be subject to some criticism as not precisely stating the measure of damages in the case on trial, although the terms "reasonable value" and "market value" by some authorities have been held equivalent (2 Bouvier's Law Dictionary, 2097; 5 Words and Phrases, 4383-4387), yet, if such charge was error, it was harmless to the defendant, there being no evidence of any difference between the reasonable or actual value and the market value, and there being ample evidence of value at the points both of destination and shipment in excess of the amount recovered. Rome R. Co. v. Sloan, 39 Ga. 636 (4); Ga., Fla. & Ala. Ry. Co. v. Bilsh Milling Co., 15 Ga. App. 142, 82 S. E. 784 (11); Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. Goodwin, 1 Ga. App. 351, 357, 57 S. E. 1070.

[8] 6. The question as to the value of an article being peculiarly for the jury (Georgia Northern Ry. Co. v. Battle, 22 Ga. App. 665, 666, 97 S. E. 94), and the jury having found for the plaintiff an amount smaller than that which would have been warranted by some of the evidence, the verdict and judgment will not be set aside as excessive, especially where the excess claimed by counsel is only the difference between $118.50 and $130 (Ala. Great So. R. Co. v. McKenzie, 139 Ga. 410 [2b], 413, 77 S. E. 647, 45 L. R. A. (N. S.) 18; Meeks v. Carter, 5 Ga. App. 421, 63 S. E. 517 [3]).

[9] 7. The verdict was warranted by the evidence. Even if the requests to charge were in proper form, under the ruling in Western Union Telegraph Co. v. Owens, 23 Ga. App. 173, 98 S. E. 116, the requests, so far as not fully covered by the instructions given, were inapplicable to the facts as disclosed by the record.

Judgment affirmed.

WILSON v. CLARK. (No. 11626.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2.
Feb. 15, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Trial \S 259(1)—Failure to charge on contributory negligence and diminution of damages held not error in absence of request.

The failure of the trial judge to charge the law as to contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff, and as to diminution of damages on account of such negligence, was not error, under the facts of this case, in the absence of a timely and proper written request to charge on the subject. Ala., etc., E. Co. v. Brown, 138 Ga. 328, 75 S. E. 330 (6, 7); Savannah Electric Co. v. Crawford, 130 Ga. 421 (1), 424, 60 S. E. 1056.

2. Appeal and error \S 730(1)—Assignment of error complaining of charge held too vague and indefinite.

An assignment of error that a charge was not such "as the law and facts of the case at bar called for" is too vague, general, and indefinite to present any question for the determination of this court. Paulk v. Speer, 143 Ga. 621, 85 S. E. 867 (2); Odum v. Rutledge, 16 Ga. App. 350, 85 S. E. 361; Davidson v. Waxelbaum, 2 Ga. App. 432, 58 S. E. 687, 688 (3); Chatman v. State, 8 Ga. App. 842, 843, 70 S. E. 188 (3).

3. Appeal and error \S 299—Trial \S 171—Refusal to direct verdict not reversible error; no direct exception lies from refusal to direct verdict.

Refusal to direct a verdict is not reversible error, and no direct exception lies therefrom, since such evidential questions merge in the motion for a new trial. Bennett v. Patten, 148 Ga. 66, 95 S. E. 690 (3b); Smith v. Leverett, 22 Ga. App. 289, 291, 96 S. E. 8.

4. Certiorari \S 68—Petition properly overruled when evidence supported verdict and judgment.

Whether or not, under the application of settled rules of practice, this court on its own motion should refuse to consider the assignments of error in this case (see, in this connection, Holcomb v. Finch, 25 Ga. App. 261, 103 S. E. 38; Green v. Patterson, 25 Ga. App. 374, 103 S. E. 437; Louisville & Nashville R. Co. v. Lovelace, 26 Ga. App. —, 106 S. E. 6; Lyndon v. Ga. Ry. & Elec. Co., 129 Ga. 353, 58 S. E. 1047; Wakefield v. Lee, 18 Ga. App. 648, 90 S. E. 224), this court cannot say, after an examination of the record, that there was not some evidence, however conflicting, to support the verdict and judgment; and the judge of the superior court did not err in overruling the petition for certiorari.

Jan. 27, 1921.)

(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

1. Trial \S 143—Direction of verdict on conflicting evidence erroneous.

Where evidence as to material facts was conflicting, court erred in directing verdict for the defendant.

2. Evidence \S 471(9)—Testimony of alleged broker as to reason defendant canceled contract properly rejected.

In an action for damages for failure to receive flour, court did not err in rejecting testimony of an alleged broker, witness for plaintiff, as to the reason defendants gave for canceling the contract, answer being: "They virtually agreed that the reason why they didn't take the flour was on account of declined price. The market price was off $1 a barrel."

3. Evidence \S 471(30)—Testimony as to agency held not a conclusion.

In an action for damages for failure to receive goods purchased from plaintiff, court did not err in admitting on redirect examination of the proprietor of defendant, "Did E. in any way whatever represent you in this transaction?" answer, "Not at all," as against an objection that answer was a conclusion of the witness.

Error from Superior Court, Baldwin County; J. B. Park, Judge.

Action by the J. C. Lysle Milling Company against the Whitfield Grocery Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

The grounds of the amended motion for new trial were:

"(1) Because the court erred in rejecting and ruling out the following testimony of E. E. Epps, the alleged broker, and witness for plaintiff on direct examination, to wit:

"Q. What reason did they give you for canceling the contract? A. Well, they virtually agreed that the reason why they didn't take the flour was on account of declined price. The market price was off $1 a barrel.' Said testimony was being read to the jury from depositions of said witness after proper notice had been given to defendant for their execution, and at which defendant failed to appear. Said answer related to a part of a conversation witness had with proprietor of defendant at Milledgeville, place of defendant's residence, after defendant had given notice of its refusal to accept the flour, as to why it refused to accept the same. The remainder of the conversation and answer to said question the court admitted in evidence.

"(2) Because the court erred in admitting on redirect examination the following question and answer of the witness C. H. Whitfield, proprietor of the defendant, to wit (said witness being for defendant): 'Q. Mr. Whitfield, did Epps in any way whatever represent you in this transaction? A. Not at all.' The objection being then and there urged at the time that the same was a conclusion of the witness as to the construction on the law of the case, and that the same was an opinion of the witness."

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Feb. 15, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Appeal and error \S 1002—Master and servant \S 286(39), 289(37)—Negligence and contributory negligence for jury on conflicting evidence.

Questions as to negligence on the part of a master in giving an order to his servant to perform a particular service, and peril in obedience on the part of the servant, and as to the exercise of ordinary care by the servant in discovering the danger that might result from compliance with the order, where there is a conflict in the evidence, are for exclusive solution by the jury, and where there is any evidence to support the verdict this court cannot interfere.

2. Commerce \S 27(8)—Master and servant \S 276(1)—Evidence must show engagement in interstate commerce to justify recovery on federal act; employé repairing engine not engaged in interstate commerce.

Where, in a suit against a common carrier for personal injuries to an employé, the petition contains two counts, one based on the state law and the other on the federal Employers' Liability Act (U. S. Comp. St. \S 8657-8665), and a verdict in favor of the plaintiff is based expressly on the latter count, the evidence must show that at the time of the injury the carrier was engaged in interstate commerce, and that the injured employé was also then employed in interstate commerce. In the instant case the evidence negatives these two essential facts.

Error from City Court of Thomasville; H. H. Merry, Judge pro hac.

Action by G. P. Demott against J. B. Payne, agent. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

This action was brought against the Director General of Railroads, operating the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad. The allegations of the plaintiff's petition, as amended, were in substance as follows: He was employed by the defendant as a boiler maker, and it was his duty to do general repair work on the defendant's boilers when ordered to do so by his superior officers. On July 30, 1919, at 10 o'clock p. m., he was directed by his superior officer, the night foreman of the defendant's shops, to do certain work on the boiler of engine No. 1280. It was the foreman's duty to have the steam of all boilers blown off and the boilers sufficiently cooled to make it safe to work inside the boilers before ordering the plaintiff to work therein. The boiler of this engine had not been blown off and sufficiently cooled to render it a safe place for him to work, but was so hot as to make it impossible for him to perform the required work without incurring serious personal injuries. He entered the boiler to perform his duties, and then discovered that the boiler was too hot, and came out, but as a result of the heat he was injured as particularly described. The foreman misled him in stating to him, when directing him to go into the boiler, that the engine was in proper condition for him to go into it, and that it had been standing there since 4 o'clock in the afternoon (the time then being 10 o'clock at night), when in truth the engine had been there and the fire removed therefrom not over 40 minutes, and the boiler had not been sufficiently cooled to make it a safe place to work. It was alleged that this fact was known to the defendant, or could have been known by the exercise of ordinary diligence, while it was not known to the plaintiff and could not have been known by the exercise of ordinary care, and that the plaintiff did not have equal means with the defendant of knowing of the dangerous condition of the boiler. The petition contained two counts, substantially the same as to the allegations stated above, one based upon the state law, and the other upon the federal Employers' Liability Act (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 8657-8665), it being alleged that engine No. 1280 was engaged in interstate commerce, and that the plaintiff was engaged in interstate commerce while working on the boiler of the engine. A demurrer to the petition was overruled, the trial resulted in a verdict for $4,000 on the count based upon the federal Employers' Liability Act, the defendant's motion for a new trial was overruled, and the movant excepted to the rulings stated. In this court it was insisted that the judgment should be reversed for two reasons: (1) Because the plaintiff had equal means with the defendant of knowing the dangerous condition of the boiler, from its heat, and by the exercise of ordinary care might have known thereof, and therefore cannot recover for his injuries resulting from entering the boiler. (2) Because the evidence failed to show that the engine upon which plaintiff was working was engaged in interstate commerce, and therefore the plaintiff was not entitled to recover upon the count of the petition upon which the verdict was specifically found.

Merrill & Moore, of Thomasville, and Ben-net & Branch, of Quitman, for plaintiff in error.

Hay, Joiner & Hammond, of Thomasville, for defendant in error.

HILL, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] 1. The view we take of the second question makes it unnecessary to consider at length the questions of law arising on the demurrer and the liability of the defendant under the evidence. It is sufficient to state that in the opinion of this court the allegations of the petition set out a cause of action, and these allegations were substantially proved by plaintiff. The issues presented by the evidence, under the statutes of this state and the decisions of the Supreme Court and of the Court of Appeals, as to the questions of diligence and negligence, are for solution by the jury, and we cannot hold that there was no evidence to support the verdict. Civil Code 1910, §§ 3130, 3131; Atlanta & Birmingham Air Line Ry Co. v. McManus, 1 Ga. App. 302, 58 S. E. 258; Southern Cotton-Oil Co. v. Gladman, 1 Ga. App. 259, 58 S. E. 249;

Cherokee Brick Co. v. Hampton, 16 Ga. App. 53, 84 S. E. 328; Grant v. Royster Guano Co., 15 Ga. App. 758, 84 S. E. 161.

[2] 2. We think the evidence failed to show a case of liability under the federal Employers' Liability Act, and for this reason the verdict on that count was not authorized. Under this act it is essential to a recovery that at the time of the injury the carrier was engaged in interstate commerce, and that the injured employé was then also employed by such carrier in interstate commerce. It is conceded that the defendant was an interstate carrier. Was the plaintiff at the time of the injury employed by the carrier in interstate commerce? He insists that he was, because he was injured while working in an engine which was then engaged in interstate commerce. He was injured on July 30, 1919, while working on engine No. 1280. The only evidence showing the use of this engine is contained in the train sheet. This shows that this engine was a part of a work train with limits entirely within the state of Georgia from July 1, 1919, to December, 1919. The only times during the period from July 1 to December 31, 1919, in which it was moving interstate was on August 2, when it ran as extra No. 1280 from Bainbridge, Ga., to Dothan, Ala., and on September 9, from Thomasville, Ga., to Montgomery, Ala. At the time the work was done on the engine by the plaintiff it had completed an intrastate trip, and had been brought in for repairs. It was then what is known in railroad parlance as a "dead engine," having no fixed destination or work. It is fairly inferable from the evidence that the next trip the engine made after the plaintiff was injured was interstate, but this was on August 2, three days after the plaintiff had been hurt, and after he had discontinued his work on the engine. Can it be said that this fact is enough to bring it under the rule announced by the courts on the subject now under consideration? The construction given to the interstate statute has been quite liberal in behalf of injured employés, but we have found no decision which goes to this limit.

The Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Minneapolis & St. Louis R. Co. v. Winters, 242 U. S. 353, 37 Sup. Ct. 170, 61 L. Ed. 358, Ann. Cas. 1913B, 54, said:

"The injury occurred while plaintiff was repairing an engine. The engine had been used in interstate commerce before the injury, and was so used afterwards, but there was nothing to show that it was permanently or specially devoted to such commerce, or assigned to it at the time. Held, not a case within the federal Employers' Liability Act."

In the opinion Mr. Justice Holmes used the following language pertinent to the point now under discussion:

"An engine as such is not permanently devoted to any kind of traffic, and it does not appear that this engine was destined especially to anything more definite than such business as it might be needed for. It was not interrupted in an interstate haul to be repaired and go on. It simply had finished some interstate business, and had not yet begun upon any other. Its next work, so far as appears, might be interstate or confined to Iowa, as should happen. At the moment it was not engaged in either, its character as an instrument of commerce depended on its employment at the time, and not upon remote probabilities or upon accidental later events."

This decision of the court of the highest authority on the construction of interstate statutes would seem to be conclusive of the instant case. In a decision of the Supreme Court of Oklahoma, in Chicago, R. I. & P. Ry. Co. v. Cronin (Okla.) 176 Pac. 919, the court said:

"It is contended that the judgment must be reversed for the reason that the trial court tried the cause as governed by the law of the state and not the federal Liability Act. * * * the theory of the company being that Cronnin was engaged in interstate commerce because he was working on an engine which, when in service, pulled an interstate passenger train. The engine had been taken out of service and placed in the shop for repairs. It was not being used in commerce of any kind; it was 'dead.' The fact that the repairs had been made and the engine placed back in service in time to make its regular trip from Sayre, Okla., to Amarillo, Tex., does not necessarily mean that the engine was not out of service in the meantime. We cannot agree with the plaintiff in error that this broken-down engine was in interstate commerce at the time of the accident; indeed, it was not in commerce of any kind. It was 'dead,' undergoing the repairs necessary to placing it in commerce."

In the instant case the engine when in service, before the repairs, had been engaged exclusively in intrastate commerce. In Hardy v. A. & W. P. R. Co., 20 Ga. App. 308, 93 S. E. 18, this court followed the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in Minneapolis & St. Louis R. Co. v. Winters, supra. In the Hardy Case the plaintiff's husband, at the time of his death, was engaged in guarding for the night a switch engine which on the day before had been engaged in interstate commerce and the day after was engaged in interstate commerce. His duties were to guard the engine, to put water and coal in it, and to keep up the fire so that it could be used as a switch engine the next day in switching both interstate and intrastate commerce. This court held that he was not engaged in interstate commerce.

Applying to the undisputed facts in the instant case the construction of the federal statute made in the cases cited, it is clear that the plaintiff was not engaged in interstate commerce at the time of his injuries, and therefore he was not entitled, by the express terms of the act, to the verdict. 35 Stat. 65, c. 149 (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 8657-8665). Judgment reversed.

1. Criminal law \S 302(4)—Nolle prosequi as to some counts works no acquittal.

A nolle prosequi as to some of the counts in an indictment works no acquittal, but leaves the prosecution just as though such counts had never been inserted in the indictment.

2. Criminal law \S 302(4)—Demurrer not sustained where there was nolle prosequi as to improper counts.

Where two counts of an indictment charged simple larceny and two other counts charged larceny after trust and there was a nolle prosequi as to the counts charging simple larceny, court properly overruled a demurrer on the ground that there was an improper joinder of counts.

3. Embezzlement \S 35 — Purpose of trust in prosecution for larceny after trust must be shown as alleged in indictment.

Where indictment charged offense of larceny after trust, or that the defendant "after having been intrusted by T. with twelve hundred dollars in money, * * * the property of said T., for the purpose of applying same to the use and benefit of said T., did fraudulently," etc., conviction of larceny after trust was not authorized by proof that the money was to be applied for the benefit of F., the son of T., to settle some debts and executions against F.

H. J. Carty was convicted of larceny after trust, and brings error. Reversed.

Counts 1 and 3 of the indictment charged the offense of larceny after trust, and counts 2 and 4 charged simple larceny. Milner & Farkas and Pottle & Hofmayer, all of Albany, for plaintiff in error.

C. E. Hay, Sol. Gen., of Thomasville, and J. B. Copeland, of Valdosta, for the State.

PER CURIAM. [1] A nolle prosequi as to some of the counts in the indictment works no acquittal but leaves the prosecution just as though such counts had never been inserted in the indictment. Dealy v. United States, 152 U. S. 539 (1), 14 Sup. Ct. 680, 38 L. Ed. 545; Martin v. State, 10 Ga. App. 795, 74 S. E. 304 (1), and authorities cited. See, also, 20 Standard Encyclopedia of Procedure, 665 (1). Under this ruling the court did not err in permitting counts 2 and 4 of the indictment to be quashed.

[2] 2. After counts 2 and 4 of the indictment were quashed, the remaining counts were not subject to the demurrer interposed, and the court did not err in overruling it.

[3] 3. The indictment charged the offense of larceny after trust, for that the defendant, "after having been intrusted by Thomas A. Gary with twelve hundred dollars in money, of the value of twelve hundred dollars, the property of said Thomas A. Gary, for the purpose of applying the same to the use and benefit of the said Thomas A. Gary, did fraudulently convert the same to his own use," contrary to the law, etc. The evidence in this case did not show the trust as alleged, but conclusively showed that the sum of money turned over to the defendant was to be applied for the benefit of Frank Gary, the son of Thomas A. Gary, to settle some debts and executions against Frank Gary. Therefore the conviction of larceny after trust is not authorized, because the proof shows that the purpose of the trust was different from that alleged in the indictment. See White v. State, 19 Ga. App. 230, 91 S. E. 280 (3), and cases cited.

For this reason alone the judgment of the court overruling the motion for a new trial is reversed.

1. Appeal and error ⇐1068(4)—Statement in charge as to damages harmless when verdict for defendant.

In an action for a personal injury, a statement in the charge that the evidence was insufficient to authorize the submission of the question of permanent incapacity to labor and to earn money was harmless, where the verdict was for defendant.

2. Electricity ⇐14(1)—Duty to exercise high degree of care does not change rule requiring only "ordinary care."

While a high degree of care is required of one maintaining a highly dangerous instrumentality such as electricity to prevent injury to persons likely to come in contact with it, this does not affect the rule that such a person is required to exercise only ordinary care, as "ordinary care" is that reasonable care and caution which an ordinary cautious and prudent person would exercise under the same or similar circumstances.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Ordinary Care.]

3. Trial ⇐260(8)—Charge as to duty respecting electricity held to cover requested charge; "ordinary care."

In an action for injuries from electricity, a charge that defendant was required to exercise ordinary care, defined as that care that every prudent man would exercise under the same or similar circumstances, properly instructed the jury as to the degree of care, and a failure to charge "as to the duty of the master to exercise due care and diligence for the safety of his employes according to the character of the instrument" was not error.

4. New trial ⇐70—Motion properly overruled when evidence authorized verdict.

When the evidence authorized the verdict for defendant and no error of law appeared, the overruling of plaintiff's motion for a new trial was not error.

Error from City Court of Atlanta; H. M. Reid, Judge.

Action by Hattie Jackson against David Goldin. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Hill & Adams, of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error.

Rosser, Slaton, Phillips & Hopkins, of Atlanta, for defendant in error.

STEPHENS, J. [1] 1. A verdict for the defendant is necessarily a finding against the plaintiff's right to recover, and therefore any alleged error upon the subject of the amount of damages is harmless, unless it is in some way calculated to affect the verdict upon the question. McBride v. Georgia Ry. & Electric Co., 125 Ga. 515, 54 S. E. 674. Where in a personal injury suit a verdict had been rendered for the defendant, thus negating the plaintiff's right to recover, a statement made by the court in charge to the jury to the effect that the evidence was insufficient to authorize the submission to them of the question of permanent incapacity to labor and to earn money could not have influenced the jury upon the question of liability, and was therefore harmless. An exception upon the ground that this statement amounted to an expression of opinion on the facts is without merit.

[2, 3] 2. While a high degree of care to prevent injury is required of one maintaining a highly dangerous instrumentality, such as electricity, where other persons are likely to come in contact with it, this does not in any way affect the rule that the person maintaining such instrumentality is required to exer-

dise only ordinary care. Ordinary care is only that reasonable care and caution which an ordinary cautious and prudent person would exercise under the same or similar circumstances. Where the plaintiff seeks to recover for injuries received as a result of the defendant's alleged negligent maintenance of an electrical apparatus, a charge by the court that the defendant in maintaining such apparatus was required to exercise "ordinary care," which the court defined as being "that care that every prudent man would exercise under the same or similar circumstances," properly instructed the jury as to the degree of care resting on the defendant, and a failure to charge "as to the duty of the master to exercise due care and diligence for the safety of his employes according to the character of the instrument" was not error.

[4] 8. The evidence authorized the verdict for the defendant, and, no error of law appearing, the court did not err in overruling the plaintiff's motion for a new trial.

Jan. 25, 1921.)

(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

1. Indictment and Information \S 110(3)—Sufficient if in language of statute.

Where an indictment is in the language of the statute, and so plainly charged the crime that the jury must have understood the nature of the offense charged, it is not subject to demurrer (Pen. Code 1910, \S 954).

2. Indictment and Information \S 110(18)—Sufficiency of description of automobile with altered motor number.

An indictment for having in possession an automobile the motor number of which has been removed or altered need not describe the automobile with such particularity as is required in cases of simple larceny, the offense charged being a felony and of the nature of a compound larceny, and that indictment, which was in language of statute, did not allege original motor number or the number as altered, did not make it demurrable.

3. Criminal law \S 1160—Approved verdict, supported by evidence, conclusive.

Where the verdict is authorized by evidence, though conflicting and unsatisfactory, and the verdict has the approval of the trial court, it will not be disturbed on writ of error.

Luke, J., dissenting in part.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County;

John A. Boykin, Sol. Gen., and E. A. Stephens, both of Atlanta, for the State.

PER CURIAM. [1, 2] 1. It was not error to overrule the demurrer to the indictment. The indictment charged the crime in the language of the statute, and so plainly that the jury must have understood the nature of the offense charged. It was therefore not subject to demurrer. Penal Code (1910) \S 954. The description of the automobile was sufficient. Adams v. State, 21 Ga. App. 152, 94 S. E. 82, and citations. This offense was a felony, and of the nature of a "compound larceny," and in such a case the description of the stolen property need not be as particular as in cases of simple larceny. Cannon v. State, 125 Ga. 785, 54 S. E. 692.

[3] 2. The assignments of error in the motion for a new trial are not of such merit as to require a new trial. The evidence was conflicting and not altogether satisfactory, but we cannot say that there was no evidence authorizing the verdict, which has the approval of the trial judge. It was not error to overrule the motion for a new trial.

Judgment affirmed.

BROYLES, C. J., and BLOODWORTH, J., concur.

LUKE, J. (dissenting). In this case the indictment charged—

"R. W. Glass with the offense of felony, for that the said accused, in the county of Fulton and state of Georgia, on the 12th day of February, 1919, did knowingly buy, steal, receive, conceal, and have in his possession a Ford touring model automobile, of the value of $580.00, and the property of A. C. Porterfield, from which the motor number—the same being a mark of identification—had been removed and altered for the purpose of concealment and misrepresenting the identity of said automobile, contrary to the laws of said state," etc.

The accused demurred specially, upon the ground that the indictment did not set out either the original number of the automobile or the number as altered or removed, and the judgment overruling the demurrer is here for review upon proper assignments of error. As pointed out in paragraph 1 of the decision, the majority of the court agree with the ruling of the trial court upon the demurrer. To this judgment and opinion of the majority of the court this writer does not agree.

The indictment is based on an act approved August 19, 1918 (Ga. Laws 1918, p. 264). The act provides in part as follows:

"It shall be unlawful to buy, steal, sell, receive, or dispose of, conceal, or have in possession, any automobile, motor-vehicle, bicycle, motorcycle, or any other machine propelled by gasoline or electricity in this state, from which the manufacturer's serial number or any other distinguishing number or identification mark has been removed, defaced, covered, altered, or destroyed for the purpose of concealment or misrepresenting the identity of said motor vehicle, automobile, bicycle, motorcycle or other such machine."

A violation thereof is punishable by confinement in the penitentiary. The indictment in this case states the offense in practically the terms and language of the statute, and such a statement of the offense is usually deemed, under section 954 of the Penal Code, sufficiently technical and correct. But where the indictment charges simple larceny, or a substantially similar offense, it must, in addition to using the language of the statute, describe the subject-matter of the offense with sufficient certainty to individualize the transaction, reasonably inform the defendant of the instance meant, enable the jury to say whether the indictment and the evidence relate to the same chattel, and, in the event of a subsequent prosecution for the same offense, put the court in position to determine the identity of the subject-matter of the two indictments. See, in this connection, Walthour v. State, 114 Ga. 75, 39 S. E. 872; Brown v. State, 116 Ga. 559, 42 S. E. 795; Melvin v. State, 120 Ga. 490, 48 S. E. 198; Bright v. State, 10 Ga. App. 17, 72 S. E. 519.

In the case that we have here for review, the motor number, rather than the automobile itself, is the subject-matter of the offense; but in my opinion the indictment contains insufficient description of either. The description "Ford touring model automobile" is no more sufficient to put the defendant on notice of what Ford automobile than if the indictment, if it had been an indictment for larceny, had undertaken to describe "one mule," or "one wagon," or "one law book," etc. The indictment in this case contains absolutely nothing to show what the motor number originally was, or what it was as altered, and nothing to distinguish either of such numbers from any possible group of figures that may be found on the motor of any "Ford touring model automobile." In Walthour's Case, supra, it was held that "a lot of cordwood," of a stated value and ownership, was an insufficient description to withstand a timely special demurrer. In Brown's Case, supra, it was held that "a certain lot of brass fittings, to wit, 400 pounds," of a stated value, and the ownership, was likewise insufficient. In Bright's Case, supra, this court made a similar ruling with respect to "100 pounds of seed cotton," the value and ownership of which were distinctly alleged.

The question now is: Do the words "a Ford touring model automobile," in connection with a stated value and ownership of the machine, constitute a sufficient description of the subject-matter of an indictment for a violation of the act of 1918?

The purpose of this act may be gathered from history, as well as from its own terms. When automobiles and other machines mentioned in this act first began to be used and stolen in this state, the thieves, if caught and convicted, could be punished only as for a misdemeanor, and that by reason of the omnibus provision against simple larceny now appearing as section 171 of the Penal Code. But by the year 1916 motor vehicles had come into such general use, and, because of their nature and value, had become so attractive to thieves, that the Legislature of this state made the larceny of "any automobile, locomobile, motorcycle, and other like vehicles propelled by electricity or gasoline," a felony, punishable by imprisonment in the penitentiary for not less than one year nor more than five years. See Ga. Laws 1916, p. 154. It was next discovered that the number of machines, in general use, of every make and model, was so great that the owner of a machine was often unable to identify it except by some distinguishing number or identification mark placed thereon, either by the manufacturer or by the owner or at his instance. By taking advantage of that situation a thief, unless detected in the act of stealing, could easily and quickly get the stolen machine to some private place, not infrequently the garage of an accomplice, and there remove or alter all distinguishing numbers and identification marks found on the machine, which, when done, rendered both the thief and his accomplice practically safe and secure from the danger of detention usually attending the possession of stolen property. In that situation professional thieves could, and did, ply their trade in the larger cities of the state with no greater risk to themselves than in sparsely settled rural communities. To meet this situation, and destroy that advantage of thieves, the General Assembly passed the act of 1918, making the bare possession of a machine from which a distinguishing number or identification mark has been unlawfully removed, or on which it has been unlawfully altered, a crime of the same degree, and meriting the same punishment, as the stealing of such a machine. An indictment which charges the commission of this offense is not good, as against a timely special demurrer, where it does not allege with the definiteness known to the grand jury the numbers or identification mark altered or changed. The crime consists in changing, covering, or altering the numbers or identification marks. In my opinion, the special demurrer of the defendant in this case, was good and should have been sustained.

I do not dissent from the view expressed by the majority of the court in paragraph 2 of the decision, for the reason that there is some slight evidence to authorize the conviction of the defendant, if the view with respect to the sufficiency of the indictment is correct as announced in paragraph 1. To my mind a reading of the evidence and record in this case emphasizes the error in overruling the demurrer. I do not think there is merit in any of the special grounds of the motion for a new trial.

(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

1. Courts \S 190(3½) — No review of failure to strike answer in municipal court in absence of ruling.

Where on motion made to strike answer in municipal court attorney for defendant produced copy of suit served, and stated that it was not verified, and after such statement motion was not further insisted on by plaintiff's attorney, and court was of opinion that point was not being further insisted upon, and made no definite ruling on the motion, it could not be said that the court erred.

2. Appeal and error \S 1058(1)—Error in ruling out evidence as to contents of bills of lading harmless.

There was no error in ruling out testimony of a witness as to the contents of a bill of lading, where it was subsequently introduced in evidence.

3. Trial \S 109 — Judgment properly entered on counterclaim on admission by plaintiff's attorney.

Where plaintiff's attorney stated in open court that if plaintiff was not entitled to recover, then defendant should recover the sum of $30 and costs under his counterclaim, and that there was no controversy about such claim being correct, if the contention of the plaintiff was not correct, plaintiff cannot complain that court was without power to enter judgment for the $30 and costs in favor of defendant, although the latter introduced no evidence.

4. Evidence \S 317(6)—Testimony as to statements by others regarding market value properly ruled out.

Testimony of witness that he inquired around among different iron dealers of the town as to the market value on the date in question, and was informed that it was $18 a ton, was properly ruled out upon motion, based on ground that market value could not be proved in such manner.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; J. T. Pendleton, Judge.

Petition for certiorari by the Central of Georgia Railway Company to review an adverse judgment in the case of petitioner against Miller & Lipshitz. From a judgment overruling the petition for certiorari, petitioner brings error. Affirmed.

After case was called for trial and both parties announced ready, plaintiff moved to strike answer on ground that it was not verified as required by rules of the municipal court, and defendant's attorney produced a copy of the suit served, and stated that it was not verified, and after this statement the motion was not further insisted on by plaintiff's attorney, and the court, being of the opinion that the point was not being further insisted upon, made no definite ruling on the motion. An agent of plaintiff testified concerning the transaction between plaintiff and defendant, and court ruled out such part of the testimony as related to the contents of a bill of lading, which was subsequently admitted in evidence. The attorney for the plaintiff stated in open court that if the Central of Georgia Railway Company was not entitled to recover, then defendant should recover the sum of $30 and costs, and that there was no controversy about defendant's claim for such amount being correct, if the contention of the railway company was not correct. After argument the court granted defendant's motion for judgment for $30 and costs. The court ruled out testimony of witness that he inquired around among different iron dealers of the town as to the market value, and was informed that it was $18 a ton, on the ground that the market value could not be proved in any such manner.—Statement by editor.

WHITTEMORE v. STATE. (No. 11951.)(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
Jan. 28, 1921.)(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

1. Homicide \S 122—One has right to shoot to protect sister from felony.

One, acting under the fears of a reasonable man that the life of his sister is in danger, or that a felony is being attempted upon her person, and under the belief of a reasonable man that it is necessary to shoot in order to save her life or to prevent the commission of a felony upon her person, may shoot the assaulting party.

2. Homicide \S 122—Apparent danger in law of defense of another same as real danger.

In a prosecution for shooting at another, court did not err in instructing, "I charge you that an apparent danger is the same as a real danger."

3. Homicide \S 122—Police officer may lay hands on a woman who is assaulting another.

If a woman, together with her brother, was endeavoring to make an assault upon the person of another man, it was the duty of police officer to restrain her, and he had the right to lay his hand upon her with the intent to restrain her from the commission of assault, without being guilty of either a felony or a misdemeanor, and the brother would not be justified in shooting him for so doing.

4. Homicide \S 122—That a man assaulted was carrying pictures of sister, no justification for shooting at officer protecting him.

That a person assaulted by defendant and his sister had taken pictures of the sister and was carrying them in his watch did not justify, mitigate, or excuse shooting an officer, who laid hands upon the sister to restrain her from the commission of the assault.

Error from Superior Court, Whitfield County; M. C. Tarven, Judge.

Jim Whittemore was convicted of shooting at another, and brings error. Affirmed.

The court charged that if defendant was acting under the fears of a reasonable man that the life of his sister was in danger, or that a felony was being attempted upon her person, and under the belief of a reasonable man thought it was necessary to shoot in order to save her life, or in order to prevent the commission of a felony upon her person, and under these circumstances shot some one, he would not be guilty of an offense. The court further charged that an apparent danger is the same as a real danger. The court also charged that if the sister of defendant, together with defendant, was endeavoring to make an assault upon another person, it was the duty of an officer to restrain her, if possible to do so, from the commission of the assault, and he would not be guilty of an offense in laying his hand upon her with intent to restrain her. Court also charged:

"That any occurrence such as is referred to in the statement of the defendant and perhaps in the evidence, relative to the taking of certain pictures of defendant's sister by one M. and his carrying these pictures or either of them, in his watch, could not be considered by you as offering justification, mitigation or excuse for the shooting which you have under investigation."

A failure to comply with rule 15 of the Court of Appeals (57 S. E. xi), relating to filing and service of briefs, is not a ground for the dismissal of a writ of error.

2. Certiorari \S 70(4)—Assignment of error in bill of exceptions held sufficient.

An assignment of error in a bill of exceptions that judge of superior court erred in dismissing certiorari held to sufficiently show that the ruling was excepted to.

3. Certiorari \S 70(5)—Dismissal of certiorari for delay in application not reversible error where result would be same on merits.

A judgment dismissing certiorari will not be reversed because the superior court erred in dismissing it on the ground that it did not affirmatively appear that certiorari had been applied for within 30 days from the date of the judgment complained of, where it is apparent from an examination of the entire record that practically the same result, the overruling of the certiorari, would and ought to have been reached if the same had been heard upon its merits.

4. Costs \S 262—No damages for delay where court not convinced writ of error was prosecuted for delay only.

Action by D. C. Porter against J. K. Hines. From a judgment of the superior court dismissing certiorari brought to review a judgment for plaintiff, defendant brings error. Affirmed.

The bill of exceptions, among other things, stated:

"On the said hearing on August 19, 1920, counsel for said D. C. Porter moved to dismiss the said certiorari on the ground that it did not affirmatively appear that the certiorari was applied for within 30 days from the rendition of the judgment complained of. On said day the court sustained said motion and dismissed said certiorari, to which ruling J. K. Hines, plaintiff in said certiorari, then and there excepted and now excepts and assigns the same as error, on the ground that it does affirmatively appear from the application for said certiorari and the papers in said case the same was applied for within 30 days from the rendition of the judgment complained of, it being alleged in the petition for certiorari that it was applied for within 30 days from the rendition of said judgment, and it further appearing that the execution issued upon the foreclosure of the lien sought to be enforced was made returnable to the April term, 1919, of the justice court of the 977th district G. M. of said county, to be held on the 28th day of April, 1919, being the fourth Monday in April, 1919, thus showing that the terms of said justice court were held on the fourth Monday in each month, and it further appearing from the record in said case that the judgment complained of was rendered at the May term, 1919, of said justice court, being one of the regular monthly terms of said justice court, and which was necessarily held on the fourth Monday in May, 1919, or on May 26, 1919."

W. S. Erwin, of Clarkesville and Hines, Hardwick & Jordan, of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error.

J. C. Edwards & Sons, of Clarkesville, for defendant in error.

BROYLES, C. J. [1] 1. A failure to comply with rule 15 of this court (57 S. E. xi), relating to filing and service of briefs, is not a ground for the dismissal of a writ of error. Rogers v. Mayers, 3 Ga. App. 69, 59 S. E. 309.

[2] 2. The motion to dismiss the bill of exceptions on the ground that the assignment of error therein is legally insufficient is without merit. The ruling of the judge of the superior court in dismissing the certiorari was distinctly excepted to and specifically assigned as error in the bill of exceptions, and the alleged reasons why such ruling was error were clearly stated therein.

3. The remaining ground of the motion to dismiss the bill of exceptions is without substantial merit.

[3] 4. Conceding, but not deciding, that the court erred in holding that it did not affirmatively appear that the certiorari had been applied for within 30 days from the date of the judgment complained of and in dismissing the certiorari on that ground, the judgment of dismissal will not be reversed by this court, since it is apparent from an examination of the entire record that practically the same result, viz. the overruling of the certiorari, would and ought to have been reached if the same had been heard upon its merits. See, in this connection, McPherson v. Stroup, 100 Ga. 228, 28 S. E. 157; Matthews v. City of Thomaston, 21 Ga. App. 496, 94 S. E. 631, and authorities there cited.

[4] 5. This court not being convinced that the writ of error was prosecuted for the purpose of delay only, the request of defendant in error that damages be awarded him is denied.

Judgment affirmed.

BUSSELL v. WILLIAMS. (No. 11913.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1. Jan. 25, 1921.)

(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

1. Appeal and error \S 302(1)—Ground of motion for new trial not considered unless complete.

Ground of a motion for new trial will not be considered unless complete and understandable within itself.

2. Appeal and error \S 302(3)—Ground of motion for new trial, complaining of exclusion of evidence, too incomplete for consideration.

First and second amendment to defendant's motion for new trial, alleging the court erred in excluding certain evidence from the consideration of the jury, held too incomplete for consideration by the Court of Appeals, not showing on what ground the evidence was excluded, or wherein the trial court erred, and because the materiality of the evidence could not be ascertained without examination of other parts of the record.

Error from City Court of Dublin; R. D. Flynt, Judge.

Action by Jim Williams against H. N. Bussell. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant brings error. Reversed.

Defendant's amended motion for new trial follows:

(1) Because the court excluding from the consideration of the jury the following legal and material evidence offered by H. N. Bussell in his own behalf as follows, to wit: "It was worth at least $12.50 per month to feed a mule from June until December, 1917, and on account of Jim Williams leaving me, the mule he would have worked was a dead loss to me, and yet I had to feed him with expense of at least this amount. I would have made in cotton, corn, velvet beans and general farm products at least the value of the feed of this mule more than I did make if I had had the services of Jim Williams under his contract."

The court excluded this evidence upon the objection of counsel that it related to damages too remote and speculative to be the basis of recovery.

(2) Because the court excluded from the consideration of the jury the following material and legal evidence offered by H. N. Bussell in his own behalf as follows: "Jim Williams leaving me at the season of the year he did caused me to lose at least a bale of cotton that I would have been able to have made more than I did make by the grass taking my crop and my inability to properly cultivate it without the labor of Jim Williams. With the labor of Jim Williams I would have been able to have kept the crop sufficiently clear of grass and to have given it sufficient cultivation to have made at least an additional bale of cotton of the value of $100."

The court excluded said evidence on the objection of the counsel that the evidence related to damages too remote and speculative to be the basis for recovery in said case.—Statement by editor.

J. S. Adams and R. Earl Camp, both of Dublin, for plaintiff in error.

BROYLES, C. J. [1] 1. Under repeated rulings of this court and of the Supreme Court a ground of a motion for a new trial will not be considered unless it is complete and understandable within itself.

[2] (a) A ground based upon the exclusion of material evidence is too incomplete to be considered, unless it not only shows on what ground the evidence was excluded, but wherein the court erred in excluding it. Furthermore, where the materiality of the evidence excluded cannot be ascertained without an examination of other parts of the record, such a ground is too indefinite to raise any question for the consideration of this court. Central of Georgia Railway Co. v. Jaques & Tinsley, 23 Ga. App. 396, 98 S. E. 357 (2); Corona v. De Laval Separator Co., 24 Ga. App. 683, 102 S. E. 44 (1); Summerlin v. State, 25 Ga. App. 568 (1b), 103 S. E. 832. Under the above rulings, neither the first nor the second ground of the amendment to the motion for a new trial in the instant case can be considered.

2. The evidence (as contained in the record) not demanding the verdict returned, the court erred in withdrawing the case from the jury and in directing them to return a verdict for the plaintiff.

Judgment reversed.

New trial \S 85—Absence of defendant who could testify to material matters held to require new trial.

Where defendant, whose counsel had unsuccessfully moved for a continuance, applied for a new trial on the ground that on the day of the trial he was ill and unable to attend court or notify the court or counsel of his condition, and showed that he would testify denying liability or the receipt of notice necessary to authorize attorney's fees and showing payment of one of the notes sued on, and diligence by defendant and his counsel was affirmatively shown, the motion should have been granted, though his testimony as to payment of such note may have been inadmissible.

JENKINS, P. J. 1. Where on the trial of a case counsel for the defendant made a formal motion for a continuance on the ground of the absence of the defendant, and stated in his place that such absence was for "reasons unknown to counsel," that he "needed the assistance of his client and could not safely go to trial" without him, and that the defendant was a witness to certain material facts; and where the motion was overruled, the case proceeded to trial, and the court directed a verdict for the plaintiff, and where the defendant in his motion for new trial showed that on the day of trial and for two days thereafter he was ill, in a semiconscious condition, and unable to attend court or to notify the court or counsel of his condition, that he had a meritorious defense, and, if he had been present at the trial, "would have sworn that he received no notice of the intention of the plaintiff to file said suit," and that the note for $750 sued on included the $250 note also sued on, and that the latter note had in this way been satisfied, and where these grounds of the motion for a new trial were supported by uncontroverted affidavits of the defendant and others, and where the defendant and his counsel both affirmatively showed the exercise of due diligence, it was error to refuse the grant of a new trial upon the grounds thus shown, even though, as the court recited in the order denying a new trial, the evidence by the defendant as to the payment of the $250 may have been inadmissible because relating to transactions between defendant and the deceased payee of the notes, since, as the judge subsequently pointed out in the bill of exceptions, he did not thus mean to indicate that other material testimony by the defendant denying his liability and denying receipt of notice for attorney's fees as set up in his motion for new trial and affidavits would be inadmissible. White v. Martin, 63 Ga. 659; Thrasher v. Anderson, 45 Ga. 538; Smith v. Brand, 44 Ga. 588; Peacock v. Usry, 52 Ga. 354.

Where he fails, without good excuse, to perform either one of these statutory requirements, he is liable for the eventual condemnation money recovered in the trover suit; and when sued on his official bond by the plaintiff in the trover suit, he cannot successfully defend by showing that he made personal service on the defendant, or took a bond from the defendant to attend court, or that he did not arrest the defendant or require him to give a forthcoming bond, because the property sued for was not in the defendant's possession and he could not produce it. LOVELL v. PACE. (No. 11861.)

Feb. 15, 1921.)

Justices of the peace \S 91(3)—Sales \S 1(1)

—Cause of action held sufficient to show suit on account; relationship of debtor and creditor created by purchase of injured cow.

The action in the justice's court was sufficient to show a suit on account, and the judge of the superior court did not err in sustaining the certiorari.

Error from Superior Court, Calhoun County; W. M. Harrell, Judge.

Action by W. B. Pace against J. P. Lovell. The suit was dismissed in justice's court, but certiorari was sustained, and the case remanded for a new trial by the superior court, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

This case originated in a justice's court. The cause of action attached to the summons was as follows:

"J. P. Lovell to W. B. Pace, Debtor.

May 19. To one cow damaged by auto, sold..$100 00
Credit by money from cow..... 35 00

Bal. due$ 65 00"

The defendant demurred to the cause of action upon the following grounds:

"(1) The summons and account attached fail to state either jointly or considered separately any liability against debt.

"(2) No reasons are shown why the defendant is liable for the killing of the milk cow.

"(3) Defendant demurs especially to the account sued on, upon the ground that the facts stated do not inform the defendant as to the nature of the account, or why defendant is chargeable with the killing of the cow.

"(4) Plaintiff's action sounds both of the nature of suit on contract and on tort, and defendant is unable to ascertain from the summons and account the particular nature of the charge against him."

Before judgment on the demurrer the plaintiff by leave of the court filed the following amendment, to meet the demurrer:

"1. Plaintiff amends his said suit and account by adding the following: On the 19th day of May, 1919, plaintiff's grandson was driving a cow, property of plaintiff, worth $125, in the public road near Leary, when said cow was struck by an automobile driven by the son of defendant, Jim, a minor, who recklessly drove said car against said cow, breaking her leg; said boy acting at the instruction and command of his father to take a passenger to Leary. Whereupon plaintiff called upon defendant and, apprising him of the damage done to his said cow by said son, told defendant that the cow was then defendant's, and would take $100 for her, whereupon defendant agreed to give $100 for her, and requested plaintiff to sell the cow to the marketman for him, and whatever it brought him he would pay the balance, and plaintiff, acting upon said agreement, thus losing two hours from his plow in busy time, so sold said cow to the marketman, Mr. Taylor, for the sum of $40, and received from him the sum of $35, which sale defendant is indebted for the balance of said account, $65, as well as the balance of said damage to plaintiff by the authorized act through his said son, driving said car."

The justice sustained the demurrer—"upon each and every ground, the plaintiff having amended his cause of action."

Plaintiff sued out his petition for certiorari to the judgment sustaining the demurrer and dismissing his suit. Certiorari was sued out, and the judge of the superior court sustained the certiorari and remanded the case for another hearing.

E. L. Smith, of Edison, for plaintiff in error.

C. J. Taylor, of Valdosta, for defendant in error.

HILL, J. (after stating the facts as above). After careful consideration we are constrained to affirm the judgment of our learned brother of the superior court. The action as originally brought in the justice's court, when considered in the light of the rule of liberal construction of actions in justice's court, was sufficient without amendment to show a suit on account. When the amendment was filed, the cause of action was luminous with light and perspicacity of pleading. That the plaintiff undertook to give the entire history of the transaction, and to show the result of the collision between the cow and the car, might have been well treated as historical inducement. We are not surprised that the learned and experienced judge of the superior court came to the conclusion, aided by the allegations of the amendment, that the cause of action was for the price which defendant had agreed to give for the cow after deducting the damage to her caused by the automobile. When the plaintiff informed the defendant what had been done to his cow by his car, the latter, with commendable fairness, at once bought the damaged cow and instructed the plaintiff to sell her for him, and deduct the amount received; the defendant stating that he would pay the balance. Acting on the instructions of the defendant, the plaintiff sold the cow which the defendant had so taken off his hands, and, after deducting the amount received for beef, brought suit for the balance of the purchase price. The transaction was complete when defendant bought the damaged cow from the plaintiff, and the relationship of debtor and creditor thus arose.

Judgment affirmed.

FAIR & MARTIN, Inc., v. BREWER.
(No. 11795.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2.
Feb. 15, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Evidence ⇨123(2)—Sales ⇨168(2), 181 (10)—Duty of buyer to examine goods and give prompt notice of rejection; letter of rejection admissible as res gestæ and on question of diligence, though telegram did not reject.

"It is the duty of the buyer to act promptly in making an examination of goods sent on his order, to see whether they comply therewith, and to give prompt notice to the seller of their rejection, if found defective, if he intends to avail himself of that remedy." Where a buyer, upon reception of goods sent on his order and after inspection of the goods, telegraphed immediately to the seller that he found them defective in certain particulars, but did not explicitly state that for this reason he rejected them, a letter, written by the buyer on the second day after the sending of the telegram, confirming the telegram and making clear and certain the rejection of the shipment, was admissible as evidence in behalf of the buyer: (a) As a part of the res gestæ of the transaction; and (b) as relating to the question of due diligence in giving notice of the rejection of the goods.

2. Sales ⇨161—Notice to carrier to divert shipment equivalent to transfer of bill of lading.

Where a consignor sells the goods while in transitu to a person other than the original consignee, and directs the carrier, while still in possession of the goods, to deliver them to such purchaser, the carrier is bound to follow the direction.

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

3. Sales ⇨218½—Seller suing for price of goods rejected must show transfer of title.

A seller, suing to recover the contract price of goods rejected by the buyer, must affirmatively show that title has passed to the purchaser.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; W. D. Ellis, Judge.

Action by Thomas Brewer against Fair & Martin, Incorporated. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

This is a suit on open account against Fair & Martin, Incorporated, for the contract price of a car of tomatoes. There was a verdict for the plaintiff, and the defendant's motion for a new trial was overruled. The contract for the purchase of the tomatoes is contained in letters and telegrams between the parties. On April 18, 1917, the defendant, in Atlanta, telegraphed to Brewer, the plaintiff, in Homestead, Fla., asking for prices on tomatoes which Brewer might have "rolling"; that is to say, that were on board cars coming north from Florida, which could be diverted to them in Atlanta. In reply Brewer, on April 22, wired that he had a car of tomatoes going west, "rolled Saturday night," containing 197 crates of "fancy," 183 crates of "choice," and 47 crates of "seconds," quoting prices on each grade. The terms "fancy," "choice," and "seconds" are current with the trade, describing grades of tomatoes. On April 23, Fair & Martin telegraphed in reply:

"Divert us car tomatoes shipped Saturday prices quoted confirm quick."

Replying to this telegram, Brewer, on April 24, wired:

"F. o. b. sale here confirmed Southern 120632 passed Jacksonville today and diverted to you. Tomatoes packed to color in ten days, inspect accordingly."

On the day of the arrival of the car, April 25, Fair & Martin made inspection of the tomatoes, and wired to Brewer:

"Southern 120632 arrived. Inferior quality large per centage showing black spots some green stock showing decay."

This telegram was followed by a letter from Fair & Martin to Brewer, dated April 27, 1917:

"On the 25th we wired you that car of tomatoes Southern 120632 arrived and was rejected account of inferior quality. A large percentage showing black spots, and some of the green stock were showing decay. We regret very much that we should have trouble on our first car, but trust to be more successful next time. We can only use good stuff."

This letter was excluded from evidence, on the defendant's objection that it was a self-serving declaration and drew conclusions as to previous correspondence and construed previous correspondence. This ruling is complained of in the motion for a new trial, the defendant insisting that the letter should have been admitted because it gave due and timely notice to Brewer of the rejection of the shipment on account of the inferior condition of the tomatoes, and because it confirmed the telegram as to their inferior quality, and met the objection to that telegram that it was ambiguous on the point of rejection, making clear that the tomatoes were rejected because of inferior quality.

Another contention of the defendant was that, this being a suit on open account, the plaintiff must show that the title to the tomatoes had become vested in the defendant when the suit was brought, and that the plaintiff had failed to carry this burden. The evidence of the plaintiff showed that the bill of lading had been taken by the seller in his own name, and that the car of tomatoes was consigned to his own order, and there was no evidence that it had been transferred to the defendant. The evidence did not show what had become of the bill of lading. The court charged that—

"If the railroad company agreed to and did offer to deliver the car to defendant without transfer of this bill of lading, then the failure to transfer the bill of lading would not of itself defeat the plaintiff's right of recovery, if he was otherwise entitled to recover."

Error is assigned on this charge, on the ground that there was no evidence on which to base it.

Green, Tilson & McKinney and C. W. Hager, all of Atlanta, for defendant in error.

HILL, J. (after stating the facts as above) [1] I. We think the court erred in excluding from evidence the letter of the defendant to the plaintiff, dated April 27, 1917. No objection was made to the introduction of this letter on the ground that it was a letter-press or carbon copy, and not the original. The objections urged were:

"That the letter was irrelevant and immaterial, and that it contained self-serving declarations, and drew conclusions as to previous correspondence and construed previous correspondence between the parties, and that the telegram which the letter sought to construe was in evidence and was the best evidence."

This letter was relevant and material on one of the controlling issues in the case. It is well established that—

"It is the duty of the buyer to act promptly in making an examination of goods sent on his order, to see whether they comply therewith, and to give prompt notice to the seller of their rejection, if found defective, if he intends to avail himself of that remedy." 23 Ruling Case Law, 1434, § 257.

Fair & Martin had ordered the shipment of tomatoes diverted to them from the original destination, and this had been done by Brewer. As soon as the carload of tomatoes arrived in Atlanta, Fair & Martin inspected them to see if they were as represented. This they had the right to do, and had been requested to do by Brewer. Immediately after inspection, Fair & Martin wired Brewer that the tomatoes were of "inferior quality, large percentage showing black spots, some green stock showing decay." This telegram was clear as to the complaint that the tomatoes were of inferior quality, but it did not show that for this reason they were rejected by the purchaser. The letter following the telegram removed all doubt on this point, and made positive and clear the rejection of the tomatoes for the reason stated in the telegram and repeated in the letter. The letter following the telegram was a part of the res gestæ of the transaction. The evidence as to the quality of the tomatoes was in conflict. The character of the shipment made imperative the enforcement of the rule of law that the purchaser should give prompt notice to the seller of the rejection, and of the reason therefor. This point was in sharp issue between the parties, and the letter was illustrative of this issue, and should have been admitted. Besides, the letter was admissible without reference to the previous telegram. It was pertinent to the legal question as to whether the purchaser had exercised due and proper diligence in giving the seller notice of the rejection of the tomatoes because of their alleged defective condition, and this was for the jury to determine.

[2, 3] 2. The second assignment of error is without merit. There was evidence upon which to predicate the instruction that—

"If the railroad company agreed to and did offer to deliver the car to defendant without transfer of this bill of lading, then the failure to transfer the bill of lading would not of itself defeat the plaintiff's right of recovery, if he was otherwise entitled to recover."

This was a suit on account to recover the contract price of the goods. It was essential to the seller's right of recovery to affirmatively show that title to the tomatoes had passed into the purchaser, and it was insisted that this burden had not been successfully carried. It was contended that the evidence showed that the seller took the bill of lading in his own name, and that the car of tomatoes was consigned to his own order when the shipment was made to Cincinnati, and afterwards diverted to the defendant in Atlanta by express order given by the shipper to the carrier. The order to divert was complied with by the carrier, who actually delivered the shipment to the defendant in Atlanta. The actual transfer of the bill of lading by the seller to the purchaser, under these facts, was not essential. Notice by the shipper to the carrier to divert the shipment to the purchaser was equivalent to a transfer of the bill of lading.

"A consignor of goods which have been shipped to a designated consignee has a right to direct a change in their destination . . . while the goods remain in the possession of the carrier, and the carrier is bound to obey such direction." Lewis v. Galena & Chicago U. R. Co., 40 Ill. 281.

We reverse the judgment of the court refusing a new trial, because of the error discussed in the first division of this opinion.

SHAW COTTON MILLS, Inc., v. ACME HOS-IERY MILLS, Inc. (No. 98.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. March 2, 1921.)

1. Appeal and error ⇨1050(1)—Admission of invoice to prove price harmless in view of testimony.

The admission of an invoice to prove price paid at particular time, if error, was harmless, where witness had previously testified to the price paid and the invoice was offered in corroboration of such testimony.

2. Appeal and error ⇨1026 — Error must be shown to have been prejudicial.

Mere error in the trial of a cause is not sufficient grounds for a new trial, but it should be made to appear that the ruling was material and prejudicial to appellant's rights.

3. Appeal and error ⇨1053(3)—Admission of testimony held cured by instruction.

The admission of buyer's testimony as to price of goods at the time of the trial, in action in which buyer claimed damages for non-delivery, to corroborate testimony that the price of the goods had continued to rise from time to time since the execution of the contract, was cured by instruction limiting buyer's damages to the difference between the agreed price and the market price at the time of the breach of the contract.

4. Evidence ⇨147, 271(19) — Exclusion of self-serving and negative statements in letter held not reversible error.

Exclusion of statements in letters from seller to buyer that goods rejected by buyer had been shipped to other customers, and that no complaint had been made by other customers tending to show that the goods rejected by buyer had been of a quality called for in the contract, held not reversible error; such declarations being at most self-serving and tending only to prove a negative.

5. Sales \Leftrightarrow 88—Whether seller agreed to deliver specified amount during particular year held for jury.

Whether seller agreed to deliver 12,000 pounds splicing yarn during particular year held for the jury.

Appeal from Superior Court, Halifax County; Devin, Judge.

Action by the Shaw Cotton Mills, Incorporated against the Acme Hosiery Mills, Incorporated in which the defendant interposed a counterclaim. Affirmative judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. No error.

Civil action brought by plaintiff to recover the sum of $286.94 for certain yarns sold and delivered to the defendant during the years 1915 and 1919. Defendant admitted receipt and nonpayment of said goods, but set up in defense, and by way of counterclaim, two causes of action, each for an alleged breach of contract, as follows:

(1) That during the month of October, 1914, the plaintiff contracted and agreed to sell the defendant sufficient splicing yarn to supply its needs for the year 1915, estimated at 12,000 pounds, at 24 cents per pound; that of said amount plaintiff delivered 11,244 pounds only, leaving 756 pounds due and unfilled on said contract.

(2) That during the month of April, 1919, plaintiff contracted and agreed to sell the defendant 15,000 pounds of splicing yarn at 65 cents per pound for delivery within six months; that of said amount plaintiff only shipped 8,627 pounds, a portion of which was returned and accepted by plaintiff, leaving 8,262 pounds of yarn due and unfilled on said contract.

Upon issues joined, the following verdict was rendered by the jury:

"(1) Is the defendant indebted to the plaintiff, and, if so, in what amount? Answer: $286.94 with interest from August 10, 1919.

"(2) Did the plaintiff contract to deliver to defendant 12,000 pounds of splicing yarn during the year 1915 as alleged in answer? Answer: Yes.

"(3) If so, did the plaintiff fail to comply with said contract? * * * Answer: Yes.

"(4) What damage is the defendant entitled to recover therefor? * * * Answer: $74.60.

"(5) Did the plaintiff contract to deliver to the defendant 15,000 pounds of splicing yarn in 1919, as alleged in the answer? Answer: Yes.

"(6) Did the plaintiff wrongfully fail to comply with said contract? Answer: Yes.

"(7) What damage, if any, is the defendant entitled to recover therefor? Answer: $1,684.80."

Judgment on the verdict in favor of the defendant for the sum of $1,427.86. Plaintiff excepted and appealed.

George C. Green, of Weldon, and H. M. Robins and J. A. Spence, both of Ashboro, for appellee.

STACY, J. There are 49 exceptions in the record, 35 of which relate to the admission and exclusion of evidence, one to the submission of the second issue to the jury, two to the court's refusal to give special prayers for instruction, seven to his honor's charge, and the remaining four to the formal rendition of judgment.

Several exceptions, directed to the court's ruling upon questions of evidence, merit our attention and consideration.

[1, 2] The defendant was permitted to offer in evidence, over the plaintiff's objection, an invoice of yarn bought by the defendant from the Magnolia Mills at Charlotte, N. C., October 25, 1919, showing the price paid at that time to be $1.05. This, standing alone, would be objectionable, but the witness had previously testified that he had paid $1.05 for yarn to supply the deficiency of plaintiff's shipments. The evidence was offered in corroboration. Viewing it in this light, even if inadmissible, we think its effect was harmless. Mere error in the trial of a cause is not sufficient grounds for a new trial. It should be made to appear that the ruling was material and prejudicial to appellant's rights. State v. Smith, 164 N. C. 478, 79 S. E. 979; Schas v. Assurance Society, 170 N. C. 420, 87 S. E. 222, Ann. Cas. 1918A, 679, and Brewer v. Ring & Valk, 177 N. C. 476, 99 S. E. 358.

[3] Again, defendant was permitted to show, over plaintiff's objection the price of yarn at the time of trial. His honor restricted this to corroborating evidence, testimony having been offered that the price of yarn had continued to rise, from time to time, since the execution of the contract. Furthermore, upon the measure of damages, the court instructed the jury that they should limit their award to the difference between the agreed price and the market price at the time of the breach of the contract. This apparently was sufficient to cure any objection.

[4] A mass of correspondence between the parties was offered in evidence, and his honor instructed the jury not to consider statements contained in the letters of the plaintiff to the effect that the rejected yarn and other yarn had been shipped to different customers, and that no complaint had been made by them. Plaintiff contends this was evidence going to show the yarn to be of the character called for in the contract. These declarations, at most, were self-serving, and tended only to prove a negative. Hence their exclusion could not be held for reversible error. But this position was not insisted on at the time. Plaintiff accepted the yarn as shipped back, without objection, and credited the same on the defendant's account.

We have carefully examined the remaining exceptions, touching questions of evidence, and find them to be untenable.

[5] The plaintiff objected to the submission of the second issue to the jury, and contended that the court should have held, as a matter of law, that the shipment of 11,244 pounds of yarn, during the year 1915, was a substantial compliance with its contract. The original correspondence relative to defendant's requirements, which the plaintiff agreed to fill, used the words, "approximately 1,000 pounds monthly for the year 1915." But at a subsequent date, replying to an inquiry from the plaintiff, as to the amount, the defendant stated:

"We understood we were to have 1,000 pounds of yarn per month for a term of 12 months. Please acknowledge receipt of this letter, and state when we may expect the first shipment to start out."

Plaintiff answered on September 17, 1915, as follows:

"Replying to your favor of the 15th, we will begin shipping again next week."

Later, on December 21, 1915, plaintiff wrote the defendant:

"Some time in September you raised the question about our delivering the balance of your order, and in order to satisfy you that we would live up to our end of the agreement, we shipped you faster than the contract required, and as the order was not for 12,000 pounds, but for your requirements during the year 1915, approximately 1,000 pounds monthly, and under this contract if for the conduct of your business you had required 13,000 pounds we would have furnished same, but as 11,244 pounds, as per your statement, has met your requirements, we are relieved from further shipments under this contract."

Under this correspondence, we think his honor properly submitted the second issue to the jury, and that the answer was justified by the evidence.

No material benefit would be derived from considering all the exceptions and assignments of error in detail. A perusal of the charge given by the learned judge, who presided at the trial of this cause, shows that the case was tried with care and with due regard for the rights of the parties. There was no error in his refusal to give the plaintiff's first prayer for instruction—the second seems to have been given—and we do not think the exceptions to the charge, as given, can be sustained.

Upon the whole record, after a careful and painstaking investigation, we find no material or prejudicial error. The controversy was largely one of fact, tried before a jury of plaintiff's own county and agreeable to its selection. We have found no sufficient reason for disturbing the verdict and judgment.

No error.

(181 N. C. 27)

FOUNTAIN v. JONES. (No. 60.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. March 2, 1921.)

1. Sales \S 168½(10)—Buyer under contract for sale and return liable unless he returns within time.

A contract for the purchase of a mare, which gave the buyer the privilege of returning her to the seller within seven days if she was not satisfactory, was a contract for sale and return under which a title passed to buyer subject to the right of return, and if he failed to exercise that right within the time specified, the sale became absolute, and the purchase price could be recovered.

2. Sales \S 181(1)—Burden is on buyer to prove return within time fixed.

Where defendant admitted the execution of a note for the purchase price of a mare which contained a provision authorizing the return of the mare within seven days if not satisfactory, the burden was on him to prove return of the mare within the time fixed to avoid liability on the note, so that it was error to charge that the burden was on plaintiff in such a case to show that defendant was indebted to him.

3. Trial \S 253(10)—Instruction held to ignore evidence of agreement for further trial of mare sold.

In an action on a note for the purchase price of a mare which gave defendant a right to return within seven days if unsatisfactory, where there was evidence that defendant did return the mare, but thereafter agreed to take her for further trial, an instruction to find defendant was not indebted to plaintiff unless they found that he did not return the mare within seven days was erroneous, as ignoring the evidence concerning further trial.

4. Sales \S 168½(8)—Buyer, after waiving right to return, cannot retain indefinitely without liability.

Where a buyer waived his right to return the mare by agreeing to take her for further trial, after returning her within the contract time, and after a second attempt to return, agreed to a further trial, he could not thereafter retain possession of the mare for six months without further offer to return, and then deny liability on the note.

Appeal from Superior Court, Edgecombe County; Cranmer, Judge.

Action by L. E. Fountain against Calvin Jones. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. New trial.

This is an action to recover a mare and the balance due on a note. The defendant executed to the plaintiff a note for $250, which sum represented the purchase price of the mare. The note was dated March 29, 1918, and by its terms the plaintiff retained title to the mare to secure the purchase price. There was also written into the note the provision that the mare "must work O. K., if not (defendant) can return her in a week's time, seven days from date." The note matured on November 1, 1918. Defendant did not pay the note or any part of the same at maturity. Plaintiff duly demanded payment of the note, and upon defendant's failure to pay instituted this action of claim and delivery, asking that he be declared entitled to the immediate possession of the mare for the purpose of selling her according to law and applying the net proceeds of sale on the note. He also asked for judgment against defendant for balance of note, after crediting on same the net proceeds from the sale.

Defendant admitted the execution of the note, and also admitted that he had not paid same, but claimed that he returned the mare within the 7 days provided for in the note; that plaintiff persuaded him to try her again, and that after a 16 days' trial he again returned the mare, and was again persuaded by plaintiff to try her further; that he again took the horse home and tried her, and found her unsatisfactory, but that he never saw plaintiff again, and was in possession of her when this action was started.

The first issue, addressed to the question as to whether plaintiff was the owner and entitled to the immediate possession of the mare, by virtue of the note retaining title, was answered in plaintiff's favor by consent. The jury returned the following verdict:

"(1) Is the plaintiff the owner of and entitled to the immediate possession of the horse in controversy? Answer: Yes.

"(2) What amount, if any, is the defendant indebted to the plaintiff? Answer: Nothing.

"(3) In what sum, if any, is the plaintiff indebted to the defendant on his counterclaim? Answer: Nothing."

His honor charged the jury on the second issue as follows, to which the plaintiff excepted:

"I charge you that as to the second issue, the burden rests upon the plaintiff to satisfy you by the preponderance, that is the greater weight of the evidence, that he is entitled to have same answered in his favor. Now, if you find by the greater weight of the evidence that the defendant did not return the horse within 7 days from the date of the note, then I charge you that it would be your duty to answer the second issue in such sum as you may find to be due. But if you do not so find, then you should answer the issue nothing."

There was a judgment in favor of the defendant, and plaintiff appealed.

G. M. T. Fountain & Son, of Tarboro, for appellant.

ALLEN, J. [1] The contract, covered by the note offered in evidence, is called in the law books a "contract for sale and return," and under its terms the title to the mare passed to the defendant, subject to the right of return within the time fixed, and to demand the cancellation of the note, and if he failed to exercise this right the sale became absolute, and the purchase price could be recovered.

As said in 35 Cyc. 237, and approved in Manufacturing Co. v. Lumber Co., 159 N. C. 510, 75 S. E. 719:

"Where the contract provides for a return of the goods if not satisfactory, the buyer cannot relieve himself from liability for the price, unless he returns or offers to return them, and the offer to return must be unconditional."

[2] It follows, therefore, as the defendant admitted the execution of the note, and as it was incumbent on him to prove a return of the horse within 7 days in order that he might be relieved from responsibility, it was error to place the burden of proof on the plaintiff on the second issue, and to require him to prove the negative—that the defendant did not return the horse within 7 days—before the issue could be answered in his favor.

[3] It was also erroneous to instruct the jury to answer the issue "nothing," unless they found that the defendant did not return the horse within 7 days, because this ignores the evidence to the effect that, although an offer to return was made, the defendant agreed to give the horse another trial, and again, after 16 days and complaint made, concluded to try the horse further, and thereafter made no further objection and no further effort to return the horse.

[4] If the defendant offered to return the horse within 7 days, and was persuaded to make another trial of the horse, this would be a waiver of the stipulation for the return within 7 days, and if after 16 days he again offered to return the horse, and it was agreed that there should be a further trial, this would prevent the plaintiff from objecting that the second offer of return was not within a reasonable time, but the defendant could not thereafter keep and use the horse for a period of six months without further tender of return, if there was reasonable opportunity to do so, and then avoid liability on the note, under the stipulation in the note, giving the right to return the horse if not satisfactory.

There must be a new trial because of error in the charge.

New trial.

HIGHWAY COMMISSION OF HALIFAX COUNTY v. VARNER et al.
(No. 112.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. March 2, 1921.)

1. Convicts \Leftrightarrow 8—Commission act held to repeal act for use of convicts on highways.

Pub. Loc. Laws 1919, c. 534, creating the highway commission of a certain county, section 22 of which repealed all special or local laws relating to the highways of that county or any township therein, repealed Pub. Laws 1913 (Ex. Sess.) c. 65, as amended by Pub. Laws 1915, c. 52, requiring the directors of the state prison to furnish convicts and teams for the improvement of a road in a township of that county.

2. Statutes \Leftrightarrow 190—Unambiguous statute not open to construction.

There is no ground for construction when the language of the statute is unambiguous and the intent is plain.

Appeal from Superior Court, Halifax County; Kerr, Judge.

Mandamus by the Highway Commissioner of Halifax County against H. B. Varner and others, Directors of the State Prison. Judgment for the plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed, and action dismissed.

The object of the action is to compel the defendants to comply with the following provisions of Public Laws of 1913 (Ex. Sess.) c. 65, as amended by Public Laws of 1915, c. 52; the amended law being as follows:

"Section 1. That the directors of the state's prison be and they are hereby authorized and directed to repair and construct by use of convicts of the state's prison a public highway in Halifax township, Halifax county, leading from the town of Halifax to Connoconnara Swamp in the direction of the state farm, the same being the public road leading from said town to the state farm.

"Sec. 2. That this work shall be done in accordance with and under the direction of the highway commission of Halifax township: Provided, that the time for the use of the convicts under this act shall be in the discretion of the superintendent of the state's prison, and their use shall not conflict nor interfere with the general work of the state farm."

The following provision was added to section 2 by chapter 52, Public Laws of 1915:

"That this work shall be done in accordance with and under the direction of the highway commission of Halifax township, and said directors of the state's prison shall place on said road not later than August first, nineteen hundred and fifteen, a force of convicts not less than thirty in number, with suitable teams, and so forth, not less than forty mules, with wagons and tools, and keep the same there until said work is completed: Provided, that the directors of the state's prison may not be required to build a more expensive type of road than the roads built under the bond issue by the highway commission of said township."

By Public Local Laws of 1919, c. 534, the general supervision and authority over public highways and road and bridge construction, improvement, and maintenance, were withdrawn from the townships and given to the county, acting through and by the "highway commission of Halifax county," which body is created by that act. Section 22 of that act provides as follows:

"All special or local laws relating to the construction, improvement or maintenance of public roads or bridges of Halifax county or of any township therein, including special or local laws authorizing the raising of money for said purposes, are hereby repealed. All laws and parts of laws in conflict with this act are also repealed. Nothing in this act, however, shall be held to invalidate any indebtedness incurred under any law hereby repealed, or to invalidate any act done under such a law, or to prevent the collection of any taxes levied under such law."

The court, upon the pleadings and statutes, rendered judgment for the plaintiff, and defendants appealed.

James S. Manning, Atty. Gen., and Frank Nash, Asst. Atty. Gen., for appellants.

Geo. C. Green, of Weldon, for appellee.

WALKER, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] The question on which the decision of this case turns is whether the act of 1919 repealed the acts of 1913 and 1915, so as to destroy the plaintiff's cause of action. We are of the opinion that they did plainly and expressly, or at least with sufficient certainty to show that it was the intention of the Legislature to do so. If the Legislature had simply created the "highway commission of Halifax county," without more, the contention of the plaintiff would have some plausibility and would impress us more favorably, but the language of the act of 1919 is so clear, explicit, and comprehensive that we can give it but the one meaning, and therefore it requires no construction. We interpret it as it is written, and as its manifest meaning and intention are disclosed by its words.

[2] It is familiar learning that there is no ground for construction when the language of a statute is unambiguous and the intent is plain. Black on Interpretation of Statutes, pp. 35 and 36; Whitford v. Insurance Co., 163 N. C. 223, 79 S. E. 501, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 270; State v. Barco, 150 N. C. 792, 63 S. E. 673; Pugh v. Grant, 86 N. C. 40; U. S. v. Fisher, 2 Cranch, 353, 2 L. Ed. 304; Dewey v. U. S., 178 U. S. 510, 20 Sup. Ct. 981, 44 L. Ed. 1170; Endlich, Inter. Statutes, § 4. The rule has been clearly stated by the courts in various forms but they all are substantially expressed in this formula, that where the meaning of a statute is plain it is the duty of the courts to enforce it according to its obvious terms, which excludes the necessity for construction. Thornley v. U. S., 113 U. S. 310, 5 Sup. Ct. 491, 28 L. Ed. 999; Doe ex dem. Poor v. Considine, 6 Wall. 458, 18 L. Ed. 869; Hamilton v. Rathbone, 175 U. S. 419, 20 Sup. Ct. 155, 44 L. Ed. 219.

The act of 1913 is not a general law, that is, one having general application, but is "local," and undoubtedly "special" in its nature, and therefore necessarily embraced by the language of the repealing clause of the act of 1919 (section 22). We were not informed of any other general, special, or local act relating to this subject, and the act of 1919 as clearly indicates what law was intended to be repealed as if it had referred to it by the year of its enactment and the chapter of the laws of that year where it would be found. But the other provisions of the act of 1919, especially those of sections 8 and 9, lead us to the same conclusion. The language of those sections is so broad in its scope as to show without any doubt that the Legislature intended to abolish all authority of townships over the construction and maintenance of roads and bridges, as well as their repair and reconstruction, and to vest the entire authority with respect thereto in the county, acting through its own highway commission created by the act of 1919. The language of section 8, upon which plaintiff relies for the position that it was not intended to repeal the act of 1913, as originally framed or as amended, takes away all of the power and jurisdiction (so to speak) of the township highway commission over roads and lodges it, "absolutely and entirely," in the county highway commission. As the act of 1919 repealed altogether, and without any reservation, the law of 1913, it not only completely changed the law as to the control of roads of the township, but relieved the defendants from the duty imposed upon them by the act of 1913, concerning the repair and reconstruction of the particular road mentioned in that act. It follows from these considerations that plaintiff's cause of action, if it had any theretofore, has been lost. There is nothing said in the act of 1919 about repairing the roads of Halifax township, except as that township is embraced by the general terms of the act. It is not named, by itself, in the act.

The other question, as to the right of the plaintiff to bring this action for a mandamus against the defendants as agents or officers of the state need not be discussed, in view of the conclusion we have reached.

After the full discussion given to this question, it will be unnecessary to consider the evident reasons for this change in legislation concerning the repair of this road leading from the town of Halifax to the former state farm. If the county or township feels that the state in some way should compensate it for damage done to this road, on proper application to the Legislature it may get adequate relief, as the state is presumed always to be just and to perform its moral obligations. It may be moved though to deny relief in this particular case, as plaintiff has been guilty of laches, and conditions and circumstances have recently been so materially changed as to greatly increase the difficulty of doing the work, or some other equity in its favor may exist which would justify its refusal.

The case having been heard upon complaint and answer alone, it will be certified to the court below that there was error. The judgment will be reversed and the action dismissed.

Reversed.

ELLIS et al. v. BARNES et al. (No. 58.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. March 2, 1921.)

Deeds 6776—Undue influence in obtaining deed held for jury.

In a proceeding to partition lands by persons claiming as tenants in common as heirs, whether defendants obtained deeds from ancestor by undue influence held for the jury.

Appeal from Superior Court, Wilson County; Cranmer, Judge.

Action by Morris M. Ellis and others against James Barnes and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. No error.

This is a proceeding to sell 100 acres of land for partition, the petitioners claiming that they are tenants in common with the defendants as the heirs of Martha Barnes.

The defendants set up two deeds and a lease from the said Martha Barnes under which they claim to be the owners of 70 acres of said land.

The plaintiffs reply that the said Martha Barnes did not have sufficient mental capacity to execute the deeds and lease, and also that they were procured by fraud and undue influence.

The jury returned the following verdict:

"(1) Are the deeds from Martha Barnes to John R. Barnes and John A. Mayo and wife void for the want of mental capacity on the part of Martha Barnes at the time of the execution thereof? Answer: No.

"(2) Is the lease from Martha Barnes to John A. Mayo void because of the want of mental capacity on the part of Martha Barnes at the time of the execution of such lease? Answer: No.

"(3) Did John A. Mayo and wife, Mattie Mayo, procure the deed from Martha Barnes by reason of fraud and undue influence over the said Martha Barnes? Answer: Yes.

"(4) Did John R. Barnes procure the deed from Martha Barnes by means of fraud and undue influence over the said Martha Barnes? Answer: Yes."

Judgment was entered upon the verdict in favor of the plaintiffs, and the defendants appealed, reserving the exception that there was no evidence to support the verdict on the third and fourth issues.

Connor, Hill & Little, of Wilson, for appellants.

O. P. Dickinson, of Wilson, for appellees.

PER CURIAM. We have carefully examined the record and are of opinion there were circumstances in evidence fit to be considered by the jury on the issues of undue influence.

The evidence of the petitioners tended to prove that Martha Barnes was old and feeble; that before execution of the deeds she had two strokes of paralysis and that her mind was much impaired; that she had eleven children, and that the deeds purported to pass seven-tenths of her property to a son-in-law and one child, and there was no reason for discriminating between the children; that the deeds and lease were without consideration; that the first deed was to the son-in-law and she was then living with him; that before the execution of this deed the son-in-law had two doctors to examine her for the purpose of seeing if she had sufficient mind to make a deed; that he employed an attorney to prepare the deed and paid his fee; that he went to Elm City to get witnesses for the execution of the deed because, as he said, "he wanted a good element"; that he had four witnesses to the deed "to show that she was in good fix"; that he said nothing to any one about the execution of the deed prior to its execution; and that he then told John R. Barnes, a son, and soon thereafter the other deed was executed under similar circumstances.

These circumstances considered separately would not be sufficient to justify setting aside the deeds, but when considered together ought to have been submitted to the jury.

No error.

FREDERICK et al. v. BROWN et al.
(No. 10575.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Feb. 28, 1921.)

Appeal and error \S 954(2)—Discretion in refusing to grant injunction pendente lite not reviewed.

Where appellants failed to satisfy the Supreme Court that a county judge erroneously exercised his discretion in refusing to grant an injunction pendente lite, the appeal will be dismissed.

Appeal from Common Pleas County Court of Richland County; M. S. Whaley, Judge.

Action by N. J. Frederick and another against T. W. Brown, Grand Chief, and others, as officers of the Independent Order of Good Samaritans and Daughters of Samaria. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Appeal dismissed.

Butler W. Nance and N. J. Frederick, both of Columbia, for appellants.

Melton & Belser and E. L. Craig, all of Columbia, for respondents.

GARY, C. J. This is an action for the sole purpose of an injunction. The facts are stated in the order of his honor the county judge, who refused the application for a temporary injunction; and the plaintiffs appealed. They have failed to satisfy this court that his honor the county judge erroneously exercised his discretion in refusing to grant the injunction pendente lite.

Appeal dismissed.

MILLER v. GOODWIN. (No. 10577.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Feb. 10, 1921.)

Appeal and error \S 1194(1)—Judgment properly rendered against appellant failing to comply with conditions of mandate.

Where the Supreme Court on appeal had declared a deed void on condition defendants pay a judgment and costs within 20 days, but otherwise confirmed the sale, defendant could have given notice and taxed all costs, or he could have made his own calculation of costs and tendered the correct amount as provided for in the judgment of the court, but, if he failed to comply with the condition, judgment was properly rendered against him.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Richland County; Edward McIven, Judge.

Action by E. McKay Miller against George Goodwin. From a judgment finding that defendant had failed to comply with the terms of the decision of the Supreme Court on a prior appeal, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

B. B. Evans, of Columbia, for appellant.

Hunter A. Gibbes, of Columbia, for respondent.

WATTS, J. This is the third appeal in this case. 111 S. C. 333, 98 S. E. 129; 113 S. C. 365, 101 S. E. 834. It is from an order of his honor Judge McIver, wherein he finds:

"That the defendant has failed to comply with the terms of the order of the Supreme Court within the time specified."

The time specified by this court in the second appeal, was:

"The judgment of this court is that, if the appellants, within 30 days after remittitur of this court is received in the circuit court, shall pay to the master for Richland county the judgment fixed by the decree of Judge Townsend, in full and all interest thereon, up to the day of payment, as fixed by this judgment, that is, when the remittitur of this court, and all costs due thereon up to the time of sale intended to be made in March 1919, then the deed executed to the respondents be set aside and declared to be null and void, and the order appealed from reversed, otherwise the order appealed from confirmed, however, with no costs of this appeal."

This remittitur was received in circuit court February 5, 1920. Exceptions three in number allege error, and are overruled.

His honor's finding was correct. Defendant could have given notice and taxed all costs. He could have made his own calculation and tendered correct amount, as provided for in the judgment of this court. Having failed to comply with the mandate of this court, his honor was correct in his holding, and judgment is affirmed.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Feb. 28, 1921.)

Attachment \S 125—Insufficiency of affidavit waived by reliance on objection that claim not just.

Insufficiency of affidavit for attachment was waived by defendant serving sheriff with notice and affidavit that the amount claimed by the plaintiff was not justly due.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Sumter County; Edward McIver, Judge.

Action by F. A. Reames against T. D. Lawrence. From an order refusing to vacate attachment defendant appeals. Order affirmed.

John H. Clifton, of Sumter, for appellant. Jennings & Harby, of Sumter, for respondent.

FRASER, J. The appellant states his case as follows:

"The above action was commenced by the issuance of a summons and a warrant of attachment. Defendant gave notice of a motion to vacate, upon the ground that the attachment had been irregularly and improvidently issued, in that the affidavit, being upon information and belief only, did not state the sources of the information nor any circumstances upon which the attachment was issued. This motion was noticed to be heard first before the clerk of court of common pleas for Sumter county, and also was noticed to be heard before his honor, Judge W. H. Townsend. Neither of these two motions was ever heard, but the motion to vacate was taken up before Judge McIver at the fall term, 1919, of the court of common pleas for Sumter county. Before the service of any motion to vacate, the defendant had served a notice and affidavit upon the belief that the amount claimed by the plaintiff was unjustly due. At a hearing before Judge McIver, when the case was called for trial, but before the trial was commenced, the motion to vacate was argued. Counsel for the plaintiff conceded that the affidavit upon which the attachment had been issued was defective, and not sufficient to support the attachment, but contended that, inasmuch as the defendant had served the sheriff with notice and affidavit that the amount claimed by the plaintiff was not justly due, defendant had waived any defect in the attachment papers. The appellant respectfully contends that his honor was in error in refusing to vacate the attachment, because it was admitted upon the argument that the affidavit was defective and insufficient; nor can it be said that the defendant was compelled by any rule of law to move to vacate before filing the notice with the sheriff that the amount claimed was not justly due."

No summons was issued. The crop was seized under a warrant to seize the crop. The motion was refused. The case of Johnstone v. Manigault, 13 S. C. at page 408, fully sustains his honor, and the order appealed from is affirmed.

STATE v. SWEET. (No. 10571.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Feb. 28, 1921.)

Criminal law \S 1156(3)—Case not reversed in absence of abuse in denying new trial for new cumulative evidence.

In the absence of a showing that the presiding judge erroneously exercised his discretion in refusing to grant a new trial, the case will not be reversed for newly discovered cumulative evidence after conviction for manslaughter.

Appeal from General Sessions Circuit Court of Orangeburg County; I. W. Bowman, Judge.

George Sweet was convicted of manslaughter, and from an order refusing a motion for a new trial, he appeals. Appeal dismissed.

Brantley & Zeigler, of Orangeburg, for appellant.

E. O. Mann, Sol., of Orangeburg, for the State.

GARY, C. J. The defendant was indicted for murder, but the jury found him guilty of manslaughter.

The appeal is from an order refusing a motion for a new trial, on the ground of after-discovered evidence.

The only testimony upon which the motion was made was the affidavit of Thomas F. Brantley, Esq., one of the defendant's attorneys, which was to the following effect:

"That Axon, one of the witnesses in the case of the State v. Sweet, which was tried this 15th day of May, told him after the trial to-day that when he met George Sweet with Mr. Frank De Mars, and after he and Mr. De Mars carried George Sweet back to his home, where the shooting took place, that George Sweet told him in the presence of Mr. Frank De Mars that he had ordered Robert Wallace out of his house and that he had come back with a knife in his hand, and when he came at him with the knife he shot him, and that the [using oath] had reported him for selling whisky; that this deponent is one of the attorneys for the defendant and did not know of this testimony in time to get it out, so as to get the whole truth of Sweet's statement to Mr. Axon."

This testimony was merely cumulative; the defendant and his wife both having testified that the deceased had a knife in his hand at the time he was shot.

Furthermore, the defendant has failed to make it appear that his honor the presiding judge erroneously exercised his discretion in refusing the motion.

Appeal dismissed.

McQUEEN v. SOVEREIGN CAMP, W. O. W.
(No. 10574.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Feb. 23, 1921.)

Insurance §515—Provision for additional premium on being "enlisted" for military service includes drafted men.

The provision of a life insurance policy reducing the amount of recovery in case of insured's death outside the United States while in military service as an enlisted man, unless insurer was notified of such enlistment and an additional premium paid, means, by the word "enlisted," one enrolling in the service, whether he volunteered or was drafted, and where such a one failed to comply and died in service his beneficiary cannot recover the full amount of the policy.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Enlist—Enlistment.]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Dillon County; Edward McIver, Judge.

Action by Neill E. McQueen against the Sovereign Camp, Woodmen of the World. Judgment for plaintiff, and the defendant appeals. Reversed.

The provision of the certificate of insurance referred to in the opinion follows:

"(5) In the event the holder of this certificate shall die while serving in any branch of the United States Army or Navy, either as an officer or enlisted man, outside the boundaries of the United States of America, then the amount due under this certificate shall be such proportion of the amount thereof as the period he has lived since becoming a member bears to his expectancy of life at the time of becoming such member, determined by the National Fraternal Congress Table of Mortality. Provided, that should the holder of this certificate so desire, he may within thirty (30) days after entering the service in any branch of the United States Army or Navy, as an officer or enlisted man, notify the sovereign clerk at the home office of the society, Omaha, Nebraska, United States of America, that he has entered such service of the United States of America and pay in advance to the sovereign clerk, for the society, the sum of thirty-seven and ⁵⁰/₁₀₀ ($37.50) dollars, per one thousand dollars insurance per annum in addition to the regular assessment prescribed by section 56 of the Constitution and laws of the Woodmen of the World, and upon so doing at the death of the member or as soon thereafter as possible, the amount prescribed in this certificate shall be paid to his beneficiary or beneficiaries."

Gibson & Muller, of Dillon, for appellant.
Joe P. Lane, of Dillon, for respondent.

FRASER, J. There is only one question in this case. Lonnie McQueen took out a policy of insurance with the Sovereign Camp Woodmen of the World. This policy required the insured to notify the company if he enlisted in the army or navy in time of war, for service outside of the United States, and to pay an additional premium. Mr. McQueen was drafted and died in France. He neither notified the company nor paid the extra premium. Judgment was given for the plaintiff, the beneficiary, on the ground that the deceased was not an enlisted man, but a drafted man, and was not required by the terms of the policy to give the notice or pay the extra premium. The defendant offered to return the premium.

The question is: Was Lonnie McQueen an enlisted man within the terms of the policy? The increased danger of the insured as a soldier is fully recognized by the policy in the requirement of an extra premium. That danger was recognized as increased by service outside of the United States, and this is true, whether his enlistment was voluntary or enforced. The difference is technical and not a matter of substance. The technical objections even cannot be sustained.

Century Dictionary:

"Enlist: 1. To enter, as a name on a list; enroll, register. 2. To engage for public service, especially military or naval service, by enrolling after mutual agreement, as to enlist men for the army."

Webster:

"To enroll; to register; to enter a name on a list. 2. To engage in public service, by entering the name on a register, as an officer enlists men."

Bouvier:

"Enlistment: The act of making a contract to serve the government in a subordinate capacity, either in the army or navy."

It is thus seen that there is high authority for holding that, when a man enters his name on a list of the army or navy, he is an enlisted man, whether he volunteered or was drafted. The service outside of the United States is recognized by the policy as requiring a higher premium. The plain English of the policy makes no distinction and there is none.

The exception that raises this question is sustained, and the judgment is reversed.

GARY, C. J., and WATTS and COTHRAN, JJ., concur.

COTHRAN, J. I concur upon the additional ground that the provision in the certificate relating to "officers and enlisted men" should be interpreted in the common acceptance of those words as referring to commissioned officers and all soldiers below that rank, whether voluntarily enlisted or enlisted (which necessarily occurs) under the Draft Act (U. S. Comp. St. 1918, U. S. Comp. St. Ann. Supp. 1919, §§ 2044a-2044k). This interpretation conforms to Articles of War 1, 2 (U. S. Comp. St. § 2308a); U. S. Army Regulations April, 1917; Draft Act, article or section 1, paragraphs 3, 7, sections 2, 10, 12; Barnes' Federal Code, § 10221 (U. S. Comp. St. 1918; U. S. Comp. St. Ann. Supp. 1919, § 2044a) and has the support of Hilliard v. Stewarts, 48 N. H. 280, and Miller v. Illinois Co., 138 Ark. 442, 212 S. W. 310, 7 A. L. R. 378.

SCHEPER et al. v. SCHEPER et al.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Feb. 28, 1921.)

I. Pleading ⇨192(5)—Unnecessary averment does not render complaint demurrable.

A part of an executor's complaint for partition and sale of an estate suggesting a possible contest between the daughter and the husband of a deceased heir was entirely proper, but legally gratuitous, and a demurrer thereto should not have been entertained.

2. Pleading ⇨204(7)—Demurrer will not lie to a part of cause of action.

In view of Code Civ. Proc. 1902, § 166, providing that a demurrer may be taken to the whole complaint or to any alleged cause of action therein, but not providing that a demurrer may be interposed to a part of a cause of action, a demurrer to a part of executor's complaint for partition and sale which suggests a contest between heirs should have been overruled.

3. Pleading ⇨198—Defendants' demurrer affecting codefendant should be overruled where not served on codefendant.

Where a demurrer to a complaint by one of defendants is interposed to a part involving the rights of a codefendant not shown to have been a party to the demurrer or to have had any knowledge of it, the demurrer should have been overruled.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Beaufort County; T. J. Mauldin, Judge.

Action by F. W. Scheper, individually and as executor of the will of F. W. Scheper, deceased, and others, against Lee Marscher Scheper and others. From an order sustaining a demurrer to a part of the complaint interposed by the defendant W. R. Tindall, the plaintiffs and the defendants other than W. R. Tindall appeal. Order appealed from reversed and cause remanded for trial.

Talbird & Jenkins, of Beaufort, for appellants.

W. J. Thomas, of Beaufort, and Erwin, Erwin & Nix, of Athens, Ga., for respondents.

COTHRAN, J. This is an action instituted in the court of common pleas for Beaufort county in February, 1920, for the partition and sale of the estate of F. W. Scheper, deceased. The appeal is from an order sustaining a demurrer to a part of the complaint, interposed by one of the defendants, W. R. Tindall.

The facts alleged in the complaint, which support the claim of the plaintiffs for partition, are as follows:

F. W. Scheper, Sr., a resident of Beaufort, died there in 1913, possessed of real and personal property; he left a will by which he devised and bequeathed his entire estate to his six children, all of whom survived him; one of his daughters, Minnie S. Tindall, died the same year, leaving as her heirs at law an only child, Edna, now about 20 years of age, and possibly the defendant W. R. Tindall, to whom she had been married; Henry E. Scheper, a son of the testator, died in 1917, leaving a widow and several children, minors.

In addition to these facts establishing the right to partition, which does not appear to be contested, the plaintiffs allege in their complaint certain other facts which are intended to exclude W. R. Tindall from participation in the partition as an heir at law of his deceased wife, Minnie S. Tindall. It is either alleged or admitted in the arguments that many years ago Minnie S. Tindall was married to the defendant W. R. Tindall in Beaufort; that they removed to North Carolina and took up their residence there; that in 1910 Mrs. Tindall secured a divorce a mensa et thoro, under the laws of North Carolina, from her husband; that she returned to Beaufort and made her home with her father, where she lived until her death; that W. R. Tindall removed from North Carolina to Georgia and there married another woman while the first Mrs. Tindall was living; that he has deserted her and failed to respond to the decree for alimony rendered when the divorce was granted.

They also allege that after the death of Mrs. Tindall, which occurred on November 14, 1913, there was found an envelope addressed, "For Addie, to be opened right after my death"; that the envelope contained a paper writing signed by Mrs. Tindall dated November 7, 1913, and (quoting from the complaint) that "In that paper she gave all of her property, with the exception of some articles of wearing apparel, to her daughter Edna."

The plaintiffs therefore insisted that the defendant W. R. Tindall should be excluded from participation in the partition as an heir at law of his deceased wife upon the grounds above indicated: (1) That the paper writing referred to constituted a legal transfer of all of her interest in her father's estate to her daughter Edna; (2) that the divorce obtained by Mrs. Tindall in North Carolina excluded him from such participation; and (3) that by his conduct in failing to respond to the decree for alimony, in moving to Georgia, marrying again, and deserting his first wife, he is estopped from claiming any share in her estate.

The defendant W. R. Tindall interposed a demurrer to that part of the complaint which sought to exclude him from such participation for the reasons stated, upon the ground "that the complaint shows upon its face that it does not state a cause of action," in that it shows that he was the husband of Mrs. Tindall and that she died intestate seized of one-sixth interest in her father's estate.

The demurrer was argued before Judge Mauldin, who filed a decree sustaining it, holding that the writing was neither a will nor a deed and that W. R. Tindall was not barred by the North Carolina divorce from claiming an interest in the estate of his deceased wife; he did not pass upon the question of estoppel indicated as (3) above.

From this decree the plaintiffs and the defendants Edna Tindall and W. F. Marscher, executor, have appealed.

[1] The allegations of the complaint, to which W. R. Tindall has demurred, intended to exclude him from participation, are in no sense essential to the plaintiffs' cause of action for partition, but relate to the subsidiary, administrative question of the distribution of Mrs. Tindall's interest, and simply amount to the suggestion of an issue between W. R. Tindall and his daughter who alone are interested in it. If that issue should arise and the claim be sustained, Edna will receive the entire interest of her mother; if not, W. R. Tindall will receive one-third and she two-thirds. So that in neither event is the executor or the individual plaintiffs interested in the contest thus suggested. It was entirely proper that the executor, desiring a complete determination of the rights of all the parties and a final distribution and settlement of the estate, should suggest this possible contest, particularly as one of the parties interested was the infant daughter of his sister, so closely allied to her in blood, affection, and a common sorrow; but in a legal sense neither he nor the other individual plaintiffs had any concern in the contest.

The demurrer was directed therefore to a part only of the complaint, and to a part which was entirely proper but legally gratuitous, and should not have been entertained.

[2] Even conceding that the allegations of the complaint affecting the interest of W. R. Tindall were essential elements in the plaintiffs' cause of action (the contrary of which we hold), the demurrer should have been overruled.

"Section 186 [195] of the Code provides that the demurrer may be taken to the whole complaint or to any of the alleged causes of action stated therein; but it is nowhere provided that a demurrer may be interposed to a part of a cause of action." Buist v. Salvo, 44 S. C. 144, 21 S. E. 615, followed in Lawson v. Gee, 57 S. C. 502, 35 S. E. 759; Sloan v. R. Co., 64 S. C. 389, 42 S. E. 197; Miles v. Light Co., 87 S. C. 257, 69 S. E. 292.

[3] Another consideration is controlling: The demurrer is interposed to a part of the complaint by one of the defendants; its determination involves very materially the rights of a codefendant; while the codefendant was a party to the suit, there is nothing to show that she was a party to the demurrer or had any knowledge of it; it does not appear to have been served upon her or her attorneys. If the order sustaining the demurrer should be affirmed by this court, it would be a determination of the contest between these two defendants, affecting to the extent of one-third the interest of one of them, upon a demurrer to the complaint and not to any pleading of such codefendant.

This disposition of the appeal renders it improper for the court to consider the other questions in the case. The effect of the posthumous writing, the effect of the North Carolina divorce, and the alleged estoppel.

The judgment of this court is that the order appealed from be reversed and that the cause be remanded for trial without prejudice to the rights of either W. R. Tindall or Edna Tindall in the issue between them as to the participation by W. R. Tindall in the proposed partition.

MOORE v. HUGHES. (No. 4005.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Feb. 15, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Habeas corpus \S 85(1)—Burden of proof resting on mother in father's proceedings to determine custody of child stated.

The mother of a child, having it in her possession by permission of the father to whom its permanent custody had been awarded by the decree of a court of competent jurisdiction which also dissolved the marriage of the parties, in order to make good her defense to a writ of habeas corpus sued out by the father, for vindication of his natural and adjudged right of custody, must either establish a relinquishment of such right in her favor, by agreement, or new and altered conditions of the parties making a change of permanent custody promotive of the interests of the child; and, as to both issues, the burden of proof rests upon her.

2. Habeas corpus \S 113(12)—Finding on conflicting evidence will not be disturbed.

If, upon the first one of such issues, the documentary evidence relied upon by the respondent and the conduct of the parties were inconclusive and the oral evidence directly conflicting and contradictory, the finding of the trial court thereon in favor of the father will not be disturbed by the appellate court.

3. Habeas corpus \S 113(12)—Finding relative to custody of child not disturbed unless contrary to weight of evidence.

Nor will a like finding upon the second one of such issues be so disturbed, unless it is contrary to the weight and preponderance of the evidence as to the material facts in issue, with respect to which the child's interests are to be considered and determined.

4. Habeas corpus \S 113(12)—Findings within court's discretion as to custody of a child between divorced parents will not be disturbed.

The trial court's exercise of its sound and reasonable discretion, within the limitations of law, in the award of the custody of a child, as between its divorced parents, will not be disturbed by the appellate court.

Error to Circuit Court, Cabell County.

Habeas corpus by Earl Moore against Delcie Hughes, to obtain the custody of a female child. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

D. B. Daugherty, of Huntington, for plaintiff in error.

Williams, Lewis & Coffey, of Benton, Ill., for defendant in error.

POFFENBARGER, J. The judgment in habeas corpus, complained of on this writ of error, awarded the custody of a female child to its father. The principal grounds of defense set up by the respondent to the writ, the child's mother, were complete relinquishment to her of the father's right of custody, by agreement, and promotion of the child's interest by the custody of the mother.

By the decree of a court of the state of Illinois, pronounced in May, 1915, the father obtained a divorce from the mother, on the ground of adultery, and right of custody of the child. At that time, he resided in said state, with his mother, who has since died. A widowed sister having children and grandchildren now keeps house for him. There seems to be no doubt of his financial ability to give the child proper care, nor of his personal integrity. At the time of the taking of his testimony, he had an income of $160 per month from his services. He has several sisters, any one of whom, he says, is willing to keep the child for him. One of his letters to his former wife indicates his possession of some money and ownership of some land in the state of Missouri.

The alleged agreement, if any, by which he parted with the right of custody given him by the decree above referred to was made on or about September 5, 1917. Having been drawn for military service, or intending enlistment therein, he permitted the respondent, who had married her alleged paramour, soon after the decree, to take the child into her care. He claims his relinquishment was only temporary. She claims, on the other hand, that it was absolute and permanent. Their testimony as to the character of the agreement is indirect and in absolute conflict. It was largely effected by correspondence that has not been preserved. Several letters, written by the father to the mother, while he was in military service, and one written after his discharge, have been produced. All of them manifest his deep and sincere interest in the child, but they are indefinite as regards its permanent custody and the character of the agreement under which its custody was changed, in view of the father's intended absence and the dangers he was then about to encounter. Some expressions found in them seem to imply expectation that the child's future would depend upon the mother's care of her; but they were written under circumstances calculated to create a grave doubt as to whether the writer would ever return, and these expressions may well be regarded as being hypothetical. He said he wanted the child educated, and indicated the amount of money and property that would be available for such purpose, as well as the means of obtaining it. In a letter written about four months after he entered the army, he said he had not felt right to keep the child away from its mother, nor to let the mother have its custody while he was so situated that he could keep it, and that his joining the army had afforded him an excuse to let the mother have it.

The attitudes of the parents toward one another, after the divorce, were not such as precluded all communication. While the child was with the father, the mother visited it several times. He says she had frequently asked for its possession and custody, and that, knowing her desire to have it, he wrote her to come and take charge of it, near the date of his departure for the army, but that he never intended to effect a permanent change of custody. She says he requested her by letter to come and take the child, saying he had enlisted, and that she hurriedly went to the home of his sister and got it. After his discharge in March, 1919, she, at his request, took the child with her on her way to see her mother, and left it for a visit with him, and brought it back on her return, and he repaid her part of the expense of the trip. In the only produced letter of his, written after his discharge, he made no demand for possession of the child, nor did he disclaim right to her possession, in himself. In it he resented something the mother had said about money for the child's support, and expressed his willingness to take her in the event of the mother's tiring of her care. He also declared his intention to do everything in his power for the child's education, at the proper time, which had not yet arrived.

Evidently, he was either undecided as to reassertion of his right of custody or anticipated opposition to such a course, after his discharge, for his conduct was hesitant and equivocal. When the mother took the child to him for a visit, he made no effort to retain it. After that incident, he visited the child at the mother's home, and requested permission to take her home with him for a visit. Later he came again, and endeavored to obtain possession of her. He says he demanded permanent possession of her, and, compliance with his demand having been refused, he obtained permission to take her to Huntington for a short visit. After his arrival at Huntington, he attempted to take her on to his home, but his effort to do so was frustrated by the mother's brother. Then he sued out the writ on which this judgment was rendered.

[1-3] The conflict in the oral evidence as to the character of the agreement under which the mother obtained the child has been passed upon by the trial court. Upon it, as well as the correspondence and circumstances disclosed, there has been a finding in favor of the father. As to that issue, the mother obviously carried the burden of proof, since the right of custody had previously been vested in the father by a decree of a court of competent jurisdiction. Nothing found in the evidence or facts and circumstances disclosed justifies disturbance of the finding against her. Read in the light of the situation of the parties at the time, and especially that of the husband, the letters produced are not conclusive of the issue, nor strongly probative of complete relinquishment of right of custody. In view of this conclusion, the issue turned mainly on the conflicting oral evidence, and the trial court had the aid and advantage of observation of the parties and their demeanor on the witness stand, which we do not have. The evidence casts no reproach upon the character of the father. The mother imputes no moral delinquency of any kind to him. She charges nothing more than that he had slapped her face, and, for all that appears in the case, he may have been gravely provoked to that act by her misconduct. She has been adjudged guilty of very grave misconduct before the severance of the marriage tie. These circumstances have important bearing upon the credibility of the parties as witnesses, an element lying peculiarly within the province of the trial court.

Failure of the effort to establish relinquishment of the father's natural right of custody, emphasized and reinforced by a judicial award thereof, places the further burden upon the mother to show sufficient cause for a transfer thereof to her, and, so far as we can see, she has shown none. The father's fitness and ability to give the child proper care and attention both stand unimpeached. His moral character is unblemished. Nothing is said against the character of his sister who keeps house for him. He is amply able to provide for the child's support and education. Even though the mother may be equally able to do so, the father has superior right in law. Hurley v. Hurley, 71 W. Va. 269, 76 S. E. 438; Green v. Campbell, 35 W. Va. 698, 14 S. E. 212, 29 Am. St. Rep. 843. Of course, the legal rule giving the father preference is not an inflexible one. It must yield to the welfare of the child as disclosed by all of the circumstances. Carlens v. Carlens, 50 W. Va. 113, 40 S. E. 335, 55 L. R. A. 930. Here, however, nothing appears in the circumstances that can be deemed to be sufficient ground for deviation from the general rule. Through her husband, the mother is able to support the child, but her husband is a contractor, and has no settled place of abode. This is not a controlling circumstance, of course, but it has bearing and weight upon the inquiry. The child needs female care and attention, but she will have that under the father's custody, and, presumptively, her residence will be fixed and permanent. The aunt with whom she will live is a woman of mature age and the mother of grown children, and nothing has been shown against her character or fitness. As much cannot be said for the mother. All of these considerations must be invoked in aid of the trial court's decision. Besides, the parties were before the judge of that court, and he was in a position to see whether the mother's demeanor was such as to indicate the fitness and stability of character she ought to have as custodian of the child.

[4] In respect of the custody of children, the trial courts have a measure of discretion, the exercise of which will not be disturbed by the appellate court, in the absence of a disclosure of a departure therein from soundness and reason or an abuse of sound discretion. Gates v. Gates, 105 S. E. 815, decided at this term; Williams v. Hicks, 149 Ga. 333, 100 S. E. 97.

Seeing no error in the judgment complained of, we will affirm it.

GIBBARD v. EVANS. (No. 4194.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Feb. 8, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. New trial §99—Characteristics of newly discovered evidence warranting new trial enumerated.

To justify granting a new trial for after discovered evidence, the party relying thereon must have been diligent before the verdict, the evidence must be material and not merely cumulative, and such as on a new trial ought to produce the opposite result, and is not proposed simply to discredit or impeach a witness on the opposite side.

2. Witnesses §389—Denial of witness that he had made inconsistent statements may be contradicted.

When a witness has testified to a material fact in issue, and on cross-examination is asked whether he had not on a former occasion and at the time of the occurrence to which his evidence relates, made a contrary statement to a particular person present, and he denies it, the evidence of such person is competent in rebuttal for the purpose of contradicting the witness and destroying the value of his testimony.

3. Evidence §129(3)—Evidence of actions or condition of a person on other occasions admissible.

Where the actions or condition of a person on other occasions are so recently connected in time and circumstance as to likely characterize his actions or condition on the particular occasion involved, evidence thereof may be properly admitted as tending to show what his conduct and condition then were.

4. Damages §96, 127—Recovery for personal injuries not limited by death statute; recovery for personal injuries generally for jury.

In actions for damages for personal injuries sustained, the statute imposes no limitation on the amount recoverable. Generally the amount is for the jury to determine, and the only limitation which the law imposes is that such damages be fairly compensatory, and not such as to show partiality, prejudice or misconduct on the part of the jury.

5. Damages §132(1)—$12,000 held not excessive for injuries to married woman in automobile accident.

The verdict of twelve thousand dollars in this case, in favor of plaintiff, a married woman forty years of age, who in an automobile accident was badly cut and scarred about the face and head, her ability to masticate her food permanently impaired, and her head and neck permanently drawn over, and was otherwise permanently injured, is not so excessive as to justify the granting of a new trial.

Error to Circuit Court, Cabell County.

Action by Myrtle Gibbard against Dorsey Evans. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Simms & Staker and Holt, Duncan & Holt, all of Huntington, for plaintiff in error.

Williams, Scott & Lovett and M. P. Wiswell, all of Huntington, for defendant in error.

MILLER, J. We are called upon by defendant to reverse the judgment below in favor of plaintiff for twelve thousand dollars, damages assessed by the jury for personal injuries sustained from the collision, on March 21, 1920, in the city of Huntington, of two automobiles, one owned and being driven by defendant, the other owned by plaintiff and her husband and being driven by the latter.

[1] The questions presented are not many, nor difficult to solve. The first is that defendant should have been granted a new trial on his motion based on newly discovered evidence. The evidence tendered was that of one William Sanson, embodied in his affidavit presented on the motion, the substance of which was that on the occasion of the wreck he was coming along the street and saw defendant Evans going east on Adams Avenue west of Johnson's Lane on the right hand side of the street; saw Gibbard, the driver of the other car, coming west on Adams Avenue just above Johnson's Lane, when he attempted to make a left hand turn going south on Johnson's Lane, and struck Evans; that from what he observed Evans was in no way to blame, and was sober and not drinking to his knowledge. It is conceded that to have warranted favorable action on said motion, such evidence must have been discovered since the trial; that defendant must have been diligent in his search for evidence before verdict; that the evidence was new and material, and not merely cumulative; that it was such that a new trial ought to produce the opposite result; and that its object was not simply to discredit or impeach a witness on the opposite side. Such is the law respecting newly discovered evidence, as recently reaffirmed in Phoenix Fire Insurance Co. v. Virginia-Western Power Co., 81 W. Va. 299, 94 S. E. 372.

Defendant's affidavit offered in connection with that of Sanson is that he discovered this evidence since the former trial, and that before the trial he had been diligent, but does the proposed testimony of Sanson in other respects answer the requirements of the law respecting new trials based thereon? There was no conflict in the evidence that just before the accident defendant was going east, and plaintiff and her husband were going west, the former west, and the latter east of Johnson's Lane. The rest of the proposed testimony related solely to the reaching of Johnson's Lane, and whether just before the impact Gibbard turned suddenly to the left and struck the Evans car midship as he was about to pass, or was in the act of stopping his car when Evans on the wrong side of the street drove his car into the plaintiff's car in a head-on collision doing the damage. A number of witnesses, including plaintiff and her husband, testified to the character of the collision and the place and direction in which the cars were moving and the result to each of the cars, not contradicted. On the question whether Gibbard suddenly turned to the left when near defendant's car, defendant offered his own testimony and that of his wife, and that question was before the jury on the trial. Sanson's evidence would only be cumulative of their evidence, and contradictory of the overwhelming evidence of the other witnesses, including some of those for defendant, and of the physical effects on the two cars, and would not likely have produced a different finding by the jury. So that if Sanson's evidence should be admitted it would be simply cumulative and contradictory, not justifying a new trial based thereon.

[2] The next question in logical order to be considered is whether the court allowed hearsay evidence to go to the jury over defendant's objections. This question involves certain testimony of Dr. C. O. Tate. When recalled by plaintiff in rebuttal, and after answering that he knew the witness O. A. Wilson previously examined by defendant, he was asked whether at the time and place of the accident Wilson had not said to him in substance that "Dorsey was drunk and making a fool of himself; see if you can not get him away from here." He answered that he did. On his examination in chief Wilson was asked as to the condition in which he found

Evans at the time of the accident. He said he found him in a nervous condition; and to the direct question whether he in his opinion was drunk, he answered that he did not think he was. This was material, because the mental and physical condition of Evans at the time was in issue as accounting for his conduct then and just before the accident; and on cross-examination Wilson was asked whether at the time and place of the accident he had not said to Dr. Tate: "Dorsey is drunk and making a fool of himself. See if you can not get him away from here." His answer was: "No, sir. I never made any such statement as that." The foundation was thus laid for impeaching his testimony by that of Dr. Tate, on the question brought out on direct examination, and as to which the jury were entitled to be enlightened. The object of this testimony was not to introduce original hearsay evidence, but was for the purpose of contradicting the witness for defendant on a fact to which defendant's witness had testified. Such testimony was competent, if not on the material fact, for the purpose of weakening or destroying the value of the witness' testimony. Jaggie v. Davis Colliery Co., 75 W. Va. 370, 84 S. E. 941; State v. Kock, 75 W. Va. 648, 84 S. E. 510.

Another point of error affects the evidence of plaintiff's witnesses Dr. D. L. Ash, C. F. Zimmerman and Fred L. Blume, which related to the condition of the defendant Evans on the same day, and within from twenty minutes to a half hour before the accident, and also bearing on the question whether he was drunk or sober when the accident occurred. Numerous other witnesses present testified to the fact of his drunkenness at the very time of the accident, and if all the testimony of these witnesses objected to had been eliminated, the jury could not have found otherwise than that Evans was then in a state of intoxication.

[3] The evidence of Dr. Ash is that shortly before the accident he passed Evans about two blocks west of the stone bridge on Four Pole; that Evans had the front end of his car lodged up against a telephone pole; that he was sitting in his car and looking down and out sideways of the car; that coming back and just before reaching the turn in the road below the stone bridge, he met Evans there in the road, and that he seemed to be weaving back and forth, and Wiswell who was driving witness's car on the right hand side of the road had to drive clear off of the road in order to get out of the way of Evans' car. The evidence of the witness Blume corroborates that of Dr. Ash. The testimony of Zimmerman related to defendant's condition or apparent condition at the place of the accident, between 4:30 and 5 o'clock p. m., a few minutes after it occurred, when he had come back to look after his car. The time of the accident was about 4:25

p. m. This witness said: "I would say the man was drunk." The objection to this testimony is that it relates to matters not directly connected with the accident, and not a part of the res geste. In support of this proposition we are cited to Beard v. Indemnity Ins. Co., 65 W. Va. 283, 64 S. E. 119, affirming the general rule that where the issue is whether a person did a particular thing or was in a particular state, the fact that he did a similar thing or was in a particular state at some other time, is inadmissible. Like most general rules this one has its exceptions. One recognized and applied by this court is that where other actions and conduct of a person accused of wrongdoing were so recently connected in time and circumstance as to likely characterize his conduct and condition on the particular occasion involved, evidence thereof may be properly admitted for that purpose. State v. Waldron, 71 W. Va. 1, 75 S. E. 558; First Nat. Bank v. Barker, 75 W. Va. 244, 83 S. E. 898; State v. Huffman, 69 W. Va. 770, 73 S. E. 292. Besides, if Evans was in fact intoxicated twenty or thirty minutes before the occurrence in question, may not the court take judicial notice that he would not likely be in a sober and responsible state at the end of that time?

The next proposition urged in support of reversing the judgment is that plaintiff and her husband were guilty of contributory negligence precluding recovery. That question of fact was fully and fairly submitted to the jury, and as they found for plaintiff on the conflicting evidence, we must conclude they found against defendant on this question, and we can not say their finding was not warranted by the evidence.

[4, 5] The last ground for reversal is that the verdict and judgment were excessive and not supported by the facts proven. It is also urged that the size of the verdict imputes to the jury allowance of punitive damages. There is nothing in the record indicating excessiveness in the verdict or that it includes other than compensatory damages. The jury were not asked to give punitive damages; they were not by interrogatories asked to say how much, if anything, they included for punitive damages. In fact our decisions now make it clear that juries are not allowed to include punitive damages unless they find that the compensatory damages awarded do not constitute sufficient punishment for the wrong done. Only in such cases can the jury award smart money. Hess v. Marinari, 81 W. Va. 500, 94 S. E. 968. Perhaps if the verdict were clearly beyond the amount shown by the evidence to be sufficient to fully compensate the injured party, we might say the jury had included something by way of punishment. But no such case is presented here. The plaintiff, a married woman of about forty years of age, with two children, described as good looking, was cut deeply from her ear across her cheek to the corner of her mouth by the glass of the wind-shield of her car, and the muscles of her jaw were so permanently injured that she has practically lost the use of them. Her head was drawn to the side permanently; and she sustained other cuts and bruises of a permanent nature, more or less disfiguring her. She was laid up in a hospital as a result of her injuries for four or five weeks, and suffered and continues to suffer pain and anguish therefrom. Who can say the damages were excessive and more than sufficient to compensate her for her injuries? It was suggested in argument that if she had been killed, her estate would have been limited to a recovery not exceeding ten thousand dollars. But in such cases the damages go to the heirs; in this case they go to the one injured, as to which the statute imposes no limitation. In actions for personal injuries the law fixes no definite rule for measuring compensation. From the very necessity of the case the jury are made the judges of what is proper compensation. Kennedy v. Glen Alum Coal Co., 72 W. Va. 635, 78 S. E. 788. It is true that a married woman having no separate business or estate, employing herself wholly about her husband's household affairs, who sues for personal injuries, can recover damages only for physical pain, mental anguish and impairment of her capacity to enjoy life. Warth v. County Court, 71 W. Va. 184, 76 S. E. 420. But based on these elements who can measure the damages to plaintiff when we consider that she must go about among her family and friends all the rest of her days in a scarred and disfigured condition, her head drawn over, and her ability to masticate her food, of the first importance in maintaining good health, greatly impaired. The verdict no doubt appears large to defendant; but if the jury were right on the facts, his wrongdoing was great, and the only way he can be made to compensate the injured plaintiff is to answer to her in damages.

We are of opinion to affirm the judgment of the circuit court.

PERKEY v. PERKEY. (No. 3994.)(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Feb. 8, 1921.)(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Marriage \S 54—Between persons under age of consent voidable, and void only from time so declared by decree.

Section 1 of chapter 64 of the Code renders marriages between persons under the ages of consent not absolutely void, but only voidable, and void only from the time they are so declared by decree of divorce or nullity.

2. Marriage \S 3—Law of place of marriage held to govern as to marriages of those under age.

If one under the age of consent according to section 2 of chapter 64 of the Code goes into another state and marries one residing there, the law of the place of the marriage would govern, not the law of this state, and in such case section 3 of said chapter would have no application justifying annulment of the marriage on grounds therein provided.

3. Marriage \S 60(7)—Facts to annul marriage between persons under age must be alleged and proven.

To justify a decree annulling a marriage because contracted between persons under the ages of consent, the facts giving jurisdiction to grant such relief must not only be alleged but fully proven.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Cabell County.

Suit by Lawrence Perkey against Elsie Perkey for annulment of marriage. Decree for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

D. B. Daugherty, of Huntington, for appellant.

MILLER, J. Two grounds are alleged for the annulment of the marriage contract consummated between the parties in the state of Kentucky on November 2, 1918: First, that each was under the age of consent, plaintiff under the age of eighteen, and defendant under the age of sixteen, and that they had not cohabited after plaintiff reached the age of eighteen; second, that the defendant had wilfully and without just cause abandoned and deserted plaintiff in April, 1919.

[1] The ground of abandonment justifying divorce from the bonds of matrimony is not made out by the evidence. On the contrary we think the evidence establishes the fact that plaintiff abandoned defendant, and was aided therein by his parents. Besides, after he separated from her he returned and had intercourse with her, according to his own confession, and shortly afterwards brought this suit. He relies really on the fact that both parties were at the time of their marriage under the ages of consent, prescribed by section 2 of chapter 64 of the Code, making the age of consent of the female sixteen years, and that of the male eighteen years. Section 1 of said chapter, among other things, makes marriages between persons under the ages of consent not absolutely void from the beginning, but from the time they were so declared by a decree of divorce or nullity.

[2] The bill alleges that plaintiff was for more than a year next before suit brought an actual bona fide resident of this state; that he and defendant were married in Kentucky, November 2, 1918; and that from the date of their marriage they lived and cohabited in Cabell County, West Virginia, until the latter part of April, 1919, at which time they separated. The residence of defendant prior to the marriage is not alleged; nor does the bill allege, as was the case in Martin v. Martin, 54 W. Va. 301, 46 S. E. 120, 1 Ann. Cas. 612, and as section 3 of said chapter contemplates, that being residents of this state, and in order to evade the laws of this state, and with the intent of returning to reside in this state, they went into the state of Kentucky and there intermarried contrary to the provisions of section 1 of said chapter. Even if we regard the bill good on demurrer overruled, a question of law which we need not determine, nevertheless there is no proof that defendant was a resident of this state, and that she and plaintiff being such residents went to the state of Kentucky, there to intermarry and evade the laws of this state. If she was a resident of the state of Kentucky, and plaintiff went there and entered into a marriage contract with her, neither his act nor hers could be brought within the purview of our statute. As the court impliedly overruled the demurrer, we might, if the proof showed the fact, allow the bill to be amended so as to conform to the evidence, but the material facts appear neither by pleading nor proof.

[3] Moreover, we think the decree below right for failure of proof on the part of the plaintiff that he was under the age of consent at the time the marriage contract was consummated. He and his mother swear that he was under eighteen years of age at that time, but when taken in hand by the court, the mother swore that plaintiff was born July 18, 1900. The marriage occurred November 2, 1918. If born July 18, 1900, he was then over the age of eighteen years and capable of entering into a lawful contract under the laws of this state. Our statute does not render contracts of marriage by parties under the age of consent absolutely void, but void only from the date of the decree declaring them so; and section 4 of said chapter says that upon the hearing the court shall render a decree affirming or annulling the marriage according to the right of the case. And this section also says it shall be presumed that the marriage is valid unless the contrary be clearly proven. Defendant who was about to become the mother of a child begotten by plaintiff, and who at the time of the decree lacked but a few days of having reached the age of consent, answered the bill opposing annulment of the marriage.

At common law the age of consent of the female was twelve years, that of the male fourteen years, but marriages under those ages and over seven were not regarded void, but voidable only at the will of either of the parties on arriving at the age of consent. Statutes like ours were not intended to do more than raise the ages of consent, leaving the rules of common law in all other respects unimpaired and in full force. State v. Lowell, 78 Minn. 166, 80 N. W. 877, 46 L. R. A. 440, 76 Am. St. Rep. 358, and cases cited. And so our statute provides that marriage contracts made under the ages of consent shall be void only from the time they are so declared by decree of divorce or nullity, and as provided by section 4 of the statute, according to the rights of the case.

For the foregoing reasons we are of opinion to affirm the decree.

SUN LUMBER CO. v. NELSON FUEL CO. et al. (No. 4220.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Feb. 22, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Logs and logging \S 4—Mines and minerals \S 55(6)—Deed held to vest title to minerals with irrevocable license to use timber for mining and removing minerals.

A deed granting all of the minerals in and under a tract of land, with all such rights of way and such of the timber upon said land as may be necessary for the mining and removing of such minerals vests in the grantee the title to such minerals and an irrevocable license to use so much of the timber as may be necessary for the mining and removing of such minerals.

2. Licenses \S 58(2)—License coupled with interest for valuable consideration not revocable.

A license coupled with an interest acquired for a valuable consideration is not revocable, but may be enjoyed by the licensee so long as his interest in the subject-matter continues.

3. Logs and logging \S 4—License to use timber necessary for removing minerals held not to confer right to use for buildings for employes of mining company.

A right to use so much of the timber on a tract of land as may be necessary for mining and removing the minerals therefrom will confer the right to use only so much timber as is reasonably necessary to be used in direct connection with such mining operations, and at such times as the same may be required for such uses. It will not confer the right to use the timber upon such land for the purpose of building miners' houses, storehouses, churches, schools, and houses of entertainment for the prospective employes of the mining company.

4. Logs and logging \S 3(11)—Tender of sum to continue right to remove timber held effectual notwithstanding conveyance of land by unrecorded deed.

The grant of the timber upon a tract of land with a provision that the same be removed therefrom within 10 years, or in case of failure to so remove it within such time that the grantee may extend the time for removal by paying to the owner of the reversion a certain sum per year, and in case of his failure to pay the same he will be treated as having abandoned the said timber, and the title thereto shall revert to the owner of the land, is not defeated where, prior to the expiration of said 10 years, such grantee pays to his grantor the stipulated amount provided to continue the said right of removal for another year, and upon discovering that such grantor was not at said time the owner of the reversion tendered to the owner of the reversion, as shown by the records in the office of the county clerk, said sum of money, which tender was refused, even though it turns out that said land had been theretofore conveyed away by the party to whom such tender was made by a deed which was not placed on record until after the expiration of said 10-year term.

5. Logs and logging \S 3(11)—Conveyance of timber of certain size held to include only timber of that size at execution of conveyance.

A conveyance of all the timber upon a tract of land which measures 12 or more inches in diameter, to be cut and removed within a certain stipulated time, includes only the timber of that dimension when the conveyance was executed and delivered.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Greenbrier County.

Action by the Sun Lumber Company against the Nelson Fuel Company and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed in part, reversed in part, and rendered.

Haymond & Fox, of Sutton, for appellant.
Osenton & Lee, of Fayetteville, and Brown, Jackson & Knight, of Charleston, for appellees Nelson Fuel Co. and others.

Henry Gilmer, of Lewisburg, for appellees J. C. and L. E. McClung.

RITZ, P. The appellant complains upon this appeal of a decree of the circuit court of Greenbrier county dissolving a temporary injunction awarded to it inhibiting the defendant from cutting the timber upon a large tract of land which is held by said defendant under a mining lease, the timber on which plaintiff claims belongs to it.

In the year 1890 one Charles L. McClung was the owner of a large tract of land, or rather of a number of contiguous tracts, situate in Greenbrier county, and on the 5th day of February of that year he conveyed to M. Erskine Miller and others, trustees, all of the minerals of every kind upon and under a part of his land said to contain 4,046 acres. This deed by its terms grants and conveys "all of the minerals of every kind in and upon and under that certain tract or parcel of land," which is then described by particular metes and bounds, "together with all necessary and convenient rights of way of ingress and egress in, over, and through said land for the purpose of removing said mineral, or minerals, upon other adjacent lands, and also so much of the timber on said lands as may be required for mining said minerals and removing them from said lands." By another deed dated the 19th of August, 1892, said McClung conveyed to said trustees the mineral under another tract of land, which deed contains the same provision as to rights of way and timber as is contained in the deed of February 5, 1890. In 1896 said McClung conveyed to said trustees the minerals under still another tract of land, in which deed the same provisions are again made as to the rights of way and timber; and on the same day said trustees conveyed to said McClung a tract of land, which is described in said deed, from which conveyance, however, there is excepted and reserved all the coal and other minerals, and other substances on, in, and underlying said lands, and timber for mining purposes. The trustees who thus obtained the title to the minerals underlying the four tracts of land referred to in these deeds held the same for the Gauley Coal Land Company, which at that time was a voluntary association, but which subsequently became a corporation, and took the title to the lands in its own name. In addition to these McClung lands, this company owns very extensive mineral lands lying not only in Greenbrier county, but in some of the adjoining counties. On the 23d of October, 1918, the Gauley Coal Land Company executed to John B. Laing a lease of certain of its lands for mining purposes, the lands acquired by said lessee containing about 2,800 acres, about 2,000 acres of which is included within the lands conveyed by the four deeds above referred to, part of said 2,000 acres being within the lands conveyed by each of said deeds, but not covering all of the lands conveyed by any of said deeds. This lease permitted Laing to enjoy in the mining of the coal the timber rights which the Gauley Coal Land Company had upon the land. Laing subsequently transferred all of his right under said lease to the defendant Nelson Fuel Company, which at the time of the institution of this suit was the holder of the same.

Subsequent to the conveyance of these minerals by C. L. McClung, as above mentioned, to wit, on the 10th of November, 1909, he made a deed to J. O. and L. E. McClung, by which he conveyed to them all of the timber upon his lands, which included the lands, the minerals under which had been theretofore conveyed, 12 inches in diameter and up, and on the same day J. O. and L. E. McClung conveyed this timber to E. G. Rider and F. D. Stalnaker. In this deed to Stalnaker and Rider there was excepted and reserved such timber as had been theretofore conveyed to or reserved by the Gauley Coal Land Company for mining purposes. Stalnaker and Rider, on the 18th day of November, 1909, conveyed the timber to Amos Bright and J. H. Brewster, who were acting for and on behalf of the plaintiff Sun Lumber Company, and who by deed of October 4, 1911, conveyed the same to that company, and it is under this deed that the plaintiff claims to be the owner of all the timber upon the land 12 inches in diameter and up.

By two deeds dated respectively the 13th of February, 1919, and the 7th of March, 1919, C. L. McClung conveyed to John B. Laing all of his remaining interest in these lands, with some inconsiderable exceptions. Laing transferred the right so acquired by him to the Nelson Fuel Company, which in turn transferred it to the Gauley Coal Land Company, so that the Gauley Coal Land Company thus became the full owner of the McClung lands, with the exception of such rights as may be vested in the Sun Lumber Company under the timber deeds above referred to, unless C. L. McClung had parted with his interest in it prior to his conveyances to Laing of February 13, 1919, and March 7, 1919, by a paper which he executed on the 8th of November, 1897, to Amanda Shawver, and which will be more particularly hereafter adverted to.

In the deed from C. L. McClung to J. O. and L. E. McClung conveying the timber upon this tract of land there is a provision in regard to the time within which said timber is to be removed, and which provision is as follows:

"First, parties of the second part are to have ten years from the date hereof for the removal of the timber from the land and if not removed within the said ten years they are to pay to the parties of the first part the sum of $200 thereafter for each year the timber may remain on the lands for the privilege of continuing the removal, or should the parties of the second part abandon the timber or its removal it is to revert to the parties of the first part, but the payment of the $200 is to preclude the abandonment."

This same provision in effect is contained in the deeds from J. O. and L. E. McClung to Rider and Stalnaker, and from Rider and Stalnaker to Bright and Brewster, and from Bright and Brewster to the plaintiff.

The interest of the several parties in this land being as above indicated, the Nelson Fuel Company, on the 2d day of October, 1919, notified the plaintiff that it was preparing to begin mining operations upon its lease, under the terms of which it was entitled to use all timber on the leasehold premises necessary for the mining and removal of the coal, and that in accordance with this right it would proceed at once to cut any timber which it found necessary for mine ties, mine props, tipples, railroad siding, cross-ties for switches approaching its mine, storehouse, enginehouse, and for necessary houses for the miners who would be engaged in mining the coal. Upon receiving this notice the plaintiff filed its bill setting up its title to the timber as above stated, and claiming to be the owner of all of the timber on said tracts of land 12 inches in diameter and up, and averring that it was the intention of the defendant Nelson Fuel Company to cut the plaintiff's timber for the purposes specified in the notice above referred to, and asked that it be enjoined from doing so. A temporary injunction was granted. To this bill the defendant Nelson Fuel Company filed its answer by which it contended that under the three deeds conveying the minerals to the Gauley Coal Land Company's trustees, and the one deed in which the minerals were reserved, because of the provisions in said deeds in regard to the timber, it was the owner of said timber, and had the right to cut the same to the extent that it was necessary for the purpose of mining said coal and removing the same, and that it would require all of the timber upon said land for its mining purposes. It claimed that the deeds to the Gauley Coal Land Company's trustees, above referred to, were effective to divest C. L. McClung of the title to the timber upon this tract of land, and that his subsequent deed conveying the timber 12 inches and up to J. O. and L. E. McClung passed no title, for the reason that there was not at that time any title remaining in said C. L. McClung to the said timber. It claims further that, even though the deed from C. L. McClung to J. O. and L. E. McClung did convey the timber upon said tracts of land, the right to remove the same was limited to 10 years, and that the said plaintiff, claiming under said deed, had not commenced or completed the removal thereof within said 10 years, and had not complied with the condition requiring the payment of $200 a year for continuing such privilege, wherefore, under the language of said deed, the title to said timber reverted to and became vested in the Gauley Coal Land Company, the present owner of the reversion. It further claims that the deed from C. L. McClung to J. O. and L. E. McClung, above referred to, was ineffectual to pass any title to the timber upon said tract of land, for the reason that the said C. L. McClung had by a deed made long before he made the timber deed, to wit, on the 8th day of November, 1897, conveyed all of the interest then remaining in him in said tract of land to Amanda Shawver, and certain of his children and grandchildren mentioned in said paper. In its answer, which it asks to be taken as a cross-bill, it asks that the paper last above referred to be construed by the court, and the status of the parties thereunder determined. It asks the court also to hold that the mineral deeds above referred to vested in the Gauley Coal Land Company the title to all of the timber upon said land, and that it was entitled to use all thereof as lessee of said company, and to hold that the plaintiff by virtue of the several timber deeds referred to acquired no title or interest in the timber on said land, or if, perchance, it had acquired any such title or interest that the same had reverted to the Gauley Coal Land Company, the owner of the reversion, under the last conveyances from McClung to Laing above referred to. Some testimony was taken by the parties, but little of it is of any materiality in the determination of the questions involved. The defendant Nelson Fuel Company proved by witnesses introduced by it that in order to carry on mining operations upon said tract of land it would require for mine props, mine ties, timber for the construction of its tipples, houses, stores, and other buildings useful in connection with said mining operations considerably more than all the timber remaining upon the tract of land, and the plaintiff did not undertake to controvert this testimony.

The court below held that the paper writing dated the 8th day of November, 1897, purporting to be a deed from C. L. McClung to Amanda Shawver, now Amanda McClung, is an executory contract to convey a life estate to said Amanda Shawver, and does not convey or contract to convey any other right or interest in the land, and that the reversion thereof, after the life estate so contracted to be conveyed, remained after the execution of said paper in the said C. L. McClung; that the mineral deeds above referred to vested in the Gauley Coal Land Company the title to so much of the timber as was necessary for its mining purposes, and, it being shown that all of such timber was necessary for such purpose, the injunction was dissolved, and the plaintiff's bill dismissed.

The decision of this case involves the determination of the following questions: What interest in the timber upon these lands was acquired by the Gauley Coal Land Company under the deeds to its trustees? And if it should be held that these deeds were effective to grant to it all of the timber upon the lands under the showing made, then, of course, the subsequent deed made by C. L. McClung by which he attempted to convey certain timber to J. O. and L. E. McClung passed nothing. If, however, it be determined that the Gauley Coal Land Company did not acquire the timber upon these lands by the mineral deeds above referred to, then it is necessary to inquire whether the plaintiff has any interest therein holding under the deed made by C. L. McClung to J. O. McClung and L. E. McClung purporting to convey all of the timber upon the lands 12 inches in diameter and up, and this involves a consideration of the effect of the paper executed by C. L. McClung to Amanda Shawver above referred to. If it should be held that this paper was effective to convey all of the interest that C. L. McClung had remaining in these lands to the said Amanda Shawver and the other parties mentioned in said paper, then, of course, his subsequent deed to J. O. and L. E. McClung purporting to convey the timber passed nothing, for there would be nothing remaining in him to convey. And, should it be held that this paper was not effective to pass the title of C. L. McClung, then it becomes necessary to inquire whether or not any interest which the plaintiff acquired in said timber has reverted to the Gauley Coal Land Company for its failure to remove the same within the 10 years specified in the deed, or to pay the annual consideration provided therein for an extension of the time.

[1] Was the circuit court right in its holding that the mineral deeds to which reference has been heretofore made granted the timber upon these lands to the Gauley Coal Land Company's trustees, or did these deeds confer only a license to use so much of the timber as was necessary for mining and removing the coal? It cannot be doubted that the purpose of these conveyances was to grant the minerals in these lands. That is what the grantees bought and paid for. The use of timber and the rights of way over the lands referred to in the deeds were only incidents to the grant of the minerals, to be used in connection with the enjoyment of the estate conveyed by the deed. We do not think it can be said that these deeds vested in the grantees therein any estate whatever in the timber. It only conferred upon them a license to use so much of the timber in connection with their mining operations as might be necessary therefor, and might be available when the time for its use in connection with such operations arrived. In the case of Godfrey v. Coal Co., 82 W. Va. 665, 97 S. E. 186, we had under consideration a very similar provision. That was a suit for damages brought by the owner of the land against a coal company operating thereon, for destruction of the timber, and the defense was made that, inasmuch as the coal company had been granted the use of so much timber as was necessary for mining purposes, and that all of the timber upon the land would be necessary therefor, the plaintiff could not claim any damages for the destruction thereof. We held, however, that no title to the timber was vested in the grantee under the mineral deed, but that the same remained the property of the grantor until the grantee exercised his right to cut and appropriate it to the use contemplated, in effect holding that this right was a mere license incident to the grant of the minerals. A similar holding was made in the case of Paxton Lumber Co. v. Panther Coal Co., 83 W. Va. 341, 98 S. E. 563. The plaintiff contends that, if the defendant Nelson Fuel Company took any rights in the timber under the deed, it was a license to cut the same as its needs might require, and that the same was revocable by the grantor at any time, and was revoked by the subsequent conveyance of the timber. It is quite true that a mere license ordinarily may be revoked, and the licensee deprived of any right to act thereunder, but this rule is not without its limitations.

[2] Where the license is coupled with an interest granted upon a valid consideration, such license may not be revoked, but will confer upon the licensee the power to exercise the rights conferred so long as the interest to which the license is incident continues. 17 R. C. L. title "Licenses," § 91; Gaussen v. Morton, 10 B. & C. 731, 109 Eng. Reprint, 622; Winter v. Brockwell, 8 East, 308, 103 Eng. Reprint, 359; Doe v. Wood, 2 B. & Ald. 724, 106 Eng. Reprint, 529; Wood v. Manley, 11 Ad. & E. 34, 113 Eng. Reprint, 325; Miller v. State, 39 Ind. 267; Russell v. Hubbard, 59 Ill. 335; Thompson v. McElarney, 82 Pa. 174; United States v. Railroad Co., 1 Hughes, 138, Fed. Cas. No. 14,510; Boults v. Mitchell, 15 Pa. 371; Ricker v. Kelly, 1 Greenl. (Me.) 117, 10 Am. Dec. 38, and note at page 41; Chicago & Ind. Coal R. Co. v. Hall, 135 Ind. 91, 34 N. E. 704, 23 L. R. A. 231; Western Union Telegraph Co. v. Pennsylvania Co., 129 Fed. 849, 64 C. C. A. 285, 68 L. R. A. 968; Ackroyd v. Smith, 10 Eng. Rul. Cas. 1, and note at page 11. These authorities very clearly establish the doctrine that, where a license is coupled with an interest, it may be exercised as an incident to that interest, and may not be revoked so long as the interest to which it is incident is vested in the licensee. We are of opinion in this case that the right of the defendant to the use of timber for its mining purposes is a license coupled with its ownership of the minerals in the land, and that so long as it owns these minerals this license to use the timber may be exercised by it. It confers upon the defendant the right to take so much of the timber as may reasonably be required for the mining and removal of the coal, and as the same may be required for that purpose, and the plaintiff took the title to the timber subject to this right of the defendant.

of houses, store buildings, churches, and places of amusement for the men whom it will employ in its mining operations, as well as for the erection of tipples, railroad sidings, mine tracks, and for props in the mines, and that, even though it may only have an irrevocable license, it has the right to use all of this timber for the purposes aforesaid. As before stated, the license does not confer upon the licensee any title or interest in the property. It has a right to use it, and of course this right of user exists only when the occasion therefor arises. The defendant under its mineral deeds did not acquire any interest in any of the timber on this land, but only a right to use so much of the timber as its mining operations might require, as the same were carried on. The title to the timber remained in McClung, and passed to his grantees in the timber deeds. If in the conduct of its mining operations the defendant uses all of the timber on the land for the purposes contemplated by the parties, then nothing will remain for the plaintiff. If, on the other hand, plaintiff removes the timber conveyed to it in advance of the use of it by the defendant for its mining purposes, the defendant, for those purposes, will have to be content with exercising its right upon such timber as may remain when the same is required for mining. The mining operations upon this 2,000 acres of land will doubtless continue for many years, and the timber now upon the land which is at this time of insufficient size for mine props or mine ties in all probability will be sufficient for that purpose when the time for its use arrives. Can the defendant's contention that it is entitled to use this timber under this license for the purpose of building miners' houses, storehouses, churches, theaters, schoolhouses, and buildings of this character that it may be desirable or advisable to provide for the use and entertainment of its employes be sustained? The right given by the deed is limited to such timber as may be necessary for mining and removing the coal. Did the parties contemplate the building of a mining village from timber cut from this land under this license? We do not think so. We think the timber which the defendant is entitled to use under the license must be such as is necessary for the operations directly connected with mining and removing the coal, such as the props used in its mines, ties used for its mine railroads, timbers for its tipples and entries, and for cross-ties for sidings constructed to its tipples. It is argued that it is just as necessary for the miners to have houses to live in, and for the company to have a store building where the miners may secure provisions and supplies as it is to have railroads and mine openings. This is entirely true, and it may be that the defendant, for the more effective and convenient operation of its business, may provide these things, but can it be said that they are necessary for mining and removing the coal? They are an incident to the business, but not so directly connected with it as that it can be said that they are necessary thereto within the meaning of the license granted. There is some discussion of what is included in the terms "mining rights" and "mining purposes" in the cases of Denver & Rio Grande Ry. Co. v. United States (C. C.) 34 Fed. 838, United States v. Chaplin (C. C.) 31 Fed. 890, United States v. Denver & Rio Grande Ry. Co., 150 U. S. 1, 14 Sup. Ct. 11, 37 L. Ed. 975, United States v. Richmond Mining Co. (C. C.) 40 Fed. 415, United States v. United Verde Copper Co., 8 Ariz. 186, 71 Pac. 954, and Duncan v. American Standard Asphalt Co. (Ky.) 83 S. W. 124, from which it may be gathered that the rights to which the licensee is entitled under such licenses must be directly connected with the work of mining. None of these cases fully define the extent to which one may go in the use of timber under such a license as the one involved here, but all of the uses permitted in those cases consisted of a direct application of the timber to the contemplated purpose. We do not think this license can be extended to include any use of timber except the direct application of it to mining and removing the coal, and that the attempt to use it in the construction of houses, store buildings, churches, or theaters is beyond the licensee's right.

[4] The defendant insists, however, that the plaintiff cannot maintain this suit for the reason that it did not remove the timber within the 10 years provided within its deed, nor pay the $200 provided therein to be paid to prevent the title to said timber from reverting to the owner of the land. There is no merit in this contention. It appears that before the expiration of the 10 years plaintiff did pay to C. L. McClung $200 with a view of extending its right for another year, but, finding before the expiration of the 10 years that C. L. McClung was not then the owner of the reversion, it tendered $200 to the defendant Nelson Fuel Company, believing that it was at that time the owner of the land under the deeds made by McClung to Laing, and by Laing to it, above referred to. This tender was refused, and it turned out that the Nelson Fuel Company had before that time conveyed the land to the Gauley Coal Land Company, but this deed was not put on records until some time afterward, so that at the time this tender was made, so far as the records in the county clerk's office were concerned, the Nelson Fuel Company was the owner of the reversion, and the tender of the money to it was sufficient to prevent plaintiff's title from becoming forfeited. In addition to this, upon the refusal of the defendant to accept this $200, the same was paid into court for the purpose of preventing any forfeiture.

In its pleading defendant also sets up as a bar to plaintiff's right to maintain this suit the paper executed by C. L. McClung to Amanda Shawver on the 8th of November, 1897, prior to the execution of the timber deed by said McClung to J. O. and L. E. McClung, and asserted that, if this paper was effective to convey C. L. McClung's interest in this land to Amanda Shawver and the other parties mentioned therein, then the timber deed passed no title to J. O. and L. E. McClung, and this would be true. The court below, having all of the interested parties before it, construed this paper to be only an executory contract for the conveyance of a life estate to the said Amanda Shawver, leaving the reversion in C. L. McClung. No complaint is made of this construction by any of the interested parties, and no reason is urged against it. We see no reason for disturbing the lower court's decree in this regard.

[5] The plaintiff in its pleadings insists that it has a right under its deed to cut all of the timber upon this tract of land which may be 12 inches in diameter, or in excess thereof, at the time it actually cuts it, regardless of the size of such timber at the date of the timber deed; while the Nelson Fuel Company insists that, if any timber was granted to the plaintiff at all, it was only such timber as was 12 inches in diameter and up at the date of the conveyance of the timber by C. L. McClung in 1909. There is proof in the record that the poplar timber that was 12 inches in diameter at the date of the deed would in the intervening time have increased in diameter about 2 inches, and that such timber which was say 10 inches in diameter at the date of the making of the deed would in the intervening time have grown to be 12 inches in diameter. The harder woods, it is shown, would not grow so rapidly as the poplar. As to the extent of their growth there is no evidence. It will thus be seen that there may be upon this tract of land considerable timber which was not 12 inches in diameter at the date of the deed, but which the plaintiff would be entitled to cut under its contention, if the same should be sustained. The deed conveys "the timber 12 inches in diameter at the stump 2 feet above the ground and upwards and situate on the lands." There is nothing to indicate an intention that the deed should pass the title to any timber that was not at that time included within that description. Of course, the parties fixed a limit of 10 years within which to remove the timber, and it is undoubtedly true that it would be more convenient, in executing this contract, to apply its terms to the timber at the time it is actually cut; but this is not what the parties provided in their contract. As before stated, such a construction might include even within the 10 years a large amount of timber which did not answer the description of the timber sold at the time the deed was made and delivered; and not only that, but there is a provision in this contract which permits the purchaser to extend it from year to year after the expiration of the 10 years by the payment of $200 per year. As to how long this timber may be allowed to stand uncut no one can tell, and if a sufficient length of time is allowed to elapse before the same is cut it may very well be that there will be as much timber 12 inches in diameter and up at the date of the cutting, which was not of that diameter at the date of the deed, as there would be of timber that was of such dimensions at the time of the delivery of the deed.

This same question has been before the courts of other states, and with practical uniformity it has been held that where a deed conveys timber of certain sizes, or for certain purposes, and the time for determining whether or not the timber falls within the description is not specified, it must fall within the definition contained in the contract at the time of its execution and delivery, and that only such timber as does come within the terms of the contract at that time will pass by the deed. In the case of Bryant v. Bates (Ky.) 39 S. W. 428, where there was a contract for the sale of trees thirty inches in diameter and up at the stump, with the provision that the same should be removed within three years, the holding was that the measurement should be made as the same were cut, and not as of the date of the deed. But the same court subsequently, in the case of Evans v. Dobbs (Ky.) 112 S. W. 667, held exactly the contrary. In that case it was held that, where a contract was made for the sale of all the white oak timber suitable for the manufacture of staves upon the land described, the purchaser was only entitled to such timber as was suitable for such purpose at the date of the deed. In North Carolina it is uniformly held that only such timber passes as answers the description in the deed at its date, unless there is some other time mentioned at which the measurements shall be made. Robinson v. Gee, 26 N. C. 186; Whitted v. Smith, 47 N. C. 36; Warren v. Short, 119 N. C. 39, 25 S. E. 704; Lumber Co. v. Hines, 128 N. C. 254, 35 S. E. 458; Hardison v. Lumber Co., 136 N. C. 173, 48 S. E. 588; Lumber Co. v. Corey, 140 N. C. 462, 53 S. E. 300, 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 468; Isler v. Lumber Co., 146 N. C. 556, 60 S. E. 508. Like holdings have been made by the Supreme Court of South Carolina in Crawford v. Lumber Co., 79 S. C. 166, 60 S. E. 445, and Wilson Lumber Co. v. Alderman, 80 S. C. 106, 61 S. E. 217, 128 Am. St. Rep. 865. The holdings of the Supreme Court of Georgia also accord with this view. McRae v. Stilwell, 111 Ga. 65, 36 S. E. 604, 55 L. R.

In view of the fact that the deed grants the timber 12 inches in diameter and up, and does not indicate that the size of the timber granted shall be determined at any other time than the date of the delivery of the deed, and of the further fact that the authorities, so far as we have been able to find, uniformly hold that in such case only such timber as is included in the terms of the grant at the time it was made will pass thereby, we are constrained to hold that the plaintiff is only entitled to remove from this land such timber as was 12 inches in diameter and up at the time of the grant by McClung in 1909. The evidence is not sufficiently certain for us to determine what would be the present size of such trees as were 12 inches in diameter at the time of the grant, nor is it at all necessary to fix at this time the limit of plaintiff's rights, for that will not become a practical question until it proceeds to remove the timber. When this happens, if the parties cannot agree, then some appropriate remedy will have to be applied to determine the limits of the plaintiff's rights.

J. O. and L. E. McClung appeared upon the hearing of this case in this court and asked that the decree of the lower court be modified, so as to show that it was without prejudice to any rights they might have against their vendees to collect the unpaid purchase money for the timber conveyed by them to Rider and Stalnaker. The pleadings in this case did not involve in any way their right to collect purchase money. In fact, that was foreign to the subject-matter of this litigation and it could not have been litigated in this suit, even if the parties had attempted it. No decree entered here can in any way affect any interest or right they may have to enforce the collection of any unpaid purchase money.

Our conclusion, therefore, is to reverse the decree of the circuit court of Greenbrier county, except to the extent that it construes the paper writing made by C. L. McClung to Amanda Shawver as being only an executory contract for the conveyance of a life estate, in which respect said decree will be affirmed; and we will enter a decree here adjudging that the plaintiff has the title to the timber on said lands 12 inches in diameter and up, and that the defendant the Nelson Fuel Company, however, has an irrevocable license to cut and use so much of the timber upon said lands as may be necessary for the purposes of mining and removing the minerals, as here-inafore defined. The injunction will be reinstated and perpetuated to the extent that the defendant is enjoined from cutting or using any of such timber for the construction of miners' houses, schoolhouses, storehouses, churches, theaters, or any other use not directly connected with the mining and removal of the coal.

STATE v. BOGGS. (No. 4273.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Feb. 22, 1921.)

1. Arrest §—68—Officer not justified in shooting suspected misdemeanor on refusal to stop when ordered.

An officer seeking to arrest a misdemeanor is not justified in shooting or wounding a traveler on the highway whom he has reason to believe is the misdemeanor, and whom he has ordered to halt for the purpose of ascertaining if he is the person for whom he is seeking, where the traveler simply refuses to obey the command, and pursues his journey hurriedly and in such manner as would lead the officer to believe he is the misdemeanor, indicating an escape.

2. Criminal law §—1169(1), 1170(1)—Error in ruling on evidence not ground for reversal where verdict would not have been changed.

Error in the admission or rejection of evidence will not be sufficient ground for reversal when it appears upon the whole case, including the admissions of the defendant, that the verdict would not have been changed, and ought to be affirmed.

3. Criminal law §—870—Statute authorizing special verdicts inapplicable to jury trials in criminal cases.

Sec. 5, c. 181, of the Code (sec. 4909), authorizing the circuit court to submit interrogatories to the jury upon the trial of any issue for the purpose of having it render separate verdicts upon any one or more of the issues, does not apply to jury trials in criminal cases.

Error to Circuit Court, Harrison County.

J. E. Boggs was convicted of assault with intent to kill, and he brings error. Affirmed.

Law & McCue, of Clarksburg, for plaintiff in error.

E. T. England, Atty. Gen., R. A. Blessing, Asst. Atty. Gen., and Steptoe & Johnson, of Clarksburg, for the State.

LIVELY, J. This writ of error brings up for review the judgment of the criminal court of Harrison county rendered on the 18th of November, 1920, which sentenced J. E. Boggs to confinement in the penitentiary for two years on a verdict finding him guilty of an unlawful assault with intent to maim, disfigure, disable, and kill Clyde Coffindaffer.

A justice of the peace had issued a warrant for the apprehension of Joe Costa for a violation of the prohibition law, and had appointed John Siers as a special constable to make the arrest. Siers had obtained information that Costa was expected to arrive at Clarksburg in the nighttime in an automobile with a load of spirituous liquors, and that he would come from Shinnston by the Maulsby bridge across the West Fork river. He had received information that Costa was a "bad" man, and would likely resist arrest, and that there would be danger in making the arrest. He secured the assistance of Boggs, the defendant, and George Darnell, both of whom were members of the department of public safety, and stationed at that time in the vicinity of Clarksburg, where there was an industrial disturbance, informing them of the character of the person to be arrested and the possible danger attending the arrest. This special constable and these two members of the department of public safety went in an automobile to the Maulsby bridge, arriving there about 9 o'clock on the evening of October 5, 1920, and stationed themselves at the end of the bridge nearest to Clarksburg for the purpose of apprehending Costa should he pass that way. The bridge was a covered bridge, and about 20 feet wide, and the record does not disclose its length. They had detained, temporarily, several persons until about the hour of 10:30 p. m., when an automobile coming from the direction of Shinnston entered the bridge. In this automobile were Dr. Clyde Coffindaffer, F. Byrl Wyer and wife, and John Ashcraft, who was driving the car. Clyde Coffindaffer was a physician, well known in that community, practicing his profession at Clarksburg, and was then taking Mrs. Wyer, who was suffering from peritonitis, to a hospital at Clarksburg. She was sitting on the rear seat with her husband on her left side. The doctor was sitting in the right front seat by the side of Ashcraft, and had his back toward the right door of the car, and was assisting in steadying Mrs. Wyer with his left hand. This car was a four-seated Chandler chummy roadster, and was somewhat similar to the car which Costa was supposed to be using. It appears that Siers, the special constable, was standing on the left-hand side of the bridge, a short distance inside thereof, and to the left of this car as it approached. He had an electric flashlight in one hand, which he waved at the approaching car, and two of the witnesses in the car stated that he had a pistol in the other hand. Siers denied that he had a pistol. Boggs was on the right-hand side of the car as it approached, and inside of the covered bridge a short distance, and just in front of another car which was standing there, which had been detained, and which belonged to a Mr. Raikes. Darnell was also standing on the same side of the bridge, and a short distance from the other end of the last-named car. As the doctor's car approached these men it slowed down, but as Siers and Boggs approached it, seemingly in a threatening manner, and without giving information of their design, the chauffeur quickly "put on more gas" and the speed of the car was quickly accelerated. Shooting then began, and there is considerable conflict as to whether the first shot was fired from the left-hand side of the car or from the other side. Siers states that Boggs was on the same side of the bridge with himself. Boggs stated that he was on the opposite side, and all of the other witnesses place him on the opposite side, from Siers. All of the occupants of the car state that the first shot penetrated the rear left-hand tire of the car, releasing the air therefrom, and almost immediately after the first shot the man standing on the opposite side of the car and four or five feet from the car presented his pistol at Dr. Coffindaffer, and shot him in the back, the doctor exclaiming, "Oh, I am shot." The car was in rapid motion, and after it left the bridge some more shots were fired. The wounded man was immediately taken to the hospital at Clarksburg, where he received medical attention. The testimony of Boggs does not coincide with that of the occupants of the car respecting the actual shooting. He corroborates the state's evidence as to the place he was standing, but testified that after he approached the car when it slowed down, and after it had started to go faster, he commanded them to halt, and that the car had passed him and had almost reached Darnell, who was standing several feet from him, when Darnell also called on the car to halt, and he (Boggs) then began shooting, not at the occupants of the car, but at the tires, and for the sole purpose of stopping the car. He did not know that any one was shot that night, and had no idea that any one had been wounded until the next morning, when he heard from Siers, or saw it in the newspapers, that Dr. Coffindaffer had been severely wounded. He stated both before and on the trial that all of the shots which were fired that night were fired by him with a 45 Colt's Army revolver. Immediately upon learning that Dr. Coffindaffer had been wounded, he came to Clarksburg, admitted the shooting to the sheriff and others, and went to the doctor's sick room, where he admitted the shooting, but stated that he had no intention whatever of hurting any one, and that his shots were in good faith at the tires of the automobile, and for the purpose of stopping it in order to make the arrest of Costa.

Boggs, Siers and Darnell were indicted for malicious wounding and Boggs elected to be tried separately. On the evidence, a summary only of which is above given, the jury found the defendant not guilty of malicious wounding, but of unlawful wounding with the intent to maim, disfigure, etc. Five instructions were offered by the state, all of which were objected to by the defense, but all were given except instruction No. 3. Instruction No. 1 was to the effect that an officer had no right to kill, or attempt to kill, in endeavoring to make an arrest for a misdemeanor, and unless the jury believed from the evidence that these officers were attempting to arrest Coffindaffer for the committing of the felony, or in the act of committing a felony, that the defendant was not authorized to shoot with intent to kill for the purpose of arresting Coffindaffer. This instruction simply lays down the law of arrest, and it is to the effect that defendant was not justified in shooting Coffindaffer with intent to maim, etc., unless the jury believe that Coffindaffer was doing an act which would justify such shooting. We can see no good objection to this instruction. It is apparent that defendant and the other officers were attempting to make the arrest of Joe Costa, the person for whom they had the warrant, and when the car began to go faster at the command to halt they erroneously concluded that Dr. Coffindaffer was the person for whom they had the warrant or that he was in that car; and the instruction simply propounded the law applicable to that situation, to the effect that an officer is not justified in shooting with intent to kill the person for whom he has a warrant unless that person has committed, or is in the act of committing, a felony; and in no case is an officer justified in shooting with like intent in making an arrest for a misdemeanor. The instruction is further objected to because there was no evidence of any attempt to kill any one on that occasion; that the shooting was accidental. But the evidence of all the witnesses who were in the car was positive that the pistol which did the wounding was fired at Dr. Coffindaffer's back when only a few feet from him. The question whether it was accidental or intentional is one for the jury. A man is presumed to intend that which he does or which is the immediate or necessary consequence of his act. If the jury believed beyond a reasonable doubt that the shot was fired with the intent to kill or wound the doctor, then there was no justification unless they further believed that the doctor was committing, or attempting to commit, a felony.

[1] These officers were evidently attempting to make an arrest, or, at least, to stop the occupants of the car for the purpose of ascertaining if Costa was therein in order to make the arrest. Neither purpose alone would justify the shooting of the occupants unless with the qualification set out in the instruction. It is argued that the doctor should have stopped and permitted these men to make examination of the car and search for Costa. But even if this be true, and he did not stop or permit search, that alone would not justify the defendant in shooting him, or in such reckless shooting as would be likely to kill or wound any of the occupants of the car.

Objection is made to instruction No. 2, which was given for the state, because it is more or less abstract in laying down the law of arrest, in that an officer acts at his own peril in making such arrests; that it is unlawful in making the arrest of a person without at the time having a warrant for him unless he is at the time committing a felony, or in the act of committing a felony, or has committed some offense less than a felony in the presence or view of such officer. While this instruction is somewhat abstract, we cannot see that it might have or did mislead the jury. Reed's Case, 98 Va. 817, 36 S. E. 399.

Instructions numbered 4 and 5, given for the state, while objected to at the trial, are not insisted upon as error here. We can see no error in them. They correctly state the law on reasonable doubt as to the guilt of the prisoner.

Five instructions were asked for by the defendant, and all given except No. 3, which was refused, and error is assigned for that reason. This instruction was to the effect that the defendant, then assisting officers who had a warrant for Costa and awaiting him on the bridge, had the lawful right to temporarily detain Dr. Coffindaffer long enough to ascertain if he was Costa or some other person, and to use such reasonable force as was necessary to cause the doctor to pause for that purpose, if he refused such request.

The evidence did not disclose that Dr. Coffindaffer or any other person in the car knew that these men had a warrant for Costa or for any other person. He knew Siers, but it must be remembered that Siers was a special constable for his arrest only. Their mission was not known to him, nor did he know that they were officers; and the command of "Halt!" was not very communicative of their authority or design. Besides, if they had any right to detain him temporarily, the force used was not reasonable. We cannot accede to the proposition that an officer with a misdemeanor warrant may station himself on the highway and command innocent persons to halt, and if they, not knowing the intention or design, refuse to do so, that the officer is then justified in shooting those refusing, or in shooting so recklessly that fatalities or serious injuries may occur. It is well settled that where an arrest for a misdemeanor has been made, and the prisoner breaks away, the officer is not justified in shooting him. Voorhees on Arrest, § 197. Many authorities say it is murder if death results. The officer must not use unnecessary force in making the arrest, and if he does so it is at his peril. These well-settled principles would apply with much greater reason where an innocent traveler on the highway is not even sought to be arrested, but to be detained for examination. This instruction would tend to lead the jury to understand that the law would justify the defendant in using force necessary to cause Dr. Coffindaffer to pause for the purpose of being investigated. The force used was the firing of the shots, one of which almost caused death. Even this force was not sufficient to cause him to pause; on the contrary, it caused him to flee for his life. The instruction would, if given, have tended to justify the offense charged. Under this evidence the instruction was misleading and properly refused. It is argued that if an officer can break a door to enter a dwelling house in order to search for a criminal supposed to have taken refuge therein, then like force can be used to stop and enter an automobile and make search. But before an officer can break the doors and enter a dwelling house to make an arrest, he must first make due demand as an officer armed with authority, and a refusal would not justify the taking of life. The controlling feature on this question in this case is not what might have been done, but what was actually done.

Shooting with firearms by officers in pursuit of fugitives charged with minor crimes, as a ruse to prevent further flight, is illegal as a reckless use of firearms, and was disapproved in State v. Cunningham, 107 Miss. 140, 65 South. 115, where the court said: "An officer must not intentionally shoot a misdemeanor who is a fugitive, nor must he discharge a firearm while in pursuit, in such manner as to cause such fugitive injury."

Exception is made to the ruling of the court in not allowing the witness John Siers to detail information he had received from A. L. Lohm, a federal officer, to the effect that Costa was a dangerous character, and would likely resist arrest, and would attempt to run over the officers with his automobile; and also that Costa was expected to come through the bridge that night; and that he (Siers) had informed the defendant of what had been told him in that regard by Lohm; also that the court refused to allow the warrant to be put in evidence which witness had as a special officer for Costa for violation of the prohibition law. The record discloses that practically all of this evidence went to the jury in another form. The defendant testified that he was requested by Siers to help him make an arrest of a man who was coming in with liquor. "He [Siers] said he [Costa] was a bad man, and he did not feel like going after him alone; he wanted some assistance, and I felt it was my duty to do so, and I did." Question: "Was that man Joe Costa?" Answer: "Joe Costa." Question: "At the time you went down to the bridge did you know, or had you learned, that this fellow, Joe Costa, was a bad man, and would likely resist arrest?" Answer: "I did." Siers also testified that he had a warrant for Joe Costa at the time he went to the bridge, and requested the defendant and Mr. Darnell to accompany him to assist in making the arrest, and that they were all at the bridge for that purpose. The information which Siers had received from Lohm went to the jury, and the prisoner received the benefit of it. The fact that Siers had a warrant for Costa went to the jury, and it is not perceived how the warrant itself, if introduced to the jury, would have strengthened that fact. Moreover, it is apparent that the jury gave the defendant the benefit of this evidence. It did not find him guilty of malicious shooting. The object of that evidence was to repel the presumption of malice in the use of the deadly weapon, and the reason why the defendant was at the bridge. Malice was successfully eliminated. The verdict was for unlawful wounding.

[2] The error, if any, in refusing to allow Siers to give this evidence (which in fact went to the jury in another form), was harmless, in view of the verdict. State v. Miller, 102 S. E. 303. Had Costa been in Dr. Coffindaffer's place, the jury would have been justified in finding a verdict for unlawful wounding. There is conflict in the evidence as to the actual shooting. All of the occupants of the car, four in number, testify that the shot which wounded the doctor was fired by a man standing immediately to the right of the car, and within four or five feet of the doctor, and that he pointed his pistol directly at, and in line with, the doctor's shoulder. The doctor felt the burn on his neck. The ball entered the posterior part of his right shoulder, close to the upper portion of the shoulder blade, or scapula, and came out just beneath the collar bone, which it broke, and lodged in his clothing. There was evidence that a pistol ball had penetrated the rear tire on the left side of the car, entering from the left side of the tire near the rim, and, glancing upward, came out of the opposite side of the tire, making a ragged hole. All of the occupants of the car testified that the first shot came from the left side, the side where Siers stood, and they heard the air go out of the tire, and immediately afterwards the shot which wounded the doctor was fired from the right by a man standing very close to the car, and in front of the other car standing on that side of the bridge. This was about the position which the defendant testified he occupied at the time of the shooting. The defendant very frankly and promptly stated that he had done all the shooting that was done there that night, and the other defendants make the same statement. As heretofore stated, the main conflict in the evidence concerning the immediate shooting arises between the statement of the witnesses that the shot was fired directly into the back of the doctor from a man on the right and the statement of Boggs that the shots were not fired until after the car had passed him. The physical fact that the doctor was shot in the right shoulder, and the range of the bullet directly through his body, corroborates the testimony of the state's witnesses. These questions of fact were passed upon by the jury and adversely to the defendant. It was within the province of the jury under this testimony to say that the defendant either did the act maliciously or unlawfully. The jury was instructed by defendant's instruction No. 1 on the question of malice. That instruction reads as follows:

"The court instructs the jury that the defense of accidental injury to Dr. Coffindaffer goes to the very gist of the charge, and denies all criminal intent, and throws the burden of proving the intent, as charged in the indictment, beyond a reasonable doubt, upon the state. Therefore, although you may believe that the defendant Boggs did shoot and wound Dr. Coffindaffer, yet unless you believe beyond all reasonable doubt that such shooting was done with intent to maim, disfigure, disable, and kill him, you must find the defendant not guilty of the malicious and unlawful shooting."

This instruction put before the jury the full theory of the defense, and it may be that the result was the best for the defendant that he could expect under the circumstances. At least the jury so disposed of the case, and it is not within the province of this court to gainsay it.

Exception was made to the ruling of the court in refusing to permit Dr. Coffindaffer to state on cross-examination a conversation between himself and two men who passed him on Gipsy hill, a place about a mile from the bridge and between Shinnston and the bridge. The doctor had stated on cross-examination that he had passed two men at that point who asked him if he had any whisky, and, if so, "you had better not go ahead." To which he replied, "'We haven't got any whisky; we have got a very sick woman;' and I said—I don't know whether I said, 'We are in a hurry,' or not, and they began to say something more, and I thought the fellows were drinking, and we just drove on." The defense then asked, "Now, Doctor, I want you to state what these parties said to you when they came to you, or when they drove past you, on the road before you reached the bridge." This question was objected to, and the court sustained the objection because the witness had practically answered the question, and because the court said it was not pertinent to the issue. There was another ground upon which this question was not proper. This was a cross-examination of the doctor, and he had not testified to this matter on direct examination. As to this conversation between these witnesses the defense was making the doctor their own witness. He could have been recalled for that purpose when the defense put in its evidence. State v. Hatfield, 48 W. Va. 561, 37 S. E. 626.

Interrogatories were prepared by the defense and submitted to the jury touching the questions of malice and the intention of the defendant in firing the shots, and were carried by the jury to their room, and afterwards, and before they returned their verdict, on motion of the state, these interrogatories were withdrawn from the jury over the objection and exception of the defense, and this action of the court is insisted upon here as error.

[3] The statute allowing interrogatories is found in chapter 120 of the Acts of 1882, and is section 5 of chapter 131 of the Code (sec. 4900), which chapter relates to trials in civil cases. There is no reference to propounding such interrogatories in chapter 159 of the Code (secs. 5577-5601), which relates to the trial of criminal cases. The statute is as follows:

"A circuit court may in any case before it, other than a chancery case, have an issue tried, or an inquiry of damages made by a jury, and determine all questions concerning the legality of evidence and other matters of law which may arise. Upon the trial of any issue or issues by a jury, whether under this section or not, the court may on motion of any party, direct the jury, in addition to rendering a general verdict, to render separate verdicts upon any one or more of the issues, or to find in writing upon particular questions of fact to be stated in writing. The action of the court upon such motion shall be subject to review as in other cases. Where any such separate verdict or special findings shall be inconsistent with the general verdict, the former shall control the latter, and the court shall give judgment accordingly."

It is at once apparent from the context that these interrogatories were intended to be used only in the trial of civil cases. On this question Judge Cooley says:

"How far the jury are to judge of the law as well as of the facts is a question a discussion of which we do not propose to enter upon. If it be their choice to do so, they may return specially what facts they find established by the evidence, and allow the court to apply the law to those facts, and thereby to determine whether the party is guilty or not. But they are not obliged in any case to find a special verdict; they have a right to apply for themselves the law to the facts, and to express their own opinion, upon the whole evidence, of the defendant's guilt." Cooley's Const. Lim. (7th Ed.) p. 461.

"Statutes permitting findings to be required in response to interrogatories are held not to apply to criminal cases, for the reason that to so apply them would be to impair the right of trial by jury secured by the Constitution. It is one of the most essential features of the right of trial by jury that no jury should be compelled to find any but a general verdict in criminal cases, and the removal of this safeguard would violate its design and destroy its spirit.

"But though the jury cannot be compelled to answer specially, it is undoubtedly at liberty to include special findings in its verdict." Clementson on Special Verdicts, p. 49.

See, also, People v. Roat, 117 Mich. 578, 76 N. W. 91; People v. Marlon, 29 Mich. 31; Malden v. Commonwealth, 82 Ky. 133; Smith v. State of Ohio, 59 Ohio St. 350, 52 N. E. 826; State v. Fooks, 65 Iowa, 196, 452, 21 N. W. 561, 773.

This law has been on our statute books for 38 years, and it has never been considered as applying to criminal cases by either the bench or the bar. This fact could be considered in the interpretation of the application of this statute if it were necessary. "A construction of a statute that has been acted upon by the bench and bar for nearly half a century should not be disturbed. The common consent and opinion of the legal profession on a question of the construction and practical operation of a statute were held to be of persuasive force." Lewis' Sutherland Statutory Construction (2d Ed.) vol. 2, p. 887.

As above intimated, we are of the opinion that special interrogatories cannot be propounded to the jury in criminal cases, and we see no error in the action of the trial court in withdrawing these interrogatories from the jury. In the first place, they should not have been submitted to the jury.

This is a most unfortunate case, both for the defendant and for Dr. Coffindaffer. The defendant is only 26 years of age, and for nearly two years he was with the American Expeditionary Forces in Europe, and his services were acknowledged by decorations for gallantry on the battlefield. Possibly his military training impelled him to act over hastily when the occupants of the car refused to heed the command of "Halt!" Possibly the influence of army life and the incidents of the battlefield made it more difficult for him to heed the civil requirements in making arrests. While his punishment may be severe, under all the circumstances this court, perceiving no error in his trial, can give him no relief.

The judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

Affirmed.

BRAUDE & McDONNELL, Inc., v. ISADORE COHEN CO. (No. 4152.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia. Feb. 22, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Evidence §442(1)—Parol evidence admissible only when contract incomplete on face.

Generally a written contract must appear on its face to be incomplete in order to permit parol evidence of additional terms not embodied therein.

2. Evidence §397(2)—Written contract presumed to contain the whole agreement.

Though no written contract, which does not in terms state that it contains the whole agreement, precludes the possible supposition of additional parol clauses not inconsistent therewith, yet if, upon inspection and study of the writing, it appears to contain the full engagement of the parties, and to define the object and measure the extent of such engagement, the presumption is that it contains the whole of the agreement, and this presumption generally is conclusive.

3. Sales §29—Acceptance by buyer of bill of sale binds without signature.

Acceptance by the buyer of an invoice or bill of sale of goods from the seller, which admittedly purports to be a contract between them, indicates his assent to its terms, despite the absence of the buyer's signature.

4. Evidence §442(2)—Parol evidence to show return privilege held inadmissible.

An invoice or bill of sale, complete on its face, which recites an absolute sale of goods without condition or restriction, defines the terms thereof, some of which are inserted at the buyer's suggestion, and is accepted by the latter with full knowledge of its provisions, is within the rule prohibiting modification of a written agreement by parol evidence, and the purchaser, in defense of an action by the seller for the price of the goods, will not be permitted to show an alleged contemporaneous oral agreement between the parties by which the buyer was accorded the privilege of returning such of the goods as he was unable to sell.

5. Trial §156(2), 412—Demurrer to evidence not waiver of inadmissibility of evidence; inadmissible evidence to be ignored in passing on demurrer to evidence.

A demurrer to the evidence does not have the effect of waiving the demurrant's objections to evidence which the demurree was permitted to introduce over his protest; and in passing upon such demurrer the court should ignore and exclude from consideration so much of the challenged testimony as is legally inadmissible.

Error to Circuit Court, Mercer County.

Action by Braude & McDonnell, Incorporated, against the Isadore Cohen Company. Judgment for defendant after plaintiff's demurrer to the evidence was overruled, and plaintiff brings error. Judgment reversed, demurrer to evidence sustained, and judgment for plaintiff entered.

Arthur F. Kingdon, of Bluefield, for plaintiff in error.

Sanders & Crockett and A. G. Fox, all of Bluefield, for defendant in error.

LYNCH, J. This writ requires the review of a judgment for defendant upon a motion for judgment by plaintiff, based upon a sale and delivery of diamonds by it to defendant September 5, 1919. The transaction began and terminated on the same day, ending with the actual transfer by the seller of the possession of the property sold. After the parties had introduced their proof, plaintiff demurred to defendant's evidence, and, having considered the questions arising upon the demurrer, the court overruled it, and entered the judgment complained of. In order better to comprehend the real gist of the controversy, it is necessary to set out the original itemized invoice or bill of sale of the goods sold and delivered, and the terms of the sale and delivery evidenced by it, as they appear upon the face of the instrument sued on, the identity and validity of which counsel concede by a stipulation to that effect. The invoice follows:

"All claims must be made immediately after receipt of goods.

"Braude & McDonnell, Inc., Manufacturing Jewelers.

"High Grade Diamond Mountings, Gold and Diamond Jewelry. No. 3840.

"65 Nassau Street, New York. Sept. 5, 1919.

"Sold to Isadore Cohen Co., Bluefield, W. Va.

"Terms: Net, Jan. 1st.

"Salesman, F. H. Mounts.

"[Then follows itemized description of goods sold and prices, aggregating, net, $1,849.60.]

"Terms Net. Settlement to be made Jan. 1, 1920—all or part cash—balance to be divided into eight equal notes—thirty days apart—first note to be due Feb. 5th.

"F. H. Mounts."

There is no question as to the complete sufficiency of the proof to establish every item of the account and the consideration agreed to be paid. The character of the transaction alone is questioned; that is, whether it was an actual sale accompanied by an unconditional transfer of the title concomitant with the delivery of the goods sold, according to the contention of the plaintiff, or a sale of the goods to defendant, coupled with an authority on his part to return to plaintiff such items of the property as he failed or was unable to sell within a reasonable time after the date of the delivery, technically an agreement of "sale or return" (Williston on Sales, §§ 270 et seq.; 24 R. C. L. Sales, §§ 720 et seq.), as defendant contends. It was upon the latter theory that defendant undertook to reship the goods by express to plaintiff soon after January 5, 1920, a shipment which plaintiff refused to accept and did not accept.

As the demurrer challenges the sufficiency of the proof to entitle defendant to the judgment in its favor, considered in the light of all the facts and circumstances proved by plaintiff, and not inconsistent with those likewise established by the latter, it is permissible and advisable to let Isadore Cohen, the defendant's president, general manager, and also its "buying and financing and selling" agent, for which purpose he devoted all his "working time to the management of the store and selling goods in it," repeat in his own language his interpretation of what occurred between him and Mounts, the agent and representative of the plaintiff, at the time of the sale.

Cohen says:

"Mr. Mounts came in the store on the day that this invoice was made out and offered—came in and asked me if he could display his goods, and I told him he could, and he opened up his goods there on the case, and after I looked at them I wasn't very anxious to buy; and he was a very good salesman, and he talked about his goods, and said that I bought from him when he was with the other concern, and that he was representing a good concern, and he thought it would be to our advantage to buy his goods, and he was very anxious to sell them to me; and I told him that I didn't need them so badly, but I would try it. As a matter of fact, he has two books that he carries with him; one is the straight invoices, and one is memorandum, consignment; and he offered at first to leave the goods on consignment if I wanted it, but I didn't want him to leave them on consignment for the reason that, in case the goods was sold, they could make their own terms; so I told him if he would leave the goods I will take them, and if I sell any of them I shall settle for it the way he has outlined on his contract here, and if I can't sell it I can return it.' We had them in the safe during the months of October, November, and December, kept them all in the safe, and when a customer came in that wanted to see the diamonds we took the diamonds out of the safe—and we haven't succeeded in selling a great many, so about the first of the year we have returned all except the one, for which we inclosed the check in payment of the one we have sold, and asked them to give us credit for the difference."

For the reasons stated in the above excerpt defendant refused to accept the rings on consignment, but took them on invoice, with provision for deferred payment, and, as he testifies, with an oral understanding permitting return of the goods to plaintiff under the conditions heretofore stated. The only question for consideration is whether testimony relating to the alleged oral understanding is admissible to vary the terms of the invoice, which purports on its face to represent an unequivocal sale without conditions or qualifications of any kind or character.

Considered in the light of all the facts and circumstances surrounding the transaction, including the language used and terms prescribed, and the immediate transfer of the possession of the property, the invoice has all the distinguishing features of a written contract of sale except the signature of the purchaser. Immediately preceding the specification of the property are the words, "Sold to Isadore Cohen, Bluefield, W. Va. Terms: Net, Jan. 1st. Salesman, F. H. Mounts;" and following it are the words, "Terms Net. Settlement to be made Jan. 1, 1920—all or part cash—balance to be divided into eight equal notes—thirty days apart—first note to be due Feb. 5th." That the provision as to the terms of payment was incorporated in the invoice at defendant's suggestion, for the purpose of having written evidence of the agreement in the form of a contract, is admitted by him. In response to the question, "Did you write this memorandum down there at the time he gave it to you?" he replied:

"We agreed upon it, but he wrote it. * * * The reason this memorandum is put in there is because we agreed upon—if we cannot sell it, we can return it, and if we sell some of the goods, we will have the right to settle it in this way. * * * I made him put on the invoice the terms, if I didn't sell any of the goods, I can return them; if I did sell it, I can have these terms, which I can take advantage of."

The agent Mounts denies that the privilege of return was accorded defendant under any circumstances, and testifies that the sale was unequivocal and unrestricted by conditions, and that he had no authority to agree to such an arrangement with customers to whom he sold goods. It is unnecessary to enter into any discussion concerning Mount's authority to consent to a return of the goods, except to say that, even though he was expressly forbidden to do such a thing, yet his implied authority may have been such as to bind his principal in case he had undertaken to do so. George De Witt Shoe Co. v. Adkins, 83 W. Va. 267, 98 S. E. 209.

[3] According to the testimony of defendant himself, the parties prepared the invoice so as to express the terms agreed upon between them, and defendant accepted it with that understanding. He was fully aware of all that it contained. Nor was his signature necessary in order to bind him. The acceptance of the invoice was sufficient, and doubly so as it contained the terms which he had insisted upon. "The acceptance of a paper which purports to be a contract sufficiently indicates an assent to its terms, whatever they may be." 1 Williston on Contracts, § 90a. So one may, under certain circumstances, be bound by the terms and conditions contained on telegraph blanks, bills of lading, tickets, or warehouse receipts, by printed notices on letter heads, and by notices on merchandise. 1 Williston on Contracts, §§ 90b-90c. See, also, West Virginia, etc., R. Co. v. McIntire, 44 W. Va. 210, 28 S. E. 696.

[1] Since defendant, in effect, admits the validity of the contract between the parties as to the terms of payment therein expressed, can he now insist, and by parol testimony attempt to prove, that the invoice did not state all that was agreed upon between Mounts and him, but that there was a contemporaneous oral agreement completely altering and changing the apparent finality of the sale? The parol evidence rule does not apply to every contract of which there is written evidence, but only to such as appear on their face to be complete and to embody in one instrument all the essential terms of the agreement. If the parties expressly state, in terms, that the writing shall be but a partial integration of the agreement, or if the contract on its face purports to omit some important feature, then parol evidence may be admitted to explain the omission and show what the full agreement was. Generally, however, a contract must appear on its face to be incomplete in order to permit parol evidence of such additional terms. 2 Williston on Contracts, § 633; Griffin v. Runnion, 74 W. Va. 641, 82 S. E. 686; Petty v. United Fuel Gas Co., 76 W. Va. 288, 85 S. E. 523; Manufacturing Co. v. Smith, 79 W. Va. 736, 91 S. E. 817.

[2] But defendant contends that from a reading of the invoice or bill of sale it is not a necessary inference either that it is a statement of the entire agreement or that it is not, and therefore that parol evidence is admissible to show which is the fact. In response to such contention, Prof. Williston says (2 Williston on Contracts, § 633):

"The difficulty with such a principle lies in its application. No written contract which does not in terms state that it contains the whole agreement (and few do so provide, though it would generally be a wise provision) precludes the possible supposition of additional parol clauses, not inconsistent with the writing. The matter has been well summed up by Finch, J., in Eighmie v. Taylor, 98 N. Y. 288, 294: 'If we may go outside of the instrument to prove that there was a stipulation not contained in it, and so that only part of the contract was put in writing, and then, because of that fact, enforce the oral stipulation, there will be little of value left in the rule itself. The writings which are protected from the effect of contemporaneous oral stipulations are those containing the terms of a contract between the parties, and designed to be the repository and evidence of their final intentions. If upon inspection and study of the writing, read, it may be, in the light of surrounding circumstances in order to its proper understanding and interpretation, it appears to contain the engagements of the parties, and to define the object and measure the extent of such engagement, it constitutes the contract between them, and is presumed to contain the whole of that contract.'"

Of course, the doctrine that an absolute written transfer may be proved by parol to be a mortgage is an exception to the above stated rule, well recognized by courts and depending upon considerations generally different from those affecting ordinary agreements. 2 Williston on Contracts, § 635.

Stock Co., Denver, Colo. Order No. 10839. Terms, net 30 da. Shipped by A. T. & S. Fe. Net Cash. Book * * * Chicago or New York Exchange. 1639 Champa," followed by a description of the goods, with their prices. The defendant buyer sought to introduce parol testimony to show that it had purchased the goods with the express understanding that, if it should be unable to sell or dispose of them, it might return them to plaintiff to be exchanged for other goods. But the court refused to permit this to be done, because the bill on its face showed a complete legal obligation. See, also, monographic note following report of this case in 19 Ann. Cas. 541.

[4] The invoice or bill of sale with which we are dealing is complete in every aspect, and purports to embody or represent a sale without condition or restriction. If defendant desired to incorporate a stipulation securing to it the right of return, it could and should have done so at the time the provision was added relating to terms of payment. Indeed, it is difficult to understand how defendant, who exercised such care with regard to the one, could have overlooked the other. Parol testimony, flatly contradicted by plaintiff cannot be admitted to add to or modify in this manner the invoice contract accepted by the defendant. "In so far as a bill of sale partakes of the nature of a receipt, or is simply declaratory of a fact, it may be explained, or perhaps contradicted; but to the extent that it expresses the contract of the parties, and defines their rights and liabilities, it is subject to the same rule as other written contracts, and precludes the admission of parol or extrinsic evidence." 22 C. J. (Evidence) § 1451.

[5] As under these authorities the defendant's evidence was incompetent in that its effect was to vary the explicit terms of the invoice or contract of sale, the court should have sustained plaintiff's motion, timely made, to exclude it from consideration by the jury, and ignored it as establishing no fact material upon the issues between the parties. Its incompetency nullifies and deprives it of all force as proof, especially when an effort was made to eliminate it from the record. As the court, and not the jury, passed upon the merits of the controversy, the court properly could and should have disregarded it in dealing with the demurrer. This it may have done for aught we know to the contrary. But, if it did, the court erred in adjudging the law to be in favor of the defendant. And if it did not ignore and disregard the incompetent proof, this court will do so, because the demurrer does not have the effect of waiving or operating as a waiver of the objection and exception to the incompetency of the evidence. Dishazer v. Maitland, 12 Leigh (Va.) 524; Muhleman v. Na- tional Ins. Co., 6 W. Va., 508, 514; N. & W. R. Co. v. Warden, 117 Va. 801, 804, 86 S. E. 103; Gillett v. Burlington Ins. Co., 53 Kan. 108, 36 Pac. 52.

For these reasons our order will reverse the judgment, sustain the demurrer to the evidence, and enter judgment here for $1,849.60 in favor of the plaintiff, with interest thereon from January 1, 1920.

WEST VIRGINIA PULP & PAPER CO. et al.
v. COOPER. (No. 4114.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Feb. 22, 1921.)

1. Vendor and purchaser ⇨54, 213(2)—Land subject to attachment, although owner has given unsigned, though recorded, option thereon.

A proposition or option in writing to sell and convey a specific tract of land, at a certain price per acre, and within the time stipulated therein, not signed by the optionee or his agent, nor binding on him, though recorded, leaves the title to the land in the optionor, subject to attachment at the suit of his creditor, but subject to whatever rights the optionee thereby acquired in the land.

2. Vendor and purchaser ⇨214(2) — Unaccepted option vests no title in the optionee or his assignee.

Such option contract before acceptance vests no title, legal or equitable, in the optionee, and the assignment thereof by the optionee vests no title to the land, legal or equitable, in his assignee.

3. Vendor and purchaser ⇨213(2) — Land subject to attachment, although unaccepted, but recorded, option thereon given.

Though such option contract, when recorded pursuant to section 4 of chapter 74 of the Code (sec. 3834), protects the optionee or his assignee in any rights acquired under the contract, they are not complete purchasers of the land, and the land remains subject to attachment at the suit of a creditor of the optionor.

4. Lis pendens ⇨25(1)—Purchaser under unaccepted option pending attachment held a pendente lite purchaser.

When pending a suit by a creditor, and upon attachment levied to sell the land, in the lower court or here upon appeal, such optionor undertakes to sell and convey the land attached to such optionee or his assignee, the purchaser or purchasers are pendente lite purchasers and will be bound by any decree made in the cause affecting the rights of the vendor or his attaching creditor.

5. Lis pendens ⇨11(2) — Purchaser of land pending appeal in attachment suit a pendente lite purchaser.

And if one purchases such land pending a rehearing awarded here on appeal by the op-tionor, from the decree below against him, and the decree subsequently entered here reverses the decree below, dismisses plaintiff's bill and quashes his attachment, nevertheless, if upon a bill of review filed in time by the plaintiff for newly discovered evidence, the decree of this court be set aside or reversed, and upon such original bill and bill of review the decree be in favor of plaintiff for his debt, and upon the attachment originally levied, that the land attached be sold to satisfy the same, such purchaser will be bound by such decree as a pendente lite purchaser.

6. Lis pendens ¶11(2)—Decree upon bill of review held binding upon pendente lite purchaser.

While the filing of a bill of review constitutes a new suit for some purposes, as does also the suing out of appellate process, and to the extent of protecting purchasers under the judgment or decree sought to be reversed, nevertheless, for the purposes of protecting plaintiff's or appellant's rights and preserving jurisdiction of the subject matter of the suit, they constitute a continuation of the old suit, and as against all pendente lite purchasers of the property involved, the property proceeded against remains subject to the jurisdiction of the court, and any decree pronounced upon such bill of review or appeal, binds such pendente lite purchaser as well as the parties to the suit.

7. Equity ¶443 — Bill lies to review decree for after-discovered evidence after determination on appeal.

That a bill of review lies to review for after-discovered evidence a decree below after affirmation or reversal here on appeal is settled law in this state.

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

8. Vendor and purchaser ¶18(1/2)—"Option contract" defined.

A contract by which one binds himself to sell and convey to another certain property at a stipulated price within a specified or reasonable time, leaving it in the discretion of the other party to take and pay for the property, is termed in law an "option contract."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Option.]

9. Lis pendens ¶1—Doctrine stated.

The common-law doctrine of lis pendens is that one who purchases from a party pending suit a part or the whole of the subject-matter involved in the litigation takes it subject to the final disposition of the cause and is bound by the decision that may be entered against the party from whom he derived title.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Upshur County.

Suit by the West Virginia Pulp & Paper Company and another against John T. Cooper.

Decree for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Modified and affirmed.

E. A. Bowers and Talbott & Hoover, all of Elkins, and Young & McWhorter, of Buckhannon, for appellants.

W. E. R. Byrne, of Charleston, for appellee.

MILLER, J. Plaintiffs, the West Virginia Pulp & Paper Company and the Upper Elk Coal Company, on May 23, 1918, filed their bill in the Circuit Court of Upshur County against the defendant, John T. Cooper, among other things alleging that they were the owners and were in possession of a tract of land called the Upton Tract of 10,012 acres, lying in Webster, Randolph and Pocahontas Counties, and that the same land had been decreed to be sold to satisfy a debt of $12,404.00 with interest and costs in a suit upon a bill of review pending in said court, in which said Cooper was plaintiff and Carolyn Upton and others were defendants, by a decree entered therein on June 8, 1917, to enforce the lien of certain attachments levied upon said land in the original suit of Cooper against E. M. Upton, then in life, now deceased; and further charging that said attachments for the reason alleged were void and unenforceable by a sale of said land, and that said decree of sale constituted a threatened cloud upon their title thereto, and a menace and prejudice to plaintiffs, affecting the market value thereof; and further charging that they were not liable for said debt, and were not advised whether the defendants in said suit intended to satisfy the debt so decreed to Cooper, but believed they did not so intend, and that they were advised and believed that the special commissioner appointed to sell the land would proceed to enforce said decree unless prevented by process of law. And upon said bill, on the day of the filing thereof, plaintiffs obtained an injunction restraining and inhibiting Cooper from proceeding in any way whatsoever to enforce his decree of sale of June 8, 1917, against said tract of 10,012 acres and every part thereof, until the further order of the court.

To this bill Cooper appeared and demurred, assigning as grounds: First, that the facts alleged therein do not justify the granting of the relief prayed for; second, that plaintiffs have an adequate remedy, if entitled to any relief, by proceeding pursuant to section 23 of chapter 106 of the Code (sec. 4477).

The final decree which appellants would have us reverse, pronounced on March 23, 1920, adjudicated that defendant's demurrer be sustained as to the first ground, but overruled as to the second, and plaintiffs declining to amend, it was adjudged that their bill be dismissed and that the injunction theretofore awarded thereon be and the same was wholly dissolved, and that defendant recover his costs.

The bill with the accompanying exhibits disclose the fact that none of the appellants were parties to the original suit of Cooper against Upton, nor were they impleaded upon the bill of review.

Three principal propositions are advanced by appellants for reversal of the decree: First, that the circuit court in its final decree upon Cooper's bill of review for after discovered evidence erroneously adjudged that the attachments sued out by him upon his original bill and levied upon said Upton tract of 10,012 acres, upon the filing of said bill of review within one year after final decree, continued to constitute liens on said land and enforceable thereby, regardless of the prior decision of this court upon appeal by Upton reversing the decree below against him in favor of Cooper, quashing said attachments and dismissing his bill, first pronounced November 27, 1906, 60 W. Va. 648, 64 S. E. 523, and finally determined in the same way on rehearing by decree and mandate entered here, and certified to the circuit court on March 30, 1909, 65 W. Va. 401, 64 S. E. 527; second, that the court below erroneously held that the original notices of his pendens of Cooper's original suit so finally dismissed by this court upon appeal constituted sufficient notices of his lis pendens on bill of review; third, that the circuit court by its decree on bill of review erroneously held that the contract of sale in writing, purporting to have been made by one J. K. Moore, as agent for Upton, dated April 8, 1902, and recorded in Randolph County April 28, 1902, in Pocahontas County May 1, 1902, and in Webster County May 8, 1902, under which appellants claim title to said 10,012 acres, did not constitute an equitable sale of said land, with notice to Cooper, a creditor, precluding him from asserting a lien thereon by attachment sued out on the date of his original suit, May 28, 1903, and levied in Webster and Randolph Counties respectively May 28 and May 30, 1903.

We are disposed to respond to these propositions in the inverse order of their statement by counsel. The alleged contract by Moore as agent for Upton, of April 8, 1902, relied on to defeat the lien of Cooper's attachment is as follows:

"April 8, 1902.

"As agent for E. M. Upton, of Rochester, N. Y., and others, owners of what is known as the Porter tract of land consisting of ten thousand and twelve (10,012) acres, situated in the counties of Pocahontas, Randolph and Webster, West Virginia, and on the Leatherwood and Bergo Creeks which empty into the Elk River, I sell the above tract to Arthur Lee, Trustee, in fee, at thirteen dollars ($13.00) per acre, to be paid for in cash upon delivery of a general warranty deed with good and sufficient title free from incumbrances.

"I hereby acknowledge receipt of a check for five thousand dollars ($5,000.00) in favor of E.

M. Upton, on the Mercantile Trust & Deposit Company of Baltimore signed by H. G. Davis, as payment on account of the purchase money upon above Porter tract.

"My authority for signing this agreement of sale is letters, and a telegram from E. M. Upton, dated Rochester, N. Y. April 7, 1902, addressed to me, and which reads as follows: 'Close deal at thirteen dollars net to us, if five thousand dollars is deposited in some bank as Trustee.' J. K. Moore, Agent."

"Signed in duplicate.

This paper purports to have been acknowledged before a notary public in Washington, D. C., April 24, 1902, and to have been recorded in Webster and Randolph Counties on April 28, 1902, and May 1, 1902, respectively. The record shows, however, that while the legal title to the land stood in the name of Upton others were beneficially interested with him and that subsequently, on May 16, 1902, at a meeting of the owners in New York, a paper was signed by them but not then acknowledged. On June 23, 1903, it was acknowledged by Baldwin, Upton and McGraw before a notary public of Taylor County, West Virginia, and proven by the oaths of Upton and Baldwin as to Warner, Beckley and Rumsey before the clerk of the County Court of Randolph County on June 24, 1903, and on the same day admitted to record in that county by him, as follows:

"Memorandum of agreement made and entered into this sixteenth day of May, 1902, by the parties hereto.

"Whereas Eli M. Upton holds the legal title to what is known as the Elk lands, comprising ten thousand and twelve (10,012) acres on the waters of Elk River in the state of West Virginia, and better known as the Porter land; and

"Whereas the said Eli M. Upton, with the concurrence and consent of all the owners of said land with the exception of John T. McGraw did sell the said Arthur Lee, Trustee, for Henry G. Davis, at and for the sum of thirteen dollars ($13) per acre net to the owners thereof; and

"Whereas at a meeting of all of the owners of said land this day held at the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel, in the city of New York, all of the parties owning said lands have concurred in said sale and desire to ratify and confirm the act of the said Eli M. Upton in so selling said land to said Lee, Trustee for said Davis, at said price of thirteen dollars ($13) per acre; and

"Whereas the said McGraw declining to concur in the sale of said land and at said meeting of the owners thereof this day held the said McGraw, for reasons which are sufficient and satisfactory to him, did concur in said sale, this making the sale of the whole of said land comprising said ten thousand and twelve (10,012) acres to said Lee, Trustee for said Davis, full and complete:

"Now therefore this agreement witnesseth: That the said parties, the owners of said lands, do concur in, ratify and confirm the act of the said Upton in selling the said land to said Lee,

Trustee for said Davis, thus making the title of the said land full and complete in the purchaser thereof under the sale so made by the said Upton, Trustee.

"Witness the following signatures and seals:

"E. M. Upton.
 "A. T. Baldwin.
 "C. M. Warner.
 "L. N. Beckley.
 "Jno. T. McGraw.
 "William Rumsey."

It will be observed that neither Arthur Lee, Trustee, nor Henry G. Davis were subscribing parties to either of these papers; and the bill shows that no attempt was made to put them into execution by deed until July 9, 1903, on which day a deed purporting to have been made by Eli M. Upton and Fannie M., his wife, parties of the first part, and Arthur Lee and Grace D. Lee, of the second part, and Henry G. Davis of the third part, was acknowledged by said first parties in Monroe County, New York, on July 14, 1903, and by the second parties in Randolph County, West Virginia, on July 24, 1903, and together with a decree of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of West Virginia, referred to in said deed, was admitted to record in Randolph County, which deed recites the source of title of said Upton, that he had contracted to sell said land to Arthur Lee, Trustee, at the price of thirteen dollars per acre, and that at the time of said sale there was pending undetermined in the said Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of West Virginia a suit in equity in which said Upton was plaintiff and James Woodzell and others were defendants, in which the title and boundary of said land was in controversy, and in which suit by decree pronounced June 12, 1903, the right and title of so much of said 10,012 acres as laid in Randolph County, estimated at 7,800 acres, was confirmed, and reciting also under a "whereas" that said Davis had elected to take at said price of thirteen dollars per acre all of the boundary of said land lying in the County of Randolph, estimated to be 7,378 acres, and all thereof lying in Pocahontas County, estimated at 150 acres, and aggregating 7,528 acres, and to pay for the same at the rate of thirteen dollars per acre, as part performance by said Upton of his contract, and which election was accepted and concurred in by said parties of the first part, and which deed further witnessed that for and in consideration of thirteen dollars per acre, aggregating $97,864.00, paid to the said Eli M. Upton by the said Henry G. Davis, the receipt whereof was thereby acknowledged, the said parties of the first and second parts thereto purport to grant and convey by metes and bounds unto said Davis those portions of said land lying in the counties of Randolph and Pocahontas, aggregating 7,528 acres. And said deed also provided that the title to the remaining parts of said 10,012 acres lying in the county of Webster was to remain in said Upton for the present, subject to the said contract of sale to Arthur Lee, Trustee. This deed was admitted to record in Randolph County July 24, 1903. If ever admitted to record in Pocahontas County, the record does not show it.

Said contracts and so much of said deed to Henry G. Davis are recited herein for the purpose of showing the nature of the contracts and deed, and the status of the title to said land, and the record thereof as affecting the right of Cooper depending on his attachments sued out and levied thereon on May 28, and following, in 1903. As already shown, these attachments antedated the recordation of the alleged contract of May 16, 1902, not recorded until May 23, 1903, but were subsequent in date to the alleged contract of April 8, 1902, recorded April 24, 1902. The present bill with its exhibits shows that the authority of Moore to make this unilateral contract was put in issue in the original suit of Cooper against Upton; and it appears from the record of that suit, exhibited with the bill in this suit, that the contract was not ratified by the owners until the contract of May 16, 1902, not recorded until June, 1903. But assuming authority of Moore to make the contract, what was its effect on the rights of Cooper as an attaching creditor of Upton, in his original suit and the attachments then levied on said land? Clearly, neither of these contracts or papers amounted to more than propositions or options to sell the land to Lee, Trustee for Davis, not accepted by Davis or Lee until the deed for the Randolph and Pocahontas lands was executed and delivered on July 9, 1903, for in that deed it is recited, as already shown, that Davis thereby elected to take not all, but only the portions of said tract lying in Randolph and Pocahontas counties; and it is pertinent to again refer to the facts recited in the deed that the election was not made until after the date of the decree in Upton versus Woodzell, settling Upton's title to the Randolph part of the land, had been entered. Another pertinent fact appearing upon the face of the bill and exhibits is that by the deed of June 9, 1903, Upton thereby acknowledges payment of the entire amount of the purchase money for the acreage Davis so elected to take. It does not appear that the check for $5,000.00, not cash, receipted for in the option contract of April 8, 1902, was ever collected, or that any other thing of value was parted with by Davis or Lee at that time.

Appellants took title under Davis, and unless the proposition affirmed and relied on by counsel be well founded in law, namely, that the making and recordation of the contract of April 8, 1902, precluded Cooper from acquiring by his subsequent attachments any rights upon the land contracted for, Davis when he elected in July, 1903, to take the land and procured the deed of that date from Upton and the Lees, was a pendente lite purchaser with notice of the attachments and the lis pendens recorded.

The proposition of counsel depends on the character of Upton's title or right after the record of the option contract, and whether the land standing in his name was attachable at the suit of Cooper. The position of appellants' counsel is that Cooper's only remedy, in view of the recorded contract, was to summon Davis, or Lee, Trustee, as garnishees, and thereby acquire a lien on the money in their hands due Upton on the contract. But only Upton, not Lee or Davis, was bound by these unilateral agreements. Davis did not elect to take the land until after Upton's title had been adjudicated by the Federal Court, in June, 1903. In this status of the title and the rights of the parties, was not the land of Upton attachable? If the land was attachable, then Cooper by his attachments as decreed by the lower court, acquired a lien thereon, and process of garnishment was not his remedy. At this time neither Davis nor Lee, Trustee, owed Upton anything, and no doubt this would have been their defense on garnishment.

[1, 2, 3] A contract by which one binds himself to sell and convey to another certain property at a stipulated price within a specified or reasonable time, leaving it in the discretion of the other party to take and pay for the property, is termed in law an option contract. Such a contract transfers to the optionee no title to the property. His right is not in rem, but in personam. The right thus acquired is to call for specific execution within the time limited. 21 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 924, 925. And we have held, in accordance with the principle laid down in the authority cited, that such an option contract does not vest in the person to whom the offer of sale is made any title to the land, either legal or equitable, and that his assignment under the contract passes no title to the assignee. Rease v. Kittle, 56 W. Va. 269, 49 S. E. 150. So that, according to the authorities, neither Davis nor Lee acquired any title to the land of Upton invalidating Cooper's attachments.

"Any contract in writing, made in respect to real estate or goods and chattels, in consideration of marriage, or made for the conveyance or sale of real estate, or a term therein of more than five years, shall, from the time it is duly admitted to record, be, as against creditors and purchasers, as valid as if the contract was a deed conveying the estate or interest embraced in the contract."

[3] Undoubtedly this statute protected Davis and Lee in whatever interest they acquired by the contract. But it amounted simply to an unaccepted option at the time of Cooper's attachments; neither got anything thereby except the right at his election to buy, and then subject to whatever rights may have intervened in favor of others against the land. In case judgment had been recovered against Upton and recorded against the land, the optionee, when he came to exercise his right of purchase subsequently, would have been bound to take notice, and before paying the purchase money would have had the obligation thrust upon him of seeing the lien discharged out of the purchase money. And the same obligation would rest on the purchaser exercising his rights under the option, to look after liens acquired on the land by attachments properly levied. The cases of Conaway & Smith v. Sweeney, 24 W. Va. 643, Thorn v. Phares, 35 W. Va. 771, 14 S. E. 399, and Withers v. Carter, 4 Grat. (Va.) 407, 50 Am. Dec. 78, involved cases where actual sales of land by contracts recorded were involved, and of course the rights of the purchasers were protected by the statute. But here we have only the option contracts, with right of election to take or not to take the land, not exercised until after the rights of Cooper under his attachment became effective.

The proposition advanced by counsel for appellants that land thus sold or optioned but not yet conveyed is not subject to attachment is negatived by the authorities. They hold that the interest of the vendor in the land is attachable. 6 Corpus Juris, p. 207, § 378. In Sheehy v. Scott, 128 Iowa, 551, 104 N. W. 1139, 4 L. R. A. (N. S.) 365, the direct question here presented was involved. It was there held that, when the contract though executory is completed, the vendor holds the legal title in trust, and his interest in the land is not attachable; but when the contract, as in the case here, is not purely executory and in no way binds the optionee to complete the purchase, the contract does not vest in him any interest in the land, and that the land is attachable as the land of the vendor. And in Cogshall v. Marine Bank Co., 68 Ohio St. 88, 57 N. E. 1086, it was decided that the interest of a vendor in such a case is not that of a mere naked trustee for the vendee, but a beneficial estate in the lands to the extent of the unpaid purchase money. The rule must apply with greater force, where as here the contract was unilateral, not binding on the purchaser, without acceptance of the option, converting the contract into one binding him also. See, also, as bearing on this proposition, Brett v. Thompson, 46 Me. 480, and French v. Sturdivant, 8 Me. (8 Greenl.) 246.

Upon these authorities we conclude that the interest of a vendor in an option contract, unilateral in character, not binding on the vendee, but with right of election in him to purchase, is an interest in land subject to attachment at the suit of a creditor of the vendor, and binding the interest of the vendor therein.

[4, 5] The next question, covering the first and second propositions advanced, is, were the rights of Cooper as attaching creditor of Upton terminated by the final decree of this court upon appeal by Upton from the decree in favor of Cooper in his original suit, pronounced here November 30, 1909? The appellants claim title under Davis and McGraw, and their purchases were all prior to the date of the final decree of this court. The case was pending in this court upon rehearing granted Cooper when the Upper Elk Coal Company acquired its title, and continued pending, either in the court below or here, from the time it was instituted until the final decree of March 30, 1909. So that Davis and his successors in title were all pendente lite purchasers as to Cooper's suit and bound by notice thereof unless relieved by the final decree here, and were unaffected by Cooper's bill of review filed in the circuit court for after discovered evidence on October 19, 1909, only a little more than six months after the date of said final decree.

[6] The statute gave Cooper a year after said decree in which to present his bill of review. But it is contended that the bill of review constituted a new suit in so far as Cooper sought thereby to review his rights as attaching creditor under his original bill without suing out new attachments and recording anew notice of his pendens, and that his efforts in that respect were abortive and the decree appealed from in his favor therein is erroneous and ought to be reversed. It is undoubtedly true that bills of review, like writs of error and appeal, are for some purposes in the nature of new suits. They are so for the purpose of protecting purchasers under decrees sought to be reviewed for error, between the date of such decree and the filing of a bill of review or suing out of appellate process. We have so decided in the several cases cited and relied on by appellants' counsel, notably the cases of Dunfee v. Childs, 59 W. Va. 225, 239, 53 S. E. 209; Wingfield v. Neall, 60 W. Va. 106, 54 S. E. 47, 10 L. R. A. (N. S.) 443, 116 Am. St. Rep. 882, 9 Ann. Cas. 982; and Perkins v. Pfalzgraff, 60 W. Va. 121, 53 S. E. 913. If appellants had become purchasers of the lands between the date of said final decree and the date of the filing of Cooper's bill of review, they would undoubtedly be protected by the principles of those cases and others; but they did not. They purchased when Cooper's suit was still pending, either in the circuit court or in this court, and they were not purchasers under decrees entered in that suit.

Dunbar, 32 W. Va. 335, 9 S. E. 237; Dunfee v. Childs, supra; McLanahan v. Mills, 73 W. Va. 246, 80 S. E. 351. Such a decree can not be reheard after affirmance here for mere matters of law or fact apparent, but only for after discovered evidence. As to those errors of law or fact appearing on the former decree, affirmed here, they are res adjudicata and can not be again reviewed by bill of review, or otherwise impeached, except for fraud or upon some other ground of equitable jurisdiction.

Such being the settled law relating to bills of review, how shall it be applied to the case at bar? It is said that the decree appealed from operated to set aside the decree of this court reversing the decree of the lower court and dismissing Cooper's bill, which it is argued is without precedent. But if Cooper was entitled to his bill of review for evidence discovered after the decree, how could he have the benefits thereof without such result to our decree? No matter that a bill of review, as is also an appeal is a new suit for some purposes, already alluded to it is not so to the extent that it has no connection with nor effect upon the original suit or the decree therein. The purpose of both proceedings is the same, namely, the correction of errors in a decree or judgment already entered, and it would be a strange doctrine that such purpose could be frustrated by the fiction that such proceedings on error constituted new suits. State v. Moore, 77 W. Va. 325, 328, 87 S. E. 867. Certainly reversal of a decree on bill of review or appeal would restore plaintiff to his rights and remedies as against the parties to the suit; and if as to them, why not also as to pendente lite purchasers? In this case, as we hold, appellants stand in the shoes of Upton, except as to any rights in which they are protected by the option contracts pleaded and relied on, which we have already attempted to define.

[9] There are some decisions to the contrary, it seems, but the great weight of authority is that a purchaser after judgment or decree, but while the decree is subject to review or further proceedings thereunder, takes subject thereto. 25 Cyc. 1472, note 2, citing among other cases, Farmers' Bank of Frankfort v. First National Bank, 30 Ind. App. 520, 66 N. E. 503. Such is the law applicable to bills of review or appeals except in the instances observed in our cases of Dunfee v. Childs, and other cases cited. 25 Cyc. 1473. As already observed, appellants do not come within the protection of those cases. As recently decided here, the common-law doctrine of lis pendens is that one who purchases from a party pending suit a part or the whole of the subject matter involved in the litigation, takes it subject to the final disposition of the cause and is bound by the decision that may be entered against the party from whom he derived title. Rardin v. Rardin, 102 S. E. 295. An amendment to the bill, or complaint, after the purchase or the acquisition of other rights pendente lite which does not alter the cause of action, does not affect the lis pendens, since it relates back to the filing of the original bill. So the law is stated in 25 Cyc. 1743, and the cases cited in the note thereto.

A bill of review for after discovered evidence does not change the cause of action; it only seeks to open up the cause to let in the evidence of the facts well pleaded in the original bill. If a new cause of action was pleaded and relied on, the original bill perhaps would not be notice thereof nor bind a pendente lite purchaser.

One question is presented on appeal which we can not overlook. Manifestly the attention of the circuit court was not called to the fact that pending the suit 540.5 acres of the land levied on by Cooper was adjudged to belong to Christian Seybolt and not to Upton. Appellants did not purchase the land from Upton, but subsequently to the judgment in favor of Seybolt, it was purchased by them or one of them from Seybolt; otherwise they would not now be injuriously affected by the error in the decree sustaining Cooper's demurrer. Their bill on its face presented good ground for relief as to that portion of the land attached and decreed to be sold; and doubtless if the court's attention had been particularly directed to the fact, the demurrer would have been overruled as to that matter and Cooper ruled to answer, as he ought to have been. However, as the record shows ample property to satisfy Cooper's judgment without the tract of 540.5 acres, it will not likely be necessary for him to pursue it further in the prosecution of this suit.

For the foregoing reasons, we are of opinion to modify the decree so as to overrule Cooper's demurrer to so much of the bill as sought relief against the sale of the 540.5 acres, and in all other respects to affirm the same.

As Cooper substantially prevails here, he will recover his costs in this court.

MCCULLOUGH v. CLARK. (No. 4117.)*

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Feb. 22, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Appeal and error \S 1002—Verdict on conflicting evidence not set aside unless indicating passion or prejudice.

The verdict of a jury, based upon conflicting evidence, will not be set aside, unless the evidence so strongly preponderates against the verdict as to indicate that the jury was moved by passion, prejudice, or some other improper influence.

2. Appeal and error \S 930(1), 1004(1)—Verdict presumed based on evidence; verdict for damages will not be disturbed if within estimates in testimony.

There is a presumption that the verdict of a jury is based upon a fair consideration of all matters presented to it, and if in an action for damages for breach of a contract the evidence does not certainly fix the amount of such damages, but depends upon varying amounts fixed by different witnesses, the verdict will not be disturbed if the amount found is within the estimates given in the testimony.

3. Appeal and error \S 932(1)—Jury will not be considered to have included items not supported by evidence.

In an action for damages for breach of contract it will not be held that the jury included an item not supported by the evidence and rejected in toto another finding support in the evidence, upon the sole ground that to include such improper item with others found by the jury will make the exact amount of the verdict, while to exclude such item and include the whole of the item finding support in the evidence would make an amount in excess of the verdict.

4. Sales \S 418(2)—Measure of damages for breach of contract to deliver personal property at definite time stated.

Where, in an action for breach of a contract, it appears that the plaintiff was entitled to receive certain personal property at a definite time, his measure of damages is the value of such property at the time and place it should have been delivered to him, less any amount remaining unpaid upon the purchase money, with interest thereon to the date of the verdict.

5. Trial \S 237(4)—Instruction defining "preponderance of evidence" held not improper.

An instruction properly defining the term "preponderance of the evidence" is not improper in a case where the jury has been instructed that certain elements must be proven by a preponderance of the evidence, even though there are other elements which the jury have been instructed must be proved by evidence clear, full and convincing.

6. Appeal and error \S 207—Improper argument not considered in absence of request for instruction.

This court will not consider errors predicated upon the abuse of counsel of the privilege of argument, unless it appears that the complaining party asked for and was refused an instruction to the jury to disregard the improper remarks, and duly excepted to such refusal.

*Rehearing denied April 5, 1921.

Young & McWhorter and J. M. N. Downes, all of Buckhannon, for plaintiff in error.

Samuel T. Spears and Talbott & Hoover, all of Elkins, for defendant in error.

RITZ, P. The defendant by this writ of error seeks reversal of a judgment against him for the sum of $203,907.28, for damages for the breach of an alleged contract for the sale of certain corporate stock.

Plaintiff and defendant for many years had been business associates, and in the spring of 1915 were jointly interested in lumber operations in the state of West Virginia, carried on in the name of Virginia Lumber Company, and in like operations in Virginia, Tennessee, and North Carolina, conducted in the name of Damascus Lumber Company. In addition to these companies, in which they had a common interest, there were some other concerns in which they were likewise jointly interested, but which are only incidentally involved in this litigation. In addition to the interest which the defendant had in common with the plaintiff, he was largely interested in many other concerns with which the plaintiff had no connection. For a few months prior to April, 1915, the Virginia Lumber Company and the Damascus Lumber Company, owned and controlled by the parties to this suit, were having trouble in carrying on their affairs. The plants had, to a large extent at least, closed down, and the parties were having difficulty in securing sufficient funds to meet the outstanding obligations. Many conferences were had between McCullough and Clark with a view to devising means to put these concerns on a sound financial basis. In addition to needing money for the purpose of taking care of these companies, Clark also needed considerable sums of money to take care of his other interests. It sufficiently appears that both of the parties had plenty of assets to take care of their liabilities, their difficulties being in providing liquid assets as the same were needed. McCullough claims that after a conference lasting over several days Clark proposed to him that he would sell his interest in the Virginia Lumber Company for the sum of $325,000, and in the Damascus Lumber Company for the amount that he had invested in that company, less such amounts as had been withdrawn therefrom by him, with interest compounded every four months; or that he would buy McCullough's interests in these companies on the same basis, the proposition being indivisible, contemplating the purchase or sale of both properties at the same time; that he considered this proposition and came to the conclusion that he and his associates could handle the same, and on the 24th of April, 1915, in the city of Philadelphia, accepted Clark's proposition to sell on the above terms; that this was late on Saturday evening, and for that reason the matter of preparing the formal contracts was deferred until the next Monday; that he communicated with Mr. Bowers, who was interested with him in the Virginia Lumber Company proposition, and procured his attendance at Philadelphia on Monday with a view to having him render financial assistance in making the purchase; that he and the defendant Clark spent a large part of the next day, Sunday, the 25th of April, at the Manufacturers' Club, and talked over to a considerable extent the transaction which had been concluded on the day before; that on Monday morning Mr. Bowers arrived, and he explained to Bowers what he had done, and Bowers agreed to take some further interest in the Virginia Lumber Company upon the basis of the purchase made by McCullough; that they then went to Clark's office for the purpose of putting their agreements in writing; that Clark was informed that Bowers would be jointly interested with McCullough in the Virginia Lumber Company proposition, but would not take any interest in the Damascus purchase, for which reason it would be necessary to make separate contracts covering the sale of his interest in each of these companies; that this was satisfactory to Clark, and they began the preparation of a contract in writing, which is introduced into the record, evidencing the sale of Clark's interest in the Virginia Lumber Company to McCullough and Bowers.

It appears that the parties were engaged in the preparation of this contract practically the whole of the day; Bowers and McCullough being of the opinion that it was about 5 o'clock when the same was completed and executed by the parties, and Clark stating that in his opinion it was even later than that. After this contract was concluded, McCullough claims that he then called upon Clark to prepare the contract showing the sale of his interest in the Damascus Lumber Company to him, and that Clark replied that it was then late, and that he had some important mail requiring attention, and asked him and Bowers to go to the hotel, and when he had attended to his pressing affairs he would come down and join them at supper. In this he is corroborated by Bowers. He and Bowers did leave Clark's office and went to the Walton Hotel, where they awaited Clark's appearance. Some time later Clark, in accordance with his promise, did appear, and the three had supper together. McCullough says that while they were at the hotel, and during the course of the meal, he took up with Clark again the matter of the preparation of a formal written contract evidencing his purchase of Clark's interest in the Damascus Lumber Company, and that Clark then advised him that it would be impossible to prepare this contract until they had had an audit made of the Damascus Lumber Company's accounts, and the amount coming to him thus determined; that he (McCullough) insisted that this was not necessary; that in the written contract the consideration could be specified in a general way, and could thereafter be determined by an audit made of the company's business; that Clark protested against preparing the contract in this way, and that some heated conversation followed; and that instead of preparing the Damascus Lumber Company contract the next morning as McCullough insisted should be done Clark left the city. As to what happened at the hotel on this occasion, McCullough is corroborated by Bowers, who was present and heard the conversation. Clark contends that McCullough never mentioned to him the matter of preparing any contract for the sale of his interest in the Damascus property at his office after the contract evidencing the sale of the Virginia Lumber Company interests had been concluded, but he admits that McCullough did insist on the preparation of this contract at the Walton Hotel, but contends that he then and there repudiated the idea that he had made any sale of his interest, and told McCullough that when they had an audit made and found how they stood he would then be willing to consider a proposition for the sale of his interest. McCullough and Bowers interested some other parties with them in the Virginia Lumber Company purchase, and for the next few months the parties seem to have been pretty closely engaged in concluding the transfer of these interests from Clark to McCullough and his associates. This transaction was finally consummated with a slight modification on account of a vendor's lien on some of the property, which it was agreed should be taken care of by the purchaser instead of by Clark as had been originally designed.

McCullough contends that at various times after the April transaction he demanded of Clark that he perform his contract by turning over to him his interest in the Damascus Company, and that Clark never at any time denied that he had made the contract, but always insisted that he could not finally consummate it until an audit of the company's affairs was made, and the amount to be paid to him determined, while Clark contends that McCullough never on any of these occasions made any contention that he had purchased his Damascus Lumber Company interest, but did make various propositions for a purchase of his interest in that company, or for a sale to Clark of his (McCullough's) interest, and that Clark always advised him that, as soon as the audit was made and the status of affairs determined, he would consider a proposition along that line. It seems that the Thayer Company was indebted to the Damascus Lumber Company in a considerable sum of money, the exact amount of which depended upon a settlement with that company. In the fall of the year 1915, McCullough wrote this company advising it, among other things, that he had bought Clark's interest in the Damascus Company, and was then the sole owner of it, and that he desired a settlement of the outstanding balance. A copy of this letter he forwarded to Clark. Clark, upon receipt of it, responded repudiating the statement that McCullough had acquired his interest in the Damascus Lumber Company, and McCullough contends that this is the first time that Clark ever did deny to him that he had not sold his interest upon the terms above indicated.

A representative of the Thayer Company did meet Clark and McCullough in Philadelphia in the early part of December, 1915, and a settlement was made of the accounts between the two concerns, and that company paid the balance which it owed amounting to about $45,000. McCullough says at this time he again insisted on Clark having an audit made, and that Clark then promised him that he would send at once for the bookkeeper of the Damascus Lumber Company, who was stationed at Damascus, Va., and have him bring all of his books and records to Philadelphia, and together with his secretary, Mr. Van Every, an audit would be made, and just as soon as the amount to be paid him under the terms of the contract was thus ascertained he would conclude the transaction. This was on the 2d day of December, 1915. Clark admits that he did agree to send for Mr. Midlam, the company's bookkeeper at Damascus, for the purpose of having an audit made of all the affairs of the Damascus Company, with a view of ascertaining how each of the parties stood, so that he could either make McCullough a proposition to purchase his interest, or else McCullough make him one to acquire Clark's interest in that company, and insists that this was the only purpose in having an audit made. McCullough, it appears, went to the Damascus Lumber Company's operation at Damascus, Va., immediately after this meeting, and while there inquired of Mr. Midlam, the bookkeeper, whether he had been requested by Mr. Clark to bring his books and records to Philadelphia for the purpose of making this audit with Mr. Van Every, and upon being advised that he had not received any such directions McCullough wrote to Clark advising him that Midlam had not yet received directions to come to Philadelphia to proceed with the audit, and insisted upon Clark giving instructions at once. Subsequently Clark did write to Midlam and directed him to come to Philadelphia with all of the records of the Damascus Lumber Company to make the audit desired, working in conjunction with Mr. Van Every, Mr. Clark's private secretary, who had charge of Mr. Clark's books. Pursuant to these instructions, Midlam did come to Philadelphia and bring with him all of the Damascus Lumber Company's books. This was about the middle of March, 1916. Upon his arrival he and Mr. Van Every entered upon the work of making an audit under the supervision and direction of Mr. Clark and Mr. McCullough. They completed the work which they were directed to undertake some time in the early part of May, 1916. This audit made by Midlam and Van Every was a complete exposition of the dealings that Clark had with the Damascus Lumber Company, and nothing more. It undertook to show all of the money paid into this company by Clark for the purchase of timber, the payment of taxes, and all other purposes, as well as all of the money withdrawn therefrom by him, and to ascertain the amount which Clark would be entitled to receive from the company as of the first day of May, 1915, compounding the interest on his balance each four months. No attempt was made by these auditors to ascertain the status of McCullough's affairs with the company.

It will be observed that, by this audit the amount which Clark was entitled to receive for his interest in the Damascus Lumber Company, in accordance with the contract claimed by McCullough, was ascertained, and this was the only thing that was ascertained. This amount was fixed as of the 1st day of May, 1915, the time at which McCullough says Clark was to turn over his interest. The amount was ascertained by compounding the interest on the amounts advanced by Clark to the company from the very beginning at four months intervals, which McCullough says was the method agreed upon in the contract between him and Clark for the determination of the amount Clark was to receive for his interest, and it is also further significant that the auditors engaged upon this work went no further than to ascertain the amount that Clark was entitled to as of the 1st day of May, 1915. McCullough says that a few days before the auditors completed their work he called Clark's attention to the fact that the work was about done, and he wanted him to be prepared to execute his contract for the sale of his interest when the work was completed and the exact amount ascertained; that Clark at that time told him that when the audit was completed he would consider any proposition that he had to make, but repudiated any arrangement theretofore made; that he insisted upon Clark carrying out the contract he had made, but that Clark told him he was not going to do so unless he had to; that when the audit was completed he again called upon Clark to carry out his part of the contract, and Clark refused to do so, repudiated the same, and to escape from McCullough's importunities left the city of Philadelphia, but kept in communication with his office over the telephone, and did not return until he found that McCullough had also left for his home. Shortly thereafter this suit was instituted to recover damages for the failure upon the part of Clark to deliver his stock in the Damascus Lumber Company, in accordance with the contract of purchase claimed by McCullough.

McCullough is supported in his contention as to the contract between him and Clark by the testimony of several other witnesses who heard conversations between the parties, in which Clark in effect admitted making the contract, and his purpose to carry it out when the audit was completed. On the other hand, Clark contends that there never was any contract between him and McCullough for the purchase of his interest in the Damascus Lumber Company; that he and McCullough were contemplating a general settlement of all the affairs between them, and that the audit made by Midlam and Van Every above referred to, was only made for the purpose of such a general settlement, and not with any view of fulfilling the contract of sale. There were some settlements made between the 26th of April and the time this audit was completed, but it appears that in these settlements there was no compounding of interest every four months, as in the audit made by Midlam and Van Every. Clark also introduced a number of witnesses who claimed to have had conversations with McCullough, or overheard conversations between McCullough and Clark indicating that negotiations were pending for the settlement of their interests in the Damascus Lumber Company, but that they did not come to any conclusion in regard thereto. The oral evidence upon the question of the existence of such a contract as is declared upon by the plaintiff is highly conflicting. Perhaps the strongest circumstance in support of McCullough's contention is the audit made by Van Every and Midlam. The manner in which this audit was made, the fact that it ascertained nothing but the amount that Clark would be entitled to receive because of his advancements to the company, with interest compounded every four months as of the 1st of May, 1915, is consistent only with the contention made by McCullough. This information would be entirely useless to Clark or McCullough in a general settlement of their affairs. It would not afford them any basis for a settlement of these affairs unless they also had the amounts advanced by McCullough and the amount that he would be entitled to receive upon the same basis. This was not ascertained, nor undertaken to be ascertained, and according to the auditors they acted under the direction of the parties to this suit. Clark does not undertake to explain why the auditors ascertained just the one thing which was necessary to complete the contract which McCullough claims he had with him.

[1] The jury found in answer to a special interrogatory submitted that the contract sued on by McCullough was actually made, and we are asked to overthrow this verdict upon the ground that the evidence does not warrant it. If this finding depended alone upon the oral testimony of McCullough, supported as it is by other witnesses who were present at various times when he and Clark negotiated in regard to the contract, contradicted as such oral evidence was, the jury might have had great difficulty in arriving at a correct solution of the controversy. A careful review of the record, however, convinces us that the audit of Clark's accounts with the Damascus Lumber Company made by Midlam and Van Every, as above stated, was a pillar of light guiding the jury in its deliberations to the only conclusion which could have been reasonably reached. This circumstance in the case was one which could not be changed by either of the parties to suit his subsequent convenience or interest. It indicated in no uncertain terms that McCullough's contention was correct, and that Clark was seeking to avoid the effect of his contract. It is consistent with no other theory except the one relied upon by McCullough for recovery. It would have been entirely useless for the purpose for which Clark says that it was made. It would have furnished no basis for a settlement between Clark and McCullough of their interests in the Damascus Lumber Company. It was made to speak as of the very day upon which McCullough says the interest was to be turned over to him, to wit, the 1st of May, 1915, and it gave the information, and only the information, which was necessary for the parties to have in order to fully consummate the contract relied upon by McCullough. It would be strange, indeed, that these parties, business men of large experience, would have their bookkeepers engage for more than six weeks in this work unless the result of their labors was to be of some utility in the conduct of their affairs. Of course, this finding of the jury, even if it were based solely upon conflicting oral evidence, about which the court might be in doubt, would not be disturbed; but, when the finding of the jury is supported by the circumstances above adverted to, it is clearly justified by the evidence.

Defendant contends, however, that even assuming that the contract was sufficiently proven to justify the jury's verdict, the plaintiff is entitled to no such measure of recovery as was applied by the jury. It appears that Clark was the owner of 76 per cent. of the stock of the Damascus Lumber Company, which was a Delaware corporation. This corporation was organized in the fall of 1907. McCullough contends that prior to its organization he and Clark acquired considerable timber lands lying in Virginia, North Carolina, and Tennessee, and that at the time of the acquisition of this land it was agreed between them that they would form a corporation for the purpose of cutting the timber thereon, and to hold their respective interests; that the title to the land was taken in the name of Clark to be held by him in trust for himself and McCullough. Clark agrees that the title taken by him was taken in this way; that is to say, that McCullough had a one-fifth interest in all of this land, and he a four-fifths interest. When he and Clark determined that they would cut the timber and market it, a mill was purchased from the Thayer Company, and this purchase was made in the name of Clark. A corporation was then organized, and subsequent to its organization some other tracts of timber were acquired, and the legal title was taken in the name of Clark. McCullough contends that Clark was to convey all of this land to the corporation, but that this was never done, and at the time this suit was instituted the legal title thereto was still vested in Clark. Clark insists that because of this fact it was error to allow the jury to consider the land and the standing timber thereon as an asset of the Damascus Lumber Company for the purpose of fixing the value of his stock therein, and in a former trial of this case his contention that this timber and land could not be included as such an asset was sustained by the lower court, and a verdict directed in his favor, which upon a writ of error to this court was reversed; this court holding that under the evidence introduced by McCullough it would be a question for the jury to determine whether or not this land and timber was in fact an asset of the Damascus Lumber Company. McCullough v. Clark, 81 W. Va. 743, 95 S. E. 787. Clark's insistence now is that the finding of the jury upon the evidence introduced upon this question should be set aside as contrary to the great preponderance of the testimony.

On behalf of McCullough's contention, it appears that at the time he and Clark entered into the arrangement to acquire the Damascus Lumber Company's lands, they agreed to the formation of a corporation. This contention is sustained by the people employed by Clark and McCullough to make the purchases and otherwise represent them, several of them testifying that they were informed by both Clark and McCullough that when the lands were acquired the corporation would be formed, and the interests turned over to it. McCullough insists that pursuant to this arrangement, while the legal title was not conveyed to the corporation when it was formed, the land was in fact turned over to the corporation; that it took possession thereof; that it paid all of the remaining unpaid purchase money, and even reimbursed Clark for the purchase money he paid on this land to practically the full extent that he had made such payments. Clark, on the other hand, insists that when the corporation was organized a resolution was passed by the stockholders and the board of directors acquiring the right to cut the timber upon the lands held by him upon the basis of paying therefor certain prices per thousand feet for the different kinds of timber, the price being $8 per thousand and for the larger part thereof, and that the stock of this company by a like resolution was directed to be issued to him in payment for the mill purchased by him from the Thayer Company, and which had not yet been completed, as well as for the benefits arising from a contract entered into by him with the Thayer Company for the sawing of that company's timber at this mill, and the transportation of the Damascus Lumber Company's logs over that company's railroad. In this way he contends that he acquired all of the stock of the Damascus Lumber Company, and that the only interests which that company owned at the time of the institution of this suit was the mill and the right to cut the timber upon the lands owned by him at the prices mentioned in the resolution above referred to, and whatever advantages might be derived from the Thayer contract, which will be hereafter adverted to. If his contention is sustained, then there is no basis in the evidence for any substantial recovery upon the part of the plaintiff, even though the contract set up by him has been fully proven.

It is insisted that, while we held on the former writ of error that the question arising as to the ownership of these assets was one for the jury, at that time only the evidence introduced on behalf of the plaintiff was before the court, and that with the introduction of the defendant's evidence the plaintiff's showing has been so overwhelmed that the jury could not find a verdict for the plaintiff consistent with all of the evidence. It very clearly appears that at the time of the purchase of this timber and these lands immediately before the organization of the Damascus Lumber Company, it was contemplated by the parties that a corporation would be formed for the purpose of holding their interests in that neighborhood. Not only McCullough testifies to this, but, as before stated, several other parties who were employed by Clark and McCullough in acquiring the timber likewise testify, and some of these other parties were to be allowed to take stock in this corporation, Clark agreeing to let them have some of the stock to which he would be entitled as representing his four-fifths interest in the properties. When the corporation was formed it did take possession of the mill, which had been there-before acquired in an incomplete state, and complete the same, and did enter upon the land and cut the timber thereon and market the lumber derived therefrom through Clark as its selling agent, Clark receiving for all of the lumber thus sold by him 5 per cent. for his services. From 1907 until 1915 it does not appear that any payments were ever made by the company to Clark on account of the timber cut by it, nor does it appear that Clark ever demanded any payments upon this account. It appears that on his books he charged to the company the taxes paid by him upon the land, the money paid by him for the mill before the organization of the company, and the moneys paid by him on account of the purchase of the land, both before and after the organization of the company, and credited the company with all moneys received by him from the sales of lumber, less the 5 per cent. commissions. It is true that the minutes of the organization meeting of the Damascus Lumber Company show that a resolution was passed by its stockholders and its board of directors purchasing from Clark the Thayer contract, including the mill acquired by him from the Thayer people, for all of the capital stock of the corporation fully paid and non-assessable. It is likewise true that the minutes show that Clark made a proposition to the company to sell it the timber upon the tracts of land standing in his name at certain stumpage prices, and it is testified by several witnesses that these resolutions were actually passed at those meetings. McCullough, who was present at the directors' meeting, says that all of the work at that meeting was cut out beforehand, and was passed in a few minutes, and that he does not know anything about such resolutions as these; his contention being that the minutes are fraudulent. But whether they are or not, he insists that no such contract was ever carried out by the company, but that the contract which was carried out was the one existing between him and Clark, the only parties interested in the property, at the time of the formation of the company, to wit, that the corporation should take over the properties, and the interests of Clark and McCullough should be evidenced by the issuance to them of the company's stock in the proportions that they were interested in the property.

It is significant that while Clark contends he was entitled to receive all of the company's stock for the mill and the Thayer contract, one-fifth of this stock was issued to McCullough in strict accordance with his contention as to what the arrangement was; that is, that their respective interests should be evidenced by the issuance of stock in the corporation. Clark now contends that McCullough owes him for this stock, but he does not undertake to explain how it ever happened to be issued to McCullough originally. The other 80 per cent. of the stock was put at Clark's disposal. Seventy-six per cent. of it is now held by him, and 4 per cent. was acquired by another party from him, which 4 per cent. has since been acquired by McCullough. McCullough says that it is true that there was talk between him and Clark about cutting the timber on these tracts of land upon a stumpage basis. He says that Clark advised him that he (Clark) had agreed to let some of the employees take stock in the corporation out of the four-fifths of the stock assigned to him, but that he did not want these employees to have the benefit of the timber purchases, and that he wanted to make an arrangement for the corporation to cut the timber upon a stumpage basis; that this arrangement would make no difference as between himself and McCullough, for the reason that McCullough had the same interest in the timber held in Clark's name that he would have in the corporation, the only effect of it being that Clark would be enabled to prevent the parties to whom he had agreed to sell stock from getting into the company upon what is termed the "ground floor." McCullough says that Clark insisted that inasmuch as this arrangement would not affect McCullough's interest one way or the other, he should allow him to carry it out because of the effect it would have upon the arrangements he had theretofore made with some of the employees in regard to selling them stock; that when this arrangement was explained to these employees who had agreed to take stock, they all refused to take it, and that upon such refusal Clark agreed with him to abandon the arrangement and carry the whole proposition as they had originally intended, and that this was done. Clark contends, on the other hand, that the only interest which the Damascus Lumber Company has in the timber is the contract as shown by the minutes, that is, the right to cut it on the payment of certain stumpage prices. The oral evidence upon this proposition is conflicting. In order to support his contention Clark introduced in evidence certain books kept by him, or under his direction, in Philadelphia, by which he attempted to show that there was kept during all of the time an account with the Damascus Lumber Company showing the amounts of lumber cut of the various kinds, and the amount due by it to him upon the basis of the stumpage contract.

From the evidence in the record we are justified in saying that this stumpage account is fictitious, and was fabricated after the institution of this suit. It was before the jury in the court below, and it is shown by the testimony of witnesses asked in regard to it that the various items are inserted in most instances at the foot of the pages, and that while this account purports to have been commenced in 1907, where it is indexed in the various books of Clark, it is below the index of other accounts commenced long afterward, except in a few instances where some other accounts are made to appear below this Damascus Lumber Company stumpage account in the books, but on reference to the book it appears from the testimony that these entries in the index below the Damascus Lumber Company stumpage account are purely fictitious, there being no such accounts in the books. While these books were introduced in evidence on the trial of the case before the jury, they are not brought to this court as part of the record. It appears that notice was given Clark's counsel some time before the hearing here to produce these books upon this hearing, and the only reply that was made to this notice at the bar of the court was that the books had been taken to Philadelphia, for which reason they could not be produced for our examination. We do not think their production would show any more, perhaps, than the oral evidence in regard to them does show, and that is that this stumpage account was a fabrication from beginning to end, and was made up for the purpose of this case.

[2] There is another significant thing in this connection, and that is that when the audit above referred to was made for the purpose of ascertaining Clark's standing with the Damascus Lumber Company, he charged that company with every cent paid out by him for the purchase of the mill, for the purchase of timber, for taxes paid upon timber, and for all expenses incurred by him in connection therewith. It is a little hard for us to comprehend why the Damascus Lumber Company should be treated as owing him for the money advanced for the purchase of this timber, and for the money advanced by him for the purchase of the mill if, as he says, he still owns the timber and the lumber company never had any interest therein, and he received all of the capital stock of the company as the purchase price of the mill. The effect of this is that the Damascus Lumber Company in this audit is made to pay every cent that was paid for the mill and Clark gets all of its capital stock for nothing. It is likewise made to pay every cent paid out by him for the purchase of timber which he claims he still owns. But he says in explanation of this that this audit was made up only for the purpose of a settlement between him and McCullough, and that inasmuch as their interests in the corporation were the same as their interests in the timber and the land, it was not necessary to separate the two transactions and make a settlement showing how he stood in relation to the standing timber, and what his standing was with the Damascus Lumber Company. This explanation would be plausible were it not for the fact that Clark's interest in the Damascus Lumber Company is not the same as he claims it to be in the timber and land. He claims in the timber and land to own a four-fifths interest, and McCullough the other one-fifth, while in the Damascus Lumber Company he owns 76 per cent., and McCullough 24 per cent. It will thus be seen that the explanation made by him for including all of the money paid out by him for the purchase of land, and for the purchase of the mill, as a charge against the Damascus Lumber Company in this account, has no real basis to stand upon. There is much evidence taken upon this question, and after a careful review of it we are of opinion that the jury was entirely justified in holding that this timber and land was an asset of the Damascus Lumber Company at the time of the alleged sale of Clark's stock therein to the plaintiff.

Clark further contends that even though it be conceded that he made the contract sued upon, and that the timber and lands were assets of the Damascus Lumber Company, yet the verdict is grossly excessive, for the reason that the jury evidently included items as assets which were concededly not assets of the Damascus Lumber Company, and failed to give him credits to which he was entitled. The jury, under the instructions of the court, in arriving at the damages to which plaintiff was entitled, has ascertained the net assets of the Damascus Lumber Company. These assets consisted of a large amount of timber remaining uncut upon the land, of the land itself, of the mill, of the amount due from the Thayer Company above referred to, of the value of the contract under which the Damascus Lumber Company was cutting the Thayer timber at its mill, if this contract was of any value, and of various other items of property. Some of the items allowed by the jury were fixed by an answer to interrogatories propounded. As to other items we are unable to say from the record what allowance was made therefor by the jury, except that some allowance was evidently made, because the amount of the verdict necessarily includes something for these other items. The jury were asked in an interrogatory if they allowed anything because of the 30,000,000 feet of standing timber on one tract of land, 10,000,000 feet on another tract, 4,000 cords of bark, and the real estate, and in answer to this interrogatory stated that for the 30,000,000 feet of timber they allowed $180,000, for the 10,000,000 feet of timber, $20,000, for the 4,000 cords of bark, $20,000, and for the real estate, $20,000. There is some contention that these figures are excessive. That there was 30,000,000 feet of timber standing on one tract of land which was particularly fine timber, Clark concedes, but he says that this timber was not worth $6 a thousand on the stump in 1915, at the time of the alleged sale. He swears, however, in his testimony that when the alleged stumpage contract was made in the fall of 1907, the price of $6 per thousand feet for such timber as this was a fair price, and it appears from the record that prices were worse depressed in the fall of 1907 than they ever have been since that date, so that we may fairly conclude that even on Clark's own statement the jury would have been justified in fixing the value of this timber at $180,000. A number of other witnesses, who have gone over this timber very carefully, testify that it is worth the price found by the jury. As to the 10,000,000 feet of timber standing on the other lands, it was not so valuable because of the character of the timber itself and the difficulty in getting it to market. Clark admits that $2 per thousand feet for this was a fair price, but he denies that there was as much as 10,000,000 feet of it. The evidence, however, shows that the operations of this company have been carried on since the 1st of May, 1915, and that there has been cut of this timber more than 10,000,000 feet. He disputes the item of 4,000 cords of bark, contending that this was included in the price of the timber. It is true one witness does include this in the estimate given by him of the timber, but when he does this he makes the estimate somewhat higher than the other witnesses. The other witnesses do not include it in their estimates of the timber, but estimate for it separately, and the jury were entirely justified in finding the amount they did on that account. The item of $20,000 for the real estate Clark admits to be very much less than the actual value of it. In addition to these items of assets upon which there was a specific finding by the jury in answer to interrogatories, there was a large quantity of sawed lumber on hand. There is not much dispute as to the value of this lumber. It is placed by a number of the witnesses at from $35,000 to $36,000. As to what the jury allowed for it we cannot say, but certainly upon the undisputed evidence somewhere near these figures. It is put in plaintiff's account filed with his declaration at $36,686.83, and this is based upon an inventory taken from the books of the company. We think it may well be assumed that the jury figured it at this amount. There is some dispute as to the value of the mill, of the railroad, and various equipment, amounting to several thousand dollars. We are not able to determine from the general verdict what amount was allowed for these items.

[3] There is an item included in the bill of particulars of $45,000, being the amount received from the Thayer Company upon a settlement made in December, 1915, which it is contended the jury must have allowed in toto, when in fact and in truth a part of this item accrued after May 1, 1915. It is admitted in the record by the plaintiff that only about $32,000 of this item was an asset of the Damascus Lumber Company on May 1, 1915, and we are not justified in assuming that the jury allowed more than that amount in arriving at its verdict. The defendant insists that the jury did allow more than this amount, for the reason that its finding is for the very amount which would be arrived at by including this item as $45,000, and excluding another item claimed by the plaintiff for the value of the contract to saw the Thayer lumber as an asset. The fact that these amounts correspond does not justify the assumption that the jury arrived at its verdict by including the items confessedly not an asset, and by excluding an item upon which proof had been introduced, which would entitle them to consider it as an asset of the company. This claim that the jury included this $13,000 of the Thayer settlement which accrued after the 1st of May, 1915, as an asset as of that date, is based solely and only upon the assumption that because the verdict it found was the same in amount as would be reached by including it and excluding the other item, that they did so include it and exclude the other item. As to how the jury reached its verdict we cannot inquire so long as there is evidence in the case to justify the amount found.

The defendant insists that the court erred in permitting evidence to go to the jury for the purpose of establishing that the contract with the Thayer Company for the cutting of its timber at the Damascus Lumber Company's mill was an asset, for the reason that the value of this contract was too speculative and uncertain to permit the jury to find that it was in fact worth anything to the Damascus Lumber Company on the 1st day of May, 1915. The contract provides that the Damascus Lumber Company should cut at its mill for the Thayer Company that company's timber at a certain price per thousand feet, and should have in addition to this price what is denominated the "ofal," consisting of the slabs and other waste from the logs, which was by the Damascus Company cut into building lath and sold by it. A number of witnesses testify that this contract constituted a valuable asset of the Damascus Lumber Company; that the Thayer Company had remaining to be cut on the 1st of May, 1915, under this contract at least 60,000,000 feet of lumber; and that the profit that would be derived to the Damascus Lumber Company from the cutting this 60,000,000 feet under the terms of the contract would be at least $1 per thousand feet, or $60,000 in all. On the other hand, Clark attempts to show that instead of this contract being an asset it was a liability; that because it must extend over a considerable period of time, and the cost of performing it, by the Damascus Lumber Company, be uncertain, there could not be fixed any basis upon which to determine that it was of any value whatever. It must be borne in mind that any allowance of profits for the failure to perform a contract is more or less uncertain. What the future will bring forth no one can tell. Undoubtedly when parties enter into a contract each expects to derive some benefit therefrom, and when it is shown by those familiar with the situation that under existing conditions, and such changes as may reasonably be contemplated, a substantial benefit would accrue by reason of the terms of the contract, the plaintiff is justified in submitting to the jury the question of the quantum of damages for a breach thereof. 8 R. O. L. tit. "Damages," § 62 et seq. We do not think there was any error in this case in the court submitting to the jury the evidence upon the value of this contract to the Damascus Lumber Company. Of course, it would be for the jury to determine from the evidence what, if any value, it had. In this case it is clear that the jury did not allow all that the plaintiff claimed upon account of it, but it cannot be said, as contended for by the defendant in his argument on the allowance of the $13,000 of the Thayer settlement, that the jury did not make some allowance on account of this item.

There is complaint that the jury included as assets of Damascus Lumber Company an item of $2,500 for a one-half interest in Hemlock Extract Company. We do not know from the general verdict whether this item was considered by the jury or not, but assuming that it was, it appears that the evidence would justify such action. The Damascus Lumber Company furnished to this extract company $15,000 worth of bark for which it was to have a one-half interest in the plant. This the plaintiff estimated at $2,500 at the time he filed his suit, but since that time the extract company has been wound up and there was realized $8,000, according to the evidence, after the payment of all debts, which would make this interest worth $4,000 instead of $2,500. Clark says the amount has not been paid, and, if such is the case, no doubt it can be obtained by application to the proper party.

Clark also claims that he advanced more money than the audit shows, and calls attention to certain items which he claims are not correct. This audit was made by Clark's private secretary and the Damascus Company's bookkeeper, and was the result of six weeks of labor. They had before them not only the Damascus Company's books and papers, but also Clark's books, records, and papers. For this reason it will be presumed to be prima facie correct, and if Clark would impeach it he must do so by evidence that satisfies that it is not correct. As an example of his effort along this line he attempts to say that he is not given credit for as much as he paid for insurance on the company's property, and he bases his contention simply upon an entry in his own books, while it appears that this amount was ascertained by the auditors from the party to whom the money was paid. Clark introduced this party as a witness, but did not attempt to show by him that he had paid more for insurance than the audit gave him credit for. The other attempts he makes to impeach the audit are no better supported, and we think the jury was warranted in making the answer it did to an interrogatory that the audit was correct.

Another complaint which the defendant makes is that there was certain purchase money remaining unpaid for some of the timber which the jury did not consider. There is nothing to warrant such a conclusion. Of course, if Clark was a trustee holding this land and timber for Damascus Lumber Company, then any unpaid purchase money was a liability to be considered in determining the company's net assets. In the statement filed by the plaintiff he placed the liabilities of the company at $20,000. Aside from this unpaid purchase money these debts actually amounted to only eight or nine thousand dollars, so that there was a sufficient balance of this estimated indebtedness to take care of the unpaid purchase money. These items are proven, and we are not warranted in believing that the jury did not, in arriving at the net assets of the company, deduct the same from the gross assets as found by it.

[4] The court instructed the jury that in arriving at the plaintiff's measure of recovery, if they found that he was entitled to recover, they should ascertain the value of the defendant's stock in the Damascus Lumber Company as of the 1st day of May, 1915, the time at which it was to have been delivered under the contract sued upon, and after deducting therefrom the amount which the plaintiff was to pay the defendant therefor, add interest on the remainder to the date of the verdict. The defendant insists that it was erroneous to permit the jury to include in their verdict anything in the nature of interest, inasmuch as the claim was for unliquidated damages. This instruction is simply a direction to the jury as to the method to be used by it in liquidating these damages. The amount to which the plaintiff is entitled had to be ascertained by the jury as of the time they rendered their verdict. Manifestly to give him what the stock was worth, less the amount he was to pay therefor, three or four years before the date of the verdict, would not be compensation. That would permit the defendant to have the full use of the property during all of the intervening time without making any compensation therefor. This question, however, is hardly an open one in this state. In the case of Cresap v. Brown, 82 W. Va. 468, 96 S. E. 66, we held that in ascertaining the damages to which one was entitled for the wrongful removal of timber, it was proper to find the value of the timber at the date of the removal and add interest thereon to the date of the judgment or decree as fixing the amount of damages to which the complaining party was entitled at that time. Likewise in Pittsburgh & West Virginia Gas Co. v. Pentress Gas Co., 84 W. Va. 448, 100 S. E. 296, 7 A. L. R. 901, we held that where one was entitled to compensation for oil taken from his land, the measure of that compensation would be the value of the oil taken at the time it was so wrongfully taken, with interest on such amount to the date of the judgment or decree. These holdings are fully supported by the authorities. 4 Sutherland on Damages, §§ 1118-1132; 8 R. C. L. tit. "Damages," § 89, and authorities there cited; Mullen v. Cook, 69 W. Va. 456, 71 S. E. 566.

[5] The action of the court in giving to the jury plaintiff's instruction No. 3 is also insisted upon as ground for reversal of this judgment. That instruction defines to the jury what is meant by the term preponderance of the evidence. It is as follows:

"The court instructs the jury that the requirement that the plaintiff must prove his case by a preponderance of the evidence has to do with the weight of evidence, and if after the jury considers all the evidence in the case, both the evidence for the plaintiff and the evidence for the defendant, including all circumstances as well as direct testimony, and from all this the jury believe that the evidence in favor of the plaintiff outweighs that of the defendant, even in the slightest degree, then this requirement as to the burden of proof on the plaintiff is fully met."

The defendant does not contend that this instruction does not correctly define the term preponderance of the evidence, but his insistence is that it misled the jury, inasmuch as some elements of the case were required to be proved by more than a preponderance of the evidence. He insists that the evidence to establish that he was holding the legal title to the lands and timber as trustee for Damascus Lumber Company, the equitable owner thereof, must be full, clear, and free from doubt, and the court so instructed the jury. This instruction does not purport to do more than to define to the jury what is meant by a preponderance of the evidence. This term was used by the court in instructing the jury in a number of instances, and we can see no objection to the court defining it, if it was thought necessary to tell the jury what he meant by the use of that term. It could not mislead the jury, for the definition was carefully limited in its application, and extends no further than to the instances in which the thing required to be proved could be proved by a preponderance of the evidence. It is not a binding instruction as claimed by the defendant. It does not require the jury to find for the plaintiff if he has proved the elements of his case by a preponderance of the evidence. It only tells the jury that the term "preponderance of the evidence" as used by the court in instructing it means what it is defined to mean in this instruction.

The action of the court in giving to the jury plaintiff's instruction No. 6 is also insisted upon as error. This instruction is as follows:

"The court instructs the jury that if from the evidence in this case they find for the plaintiff, then in determining the assets of the Damascus Lumber Company they must consider all property owned by said company, whether it had the legal title thereto or not; and in determining whether or not said company owned the property, or any part thereof, standing in the name of the defendant, the jury must consider all the facts and circumstances in the case applicable thereto, and must take into consideration the manner in which said property was treated and handled by the parties, and by the way in which the accounts were kept in relation thereto, and the official position held by defendant in said company, as well as the way, if any, said property was treated by the defendant in the making of the audit of his accounts, as well as all other facts and circumstances, and from all the evidence determine if said defendant held the legal title to said property for the use and benefit of said company, and thus determine if said company had the equitable right to said property, and the value of said equitable rights on May 1, 1915."

The criticism made of this instruction is that it gives undue emphasis to a few facts, and calls special attention to the fact that Clark was an officer of the company without also calling attention to the fact that McCullough was likewise such officer. It will be noted from reading the instruction that the purpose of it was to aid the jury in determining the question of whether or not the property, the legal title to which was in Clark's name, was in fact the property of the Damascus Lumber Company, and should be treated as an asset of that company. This instruction invites the jury's attention, as it will be observed, to a number of circumstances, among them the manner in which the property was treated and handled by the parties, and the fact that Clark was an officer of the corporation by which it was so treated and handled. It tells the jury to consider all of the facts and circumstances in evidence upon this question. The fact that McCullough was also an officer of the corporation could have made very little difference in determining this question, for the property was not in his name, but was in the name of Clark, while the fact that Clark was an officer of the corporation which treated this property as its own would be material as indicating that he considered it as belonging to the company. McCullough's action as an officer of the company might not be, or would not be, effective to bind Clark unless had with Clark's knowledge and consent. We think the instruction fairly presented this phase of the case to the jury, and is not subject to the criticism made of it.

The action of the court in refusing to give to the jury defendant's instruction No. 11 is also assigned as error. This instruction would have told the jury that if they believed from the evidence that the minutes of the organization meetings of the Damascus Lumber Company, as read in evidence, are the minutes referred to in a subsequent minute by which the charter of the company was amended, which were offered in evidence by the plaintiff, then the plaintiff is estopped to deny the regularity or validity of such minutes and meetings, and cannot be heard to contradict the same. This instruction was not comprehensive enough even assuming that the propositions of law contained in it are correct. It eliminates entirely from consideration the theory of McCullough that the contract attempted to be made by these minutes was never in fact carried out by the parties, but was entirely abandoned. There can be no doubt but that by mutual agreement of the parties, even though we consider that the minutes constitute a contract, the same could be abandoned and the parties carry on their operations upon an entirely different basis, and this was the real question which the jury had to determine. The giving of this instruction could have served no other purpose than to have misled the jury into the belief that, if the minutes that were made at the Pittsburg meeting constituted a contract, not even the parties themselves could change it.

The refusal to give to the jury defendant's instruction No. 9 as presented, and in modifying it and giving it to the jury as modified, is also assigned as error. This instruction would have told the jury that in ascertaining the assets of the Damascus Lumber Company, if they believed from the evidence that the T. W. Thayer contract was a source of loss to the company instead of profit, they should deduct such loss from the assets. The court modified this instruction so as to tell the jury that if they found this contract to be a source of loss as of the 1st day of May, 1915, the date of the alleged contract, then they should deduct such loss from the assets. Clearly this modification was right. The jury in fixing the damages to which the plaintiff was entitled were compelled, so far as they could, to put themselves in the position of the parties on the 1st day of May, 1915, and if upon that day this Thayer contract was a liability rather than an asset, of course they should have so treated it. The instruction without this modification was indefinite in that it did not give to the jury a certain time at which they were to fix the effect of this contract upon the Damascus Lumber Company.

[8] Another assignment of error is based upon an alleged abuse by counsel for the plaintiff of the privileges of argument in his closing address to the jury. We cannot even consider under the showing in this record the alleged abuse of privilege relied upon. It appears from the bill of exceptions that counsel for the plaintiff when making his argument to the jury was interrupted by defendant's counsel with the request that certain remarks be taken down, to which demand or request plaintiff's counsel acceded. Whether the remarks were taken down at the time or not does not appear, nor does it appear that the defendant or his counsel made any objection at the time to the court that the remarks complained of were improper, or asked the court to make any ruling in regard thereto, but after the jury had returned its verdict assigned as one of the reasons for setting it aside the alleged improper remarks. We have repeatedly held that this court will not consider errors predicated upon the abuse of counsel of the privilege of argument unless it appears that the complaining party asked for and was refused an instruction to the jury to the effect that such remarks were improper and should be disregarded. State v. Statler, 86 W. Va. 425, 103 S. E. 345, and authorities there cited. In order to take advantage of a matter of this kind the complaining party must ask the court for a ruling thereon at a time at which the trial court could correct the alleged error, and not wait until after the jury has returned a verdict and the court is without the opportunity to correct any error, if error there be.

Other errors assigned are to the action of the court in admitting certain evidence offered by the plaintiff over the defendant's objection, and in rejecting certain evidence offered by the defendant. Counsel for the defendant, while in their brief insisting that they rely upon these errors, do not advance any reason for disturbing the verdict because thereof. Evidently in the preparation of their brief they considered them of such an inconsequential character as to be unworthy of serious presentation by way of argument. We have carefully examined them, and we quite agree with this conclusion.

We find no error in the judgment complained of, and the same is affirmed.

WHITE v. MOSS et al. (No. 4126.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Feb. 22, 1921.)

1. Judgment \S 801—Pleading in suit to enforce lien setting up fraud in procurement of judgment held insufficient.

A pleading filed in a suit in equity brought to enforce the lien of a judgment, which, assailing the validity of the judgment involved, on the ground of fraud in the procurement thereof, charges no more than that defense to the action in which it was rendered was prevented by a representation made by the creditor to two of the four debtors, that he was suing on the note, in order to hold one of the endorsers and him alone, that they need not be uneasy, and that they could just let it go, is insufficient.

2. Pleading \S 8(15)—Facts stated in support of charge of fraud must make them inconsistent with honest conduct.

The facts stated in support of a charge of fraud, to be sufficient, must be such in character as to make them inconsistent with honest conduct on the part of him against whom they are charged.

3. Judgment \S 883(13)—Claims not reduced to judgment cannot be set off against judgment.

Debts and claims not reduced to judgment cannot be set off against a judgment.

4. Judgment \S 801—Lien of judgment enforceable without return of execution where execution not issued within two years.

The lien of a judgment on which an execution did not issue within two years from the date thereof can be enforced without allegation and proof of the return of an execution thereon unsatisfied.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Monroe County.

Suit by Nelson White against L. H. Moss and others. Decree of dismissal, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed and rendered.

R. L. Clark, of Union, for appellant.

Jno. L. Rowan, of Union, for appellees.

POFFENBARGER, J. The decree complained of on this appeal dismissed a bill for enforcement of the lien of a small judgment, on the one-third undivided interest of two of the defendants in a tract of land containing about 109 acres, on the ground that the judgment was obtained by fraud perpetrated upon two of the judgment debtors, one of whom was the principal debtor and the other a surety and part owner of the land proceeded against.

In the answer originally filed by L. H. Moss, principal, and John Moss, a surety, two of the four judgment debtors, Harve Moss and J. E. Ridgeway being the other two, neither of whom made any defense, payment of the judgment was claimed and relied upon. This claim was founded upon an account for sawing timber, the rental of a saw-mill site, lumber sold the plaintiff, and other small items, which it was averred the plaintiff had agreed to credit on the judgment. With reference to executions on the judgment, the plaintiff amended his bill, and a similar answer to the amended bill was filed. On the issues thus made, depositions were taken. Before the cause was submitted upon the issues made and proof taken, the same two defendants tendered, and were permitted to file, what is termed an amended and supplemental answer, charging fraud in the procurement of the judgment and praying that it be "dismissed and held as invalid" and that they be dismissed with their reasonable costs. Upon that answer and the depositions previously taken and filed, the court entered the decree complained of, which adjudicated fraudulent procurement of the judgment and dismissed the bills.

It is deemed unnecessary to consider all of the assignments of error predicated upon the procedure in the cause, some of which deny right in the defendants to file the amended answer at the late stage at which it was tendered and the right of the court to read, on the issue raised by it, the depositions previously taken. Our conclusions respecting more important and vital matters involved will obviate the necessity of passing upon them.

Treating the amended and supplemental answer as a cross-bill seeking affirmative relief, vacation of the judgment, the plaintiff demurred to it. Whether it is a cross-bill need not be determined. If it is not, the demurrer can be treated as an exception to it or an objection to the filing thereof. It is only necessary to determine whether the pleading is sufficient in law.

[1, 2] As ground of fraudulent procurement, it charges nothing more than that the creditor, at or about the date of the institution of his action, told the respondents that he was bringing the suit, in order to hold J. E. Ridgeway and him alone, that they need not give themselves any uneasiness, and that they could just let it go; and that, upon this representation and under inducement thereof, they did not appear nor make any defense, and that, but for such representation, they would have appeared and defended. Ridgeway was an indorser on the note. This pleading does not aver any representation on the part of the plaintiff that he would not take judgment against the respondents. They were told he sought a judgment to hold Ridgeway and him alone. That was perfectly consistent with the theory of a judgment against the respondents as well as Ridgeway, in order to prevent his escape on the ground of lack of diligence on the part of the creditor against them. Respondents knew they had been sued or were to be. With this knowledge, they had no right to assume, from the representation they allege, that judgment would not be taken against them. There was no representation that it would not be. This averment is entirely too loose and equivocal. It does not state facts making out a sufficient charge of fraud. Allegation of a mere conclusion will not suffice, nor will a statement of facts clearly consistent with honesty. Fraud must be an almost inevitable deduction from the facts averred. Loomis v. Jackson, 6 W. Va. 613, 702; Pyles v. Furniture Co., 30 W. Va. 123, 2 S. E. 909; Zell Guano Co. v. Heatherly, 38 W. Va. 400, 18 S. E. 611.

Respecting the charge of fraud, the evidence corresponds with the pleading. In other words, it is wholly insufficient to prove fraudulent procurement of the judgment.

[3, 4] Some of the items of the account antedate the judgment and are barred by fall-ure to assert them in the action in which the judgment was obtained, by way of payments or set-offs. Code, ch. 50, § 55 (sec. 2809). Nor can such of them as are not barred be now set off against the judgment, except by the consent of the judgment creditor. Faulconer v. Stinson, 44 W. Va. 546, 29 S. E. 1011.

The evidence is entirely too loose and weak to make out an allowance of the demands set up, on the theory of acceptance thereof as payments on the judgment. It is admitted that there has been no settlement and the plaintiff disputes the validity of nearly all of the items. One of them is 23 years old. There is no admission of an agreement to credit any of them on the judgment, except one, and the amount of it is disputed.

No execution issued on the judgment within two years from the date thereof. In such case, the lien can be enforced without a return of execution unsatisfied. Code, ch. 139, § 7 (sec. 5099). The controversy in the pleadings about abortive or defective executions and returns thereon relates to writs issued after the expiration of said period, which are immaterial and unimportant.

For the reasons stated, a decree will be entered here, reversing the decree complained of, adjudicating the right of the plaintiff to enforce the lien of his judgment against the lands of the defendants, John Moss and Harve Moss, in the bill and proceedings mentioned, and remanding the cause for execution of such decree.

SLEETH et al. v. CITY OF ELKINS.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Feb. 22, 1921.)

1. Municipal corporations ~~§~~ 323(1) — Owner may enjoin building new sidewalk, where permanent walk already built.

The owner of a city lot of land who has been ordered, by the proper municipal authorities by ordinance properly passed and notice duly served, to lay a sidewalk along his lot within a specified time, or failing to do so, the same will be done by the city at his cost and charged against his lot and collected as other city taxes are collected, and he has already laid a permanent sidewalk, which is still in good condition, in front of his lot on a street grade formerly established by the city, and the charter and city ordinances provide that where a new sidewalk is ordered by the city on a new grade, to take the place of an old sidewalk on an old grade, the cost thereof shall be borne by the city, and not by special assessment against the abutting property, may invoke equity to prevent the city from laying the new sidewalk at his cost, and to prevent the lien from attaching to his property.

2. Municipal corporations \S 323(1) — Owner may before work done test validity of proceedings for new sidewalk to replace old one.

Under such circumstances, and knowing it would be improper or unlawful to make such special assessment against his property for such costs, he may bring suit to test the question of the validity of the proceedings before the work is done.

Certified from Circuit Court, Randolph County.

Suit by W. H. Sleeth and others against the City of Elkins for an injunction. Temporary injunction awarded, demurrer and motion to dissolve overruled, and questions certified. Affirmed.

B. W. Taylor and R. H. Allen, both of Elkins, for plaintiffs.

Samuel T. Spears, of Elkins, for defendant.

LIVELY, J. W. H. Sleeth and 44 other persons, all residents of the city of Elkins in Randolph county and owners of real estate therein abutting on the streets of that city, presented their bill for injunction against the city of Elkins to the judge of the circuit court of that county on September 1, 1920, alleging, substantially, that they were such residents and owners of real estate similarly situated, and were aggrieved by orders of the city council, which had required them to tear up and abandon the brick sidewalks in front of their lots and dwellings on certain streets and to construct in lieu thereof cement sidewalks; that in pursuance of an order to that effect, passed by the council on May 26, 1920, notices were served on the plaintiffs to construct cement sidewalks within 30 days, or the city would do so, and the cost thereof would be charged against their abutting property and collected as other city taxes are collected; that, upon petition signed by a number of the plaintiffs, presented to the council, asking for a rescission of the order, the council deferred action until the city engineer could make an examination of the sidewalks in question and report thereon, which report was filed on July 2, 1920, when the council again ordered the cement sidewalks to be laid, and notices to be sent to the property owners; that notice had never been served on them in pursuance of this order, but that the first notice had been served; that later, on August 19, 1920, the council advertised for bids for the construction of said sidewalks, and were proceeding to have the sidewalks put down at plaintiffs' expense. Plaintiffs charge, substantially, that the city is without authority to order their permanent brick sidewalks, in good condition and repair, to be torn up and destroyed and new walks of cement put down at their expense, in order to satisfy a whim or caprice of the members of the council; but if such authority is vested in the council, then its exercise has been unreasonable and arbitrary, is an abuse of power, and amounts to a confiscation of plaintiffs' property. Section 1 of chapter 20 of the charter of the city is as follows:

"It shall be the duty of all persons who are the owners of land or lots which front upon a street or streets which are maintained and kept by the city, to put down and keep in good repair a suitable sidewalk or footwalk along the entire part of such land or lot which fronts upon any such street, and when in the opinion of the council, it has become necessary to repave the same, in such manner, of such width, and of such suitable material, as the council might direct, provided, however, that before any permanent sidewalk or footwalk is laid, it shall be the duty of the city engineer to fix the grade of such sidewalk, and said walk shall be laid in conformity to such grade, and should the city, after said walk is laid, change the grade, the cost of laying a new walk to conform in said changed grade, made necessary by reason of said change of grade, shall be paid by the city, as well as all damages the owner of the land or lot may sustain by reason of said change of grade."

The bill charges that all the brick walks ordered to be torn up have been heretofore laid upon grades established by the city engineer, and that new grades were being established by the city higher than the former grade, which, if done and the new cement sidewalks laid thereon, would greatly damage complainants, and that the city is attempting to compel plaintiffs to lay the new walks on the new grades and pay for the same, notwithstanding it is the duty of the city to bear all the expense and pay all the damage. They further charge that the city has not proceeded, in accordance with the requirements of its charter, to compel plaintiffs to lay these sidewalks, and exhibit all of the orders and proceedings of the council in relation thereto. The bill avers that it is impossible for plaintiffs to comply with the requirements of the city, because it is impossible for them to purchase cement by reason of its scarcity and exorbitant market price; and that if the council is permitted to proceed in its avowed course, plaintiffs will suffer irreparable damage and injury, and prays for an injunction. A temporary injunction was awarded. A demurrer was interposed to this bill, was overruled, and a motion to dissolve the temporary injunction, granted in vacation, was also overruled on November 18, 1920, when the judge certified the following questions to this court:

1. Whether equity has jurisdiction to entertain this suit under the points raised by the demurrer to the effect that there is no jurisdiction to enjoin the city from advertising and letting contract to tear up and rebuild the walks in question under the general powers of the city to reconstruct the walks and pay for same out of general taxes, and that equity could have no jurisdiction until the city attempted to collect or at least levy the special assessment for the cost of said construction.

2. Whether equity has jurisdiction to entertain this suit under the points raised by the demurrer to the effect that there is no jurisdiction to enjoin the city from advertising and letting contracts to tear up and rebuild the walks in question under the general powers of the city to reconstruct walks and pay for the same out of general taxes in the first instance, and thereupon levy the cost thereof as a special assessment against the abutting property, and that equity could have no jurisdiction until the city attempted to collect, or at least levy, the special assessment for the cost of said construction.

3. Whether, under the charter of the city of Elkins, the defendant can compel the plaintiff to tear up the brick sidewalks which have already been laid pursuant to a former ordinance of said city, and replace the same by a cement walk under a new ordinance.

4. Whether the city of Elkins, after first having established grades for sidewalks, and the same have been laid pursuant to ordinance, can now establish a different grade, raising the walk in front of some lots and lowering it in front of others, and compel the lot owners to lay a new walk on the new grade.

[2] The first two questions are answered in the affirmative by this court in the cases of City of Avis v. Allen, 83 W. Va. 789, 99 S. E. 188, and Damron v. City of Huntington, 82 W. Va. 401, 96 S. E. 53, 9 A. L. R. 623. These plaintiffs were served with notice to lay the cement sidewalks within 30 days, or, failing to do so, the city would lay the same at the expense of the plaintiffs, to be charged against their abutting land and collected as other city taxes were collected. Should these plaintiffs stand by and wait until the work had been done, afterwards claiming that it was illegally done, and that it was unlawful to charge their property with the cost thereof, they might have waived their right to question the validity of the assessment when made. Knowing facts which would make this assessment illegal, and then permitting the work to be done, might estop them from preventing the assessment or paying the money. Avis v. Allen, supra; Werninger v. Stephenson, 82 W. Va. 367, 95 S. E. 1035. It is not in all cases that an abutting landowner would be estopped from suit even after the special assessment is laid. If the proceedings were void, then he would not be; but, if irregular or voidable only, he would be estopped. Moundsville v. Yost, 75 W. Va. 224, 83 S. E. 910.

[1] Injunction is the proper remedy. 28 Cyc. 1014. "An injunction lies against a municipality to enjoin the removal by it of a brick sidewalk where it appears that to permit the performance of such act would be to allow a breach of trust and an abuse of a power sought to be exercised in bad faith to the wanton injury of the rights and property of individuals." Nichols v. Village of Sadorus, 120 Ill. App. 70.

Certified questions 3 and 4 are in part answered by section 1 of chapter 20 of the charter and ordinances of the city of Elkins. There can be no question of the broad powers of the city to order the sidewalks to be paved or repaved and kept in order, and to be constructed in such manner and of such material as in the judgment of the council are most suitable, and for the best interests of the inhabitants of the city. Neither is there any doubt of the power of the city to establish and change grades, order paving, sewerage, and the like. The city charter expressly gives these broad powers, and they are usual and necessary in municipal government. The courts will not usually interfere with the discretion and authority vested in municipal officers for the exercise of these necessary functions, unless it is clear that there is an arbitrary abuse of power to the irreparable damage of private rights. The city of Elkins can, by ordinance, change the grade of the streets in front of the property of these plaintiffs, and provide for the laying down of new sidewalks, but under the allegations of the bill to the effect that the grade has heretofore been established and the sidewalks laid down in accordance with that established grade, in good faith, by the property owners, it is incumbent upon the city to pay the cost of laying the new sidewalk to conform with the changed grade, as well as the damages to the lot owners caused by such change, as provided in said section 1, c. 20, of the city's charter and ordinances. It appears from the bill and exhibits, especially Exhibit No. 1, that the city is attempting to assess and collect from the abutting landowners all of the cost of laying the contemplated new cement sidewalks. The allegations of the bill, which on demurrer are admitted to be true, aver that no necessity for the new sidewalks exist; that it is impossible at this time to comply with the notice and demand; that the ordinance had been induced by whim and caprice of some members of the council, and irreparable loss will be sustained by plaintiffs if they are compelled to comply. These allegations would be sufficient for an injunction, as the record now stands, and, if sustained by sufficient evidence, would likely perpetuate the injunction. It is intimated by counsel that there is no basis for these charges, and that the sidewalks are old and out of repair, and a necessity exists for those ordered by council to be laid. We cannot anticipate the evidence. Whether or not the city can cause these sidewalks to be torn up is largely a question of the facts as they exist. We do not think it can do so if the facts are as they appear from this bill.

While the regularity and sufficiency of the ordinances and proceedings of the city council with reference to these sidewalks is raised in the pleadings, it is not included in the questions certified, and we do not discuss it, for that reason, except to say that there seems to have been a substantial compliance with the requirement of the charter. The ordinances were regularly passed and recorded, and, although no notice was given to plaintiffs of the action of the council on July 2d, requiring them to lay their sidewalks within 30 days, notice had been previously served on them to the same effect, they had appeared before the council, petitioned against its action, and seemed to be fully cognizant of all steps taken by the council thereafter, as appears from the bill. One notice is all the charter seems to require.

We sustain the action of the lower court in overruling the demurrer.

GOODWIN et al. v. TONY POCAHONTAS COAL CO. (No. 4204.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Feb. 22, 1921.)

1. New trial \S 72—Verdict not set aside because of weight of evidence of one witness over another.

While an engineer who made the measurements of the quantity of material within a certain space to be excavated before the work was done may have been in a better position to make accurate measurements than an engineer whose calculations were made from measurements after the work was done, this will not give to the calculations of the former such a degree of finality as to justify setting aside the verdict of a jury based upon the measurements of the latter.

2. Witnesses \S 347—May be impeached by showing previous inconsistent conduct.

Evidence of a witness may be impeached by showing his previous conduct inconsistent therewith.

3. Trial \S 85, 207—Evidence competent for any purpose properly admitted over general objection.

Evidence competent for any purpose is properly admitted over a general objection. If the party against whom it is offered would have it limited to a particular purpose, he must move the court to that end.

New trial \S 35—Trial \S 59(2)—Order of introducing testimony discretionary; verdict not set aside because of premature introduction of testimony.

The order of introducing testimony is largely in the discretion of the trial court, and even though it appear that testimony has been introduced at a time at which it was not admissible, if the subsequent developments of the trial make it admissible before the case is finally submitted to the jury, a verdict will not be set aside because of the premature introduction of such testimony.

Error to Circuit Court, McDowell County.

Action by A. T. Goodwin and others against the Tony Pocahontas Coal Company. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Litz & Harman and G. W. Howard, all of Welch, for plaintiff in error.

Sanders & Crockett and A. G. Fox, all of Bluefield, for defendants in error.

RITZ, P. This writ of error seeks reversal of a judgment in favor of the plaintiffs for a balance claimed to be due them for certain work done under a contract providing for the grading of a siding for the defendant. The contract sued on is not in controversy, and simply provided for the doing of the work at a certain stipulated price per yard. It provided no method for ascertaining the quantity, and when the work was completed the parties were unable to agree upon the number of yards of excavation, and this suit resulted from that disagreement.

The plaintiffs contend that at the time they entered upon the work under the contract defendant, through its engineer in charge, agreed to furnish them cross-sections of the work to be done; that he was called upon a number of times therefor, and, failing to furnish the same, they employed an engineer to make cross-sections of so much of the work as had not been done, and also of that part of the work which had been done. After the work was done they had this engineer calculate the quantities from the measurements taken by him upon the ground, both as to the work which had been done when he took the measurements and as to that part of it which then remained to be done. He ascertained that there had been removed 8,238.8 cubic yards of material. The defendant's engineer likewise calculated the quantity from his measurements made on the ground before the work was undertaken, and ascertained that there were only 5,160.77 cubic yards. Payment was made before and at the trial for this quantity, and this controversy involves the excess. The trial resulted in a verdict in favor of the plaintiffs for substantially what they claimed. The defendant insists that this verdict cannot be sustained, for the reason that the estimates submitted in evidence by the plaintiffs, upon which the verdict is based, are not trustworthy, and should not be allowed to stand in opposition to the estimates made by its engineer; and, second, because the court admitted in evidence proof of an agreement had between the parties, after the contro-

[1] As before stated, the contract provided for the payment to the plaintiffs of $1.15 for each yard of material excavated, and the sole question which the jury had to decide was the quantity of this material. The defendant's engineer contends that he accurately measured the ground before the work was done and accurately calculated the quantities from these measurements; while the plaintiffs' engineer claims that as to the work remaining to be done at the time he made his measurements the same were absolutely accurate, and that as to the work which had then been done they were as accurate as could be made under the conditions then existing; that in making his measurements he had to guide him some of the stakes yet remaining, the slope of the ground above the cut, and information furnished him by the men who actually did the work, and that from this he was able to make a reasonably accurate calculation as to the number of yards actually removed. Not only is there a substantial difference between the measurements made by these engineers as to the quantity of work which had been done at the time the plaintiffs' engineer made his measurements, but there is likewise such a difference as to the work which then remained to be done. As to the work which remained to be done at that time, admittedly the engineer employed by the plaintiffs was in just as good a position to ascertain the quantities as the defendant's engineer, and there is no suggestion but that he was just as competent for this purpose. His calculation makes this quantity 855 yards more than it is ascertained to be by the defendant's engineer. It is admitted, both by the plaintiffs and by their engineer, that he was not in position to make as accurate measurements of the quantities removed before he went upon the ground as he would have been had he made his measurements before the removal of the material, and as to this work it may be said that the defendant's engineer had superior information and better opportunity to make correct measurements than the plaintiffs' engineer. But this is not conclusive of the question. There are many suggestions in the evidence of inaccuracies in the work done by the defendant's engineer in other particulars, and particularly it is testified by the engineer employed by the plaintiffs that the defendant's engineer furnished him a profile of the work as well as cross-sections thereof, and that there was a very substantial difference between the quantity of the work shown by the profile made by the defendant's engineer and the quantity as shown by his cross-sections. The jury had this evidence before them, and they were the judges, and the sole judges, as to what weight should be given to the evidence of the witnesses. There was no other way of ascertaining the quantity of material removed by the plaintiffs except to measure it, and while it is admitted that this method might not be absolutely accurate because of the unevenness of the ground, still it was the only practicable method which could be adopted, and it is shown that the result reached, if the measurements were accurately taken, was in all probability within a very few yards of the actual amount of material removed. There is nothing in the nature of the defendant's evidence to give to it the character of finality upon this question. It is quite as probable that the defendant's engineer made mistakes in his measurements and calculations as that the plaintiffs' engineer did. In fact, the jury may well have concluded, because of the discrepancies pointed out in the work of defendant's engineer, that the same was not done with the same care and accuracy as characterized the work done on behalf of the plaintiffs. We think, upon the question as to the quantity of material removed by the plaintiffs, the jury's verdict is not in conflict with such a substantial preponderance of the evidence as would justify setting it aside upon that ground.

[2-4] It is insisted, however, that it was error for the court to permit the plaintiffs to introduce in evidence an agreement had between the parties after the controversy arose to submit the same for decision to an engineer mutually chosen by them. It is contended that this evidence had no tendency to prove any issue involved in the case. It was apparent from the very beginning of the trial, and particularly from cross-examination of the plaintiffs' engineer, that the defendant's contention would be that the estimates made by him as to the quantities removed before he had made any measurements were so uncertain and indefinite as to be unworthy of belief; in fact, that it was impossible to make any measurements after the work was done from which a reliable calculation could be made as to the quantity of material removed, and when the defendant's engineer was placed upon the stand he testified that it was an absolute impossibility to make a reliable estimate as to the amount of material excavated after the excavation had been made. He was the very man who made the agreement to submit the question in controversy to the determination of a third engineer, and his conduct in agreeing that a disinterested engineer might take their work and make his measurements upon the ground, and ascertain the actual quantities, was entirely inconsistent with the testimony he gave that it would be absolutely impossible to make any reliable calculation from such information. This evidence would therefore have a tendency to contradict and impeach the evidence given by the engineer remaining unpaid purchase money, and even reimbursed Clark for the purchase money he paid on this land to practically the full extent that he had made such payments. Clark, on the other hand, insists that when the corporation was organized a resolution was passed by the stockholders and the board of directors acquiring the right to cut the timber upon the lands held by him upon the basis of paying therefor certain prices per thousand feet for the different kinds of timber, the price being $6 per thousand and for the larger part thereof, and that the stock of this company by a like resolution was directed to be issued to him in payment for the mill purchased by him from the Thayer Company, and which had not yet been completed, as well as for the benefits arising from a contract entered into by him with the Thayer Company for the sawing of that company's timber at this mill, and the transportation of the Damascus Lumber Company's logs over that company's railroad. In this way he contends that he acquired all of the stock of the Damascus Lumber Company, and that the only interests which that company owned at the time of the institution of this suit was the mill and the right to cut the timber upon the lands owned by him at the prices mentioned in the resolution above referred to, and whatever advantages might be derived from the Thayer contract, which will be hereafter adverted to. If his contention is sustained, then there is no basis in the evidence for any substantial recovery upon the part of the plaintiff, even though the contract set up by him has been fully proven.

It is insisted that, while we held on the former writ of error that the question arising as to the ownership of these assets was one for the jury, at that time only the evidence introduced on behalf of the plaintiff was before the court, and that with the introduction of the defendant's evidence the plaintiff's showing has been so overwhelmed that the jury could not find a verdict for the plaintiff consistent with all of the evidence. It very clearly appears that at the time of the purchase of this timber and these lands immediately before the organization of the Damascus Lumber Company, it was contemplated by the parties that a corporation would be formed for the purpose of holding their interests in that neighborhood. Not only McCullough testifies to this, but, as before stated, several other parties who were employed by Clark and McCullough in acquiring the timber likewise testify, and some of these other parties were to be allowed to take stock in this corporation, Clark agreeing to let them have some of the stock to which he would be entitled as representing his four-fifths interest in the properties. When the corporation was formed it did take possession of the mill, which had been there-before acquired in an incomplete state, and complete the same, and did enter upon the land and cut the timber thereon and market the lumber derived therefrom through Clark as its selling agent, Clark receiving for all of the lumber thus sold by him 5 per cent. for his services. From 1907 until 1915 it does not appear that any payments were ever made by the company to Clark on account of the timber cut by it, nor does it appear that Clark ever demanded any payments upon this account. It appears that on his books he charged to the company the taxes paid by him upon the land, the money paid by him for the mill before the organization of the company, and the moneys paid by him on account of the purchase of the land, both before and after the organization of the company, and credited the company with all moneys received by him from the sales of lumber, less the 5 per cent. commissions. It is true that the minutes of the organization meeting of the Damascus Lumber Company show that a resolution was passed by its stockholders and its board of directors purchasing from Clark the Thayer contract, including the mill acquired by him from the Thayer people, for all of the capital stock of the corporation fully paid and non-assessable. It is likewise true that the minutes show that Clark made a proposition to the company to sell it the timber upon the tracts of land standing in his name at certain stumpage prices, and it is testified by several witnesses that these resolutions were actually passed at those meetings. McCullough, who was present at the directors' meeting, says that all of the work at that meeting was cut out beforehand, and was passed in a few minutes, and that he does not know anything about such resolutions as these; his contention being that the minutes are fraudulent. But whether they are or not, he insists that no such contract was ever carried out by the company, but that the contract which was carried out was the one existing between him and Clark, the only parties interested in the property, at the time of the formation of the company, to wit, that the corporation should take over the properties, and the interests of Clark and McCullough should be evidenced by the issuance to them of the company's stock in the proportions that they were interested in the property.

It is significant that while Clark contends he was entitled to receive all of the company's stock for the mill and the Thayer contract, one-fifth of this stock was issued to McCullough in strict accordance with his contention as to what the arrangement was; that is, that their respective interests should be evidenced by the issuance of stock in the corporation. Clark now contends that McCullough owes him for this stock, but he does not undertake to explain how it ever happened to be issued to McCullough originally. The other 80 per cent. of the stock was put at Clark's disposal. Seventy-six per cent. of it is now held by him, and 4 per cent. was acquired by another party from him, which 4 per cent. has since been acquired by McCullough. McCullough says that it is true that there was talk between him and Clark about cutting the timber on these tracts of land upon a stumpage basis. He says that Clark advised him that he (Clark) had agreed to let some of the employees take stock in the corporation out of the four-fifths of the stock assigned to him, but that he did not want these employees to have the benefit of the timber purchases, and that he wanted to make an arrangement for the corporation to cut the timber upon a stumpage basis; that this arrangement would make no difference as between himself and McCullough, for the reason that McCullough had the same interest in the timber held in Clark's name that he would have in the corporation, the only effect of it being that Clark would be enabled to prevent the parties to whom he had agreed to sell stock from getting into the company upon what is termed the "ground floor." McCullough says that Clark insisted that inasmuch as this arrangement would not affect McCullough's interest one way or the other, he should allow him to carry it out because of the effect it would have upon the arrangements he had theretofore made with some of the employees in regard to selling them stock; that when this arrangement was explained to these employees who had agreed to take stock, they all refused to take it, and that upon such refusal Clark agreed with him to abandon the arrangement and carry the whole proposition as they had originally intended, and that this was done. Clark contends, on the other hand, that the only interest which the Damascus Lumber Company has in the timber is the contract as shown by the minutes, that is, the right to cut it on the payment of certain stumpage prices. The oral evidence upon this proposition is conflicting. In order to support his contention Clark introduced in evidence certain books kept by him, or under his direction, in Philadelphia, by which he attempted to show that there was kept during all of the time an account with the Damascus Lumber Company showing the amounts of lumber cut of the various kinds, and the amount due by it to him upon the basis of the stumpage contract.

From the evidence in the record we are justified in saying that this stumpage account is fictitious, and was fabricated after the institution of this suit. It was before the jury in the court below, and it is shown by the testimony of witnesses asked in regard to it that the various items are inserted in most instances at the foot of the pages, and that while this account purports to have been commenced in 1907, where it is indexed in the various books of Clark, it is below the index of other accounts commenced long afterward, except in a few instances where some other accounts are made to appear below this Damascus Lumber Company stumpage account in the books, but on reference to the book it appears from the testimony that these entries in the index below the Damascus Lumber Company stumpage account are purely fictitious, there being no such accounts in the books. While these books were introduced in evidence on the trial of the case before the jury, they are not brought to this court as part of the record. It appears that notice was given Clark's counsel some time before the hearing here to produce these books upon this hearing, and the only reply that was made to this notice at the bar of the court was that the books had been taken to Philadelphia, for which reason they could not be produced for our examination. We do not think their production would show any more, perhaps, than the oral evidence in regard to them does show, and that is that this stumpage account was a fabrication from beginning to end, and was made up for the purpose of this case.

[2] There is another significant thing in this connection, and that is that when the audit above referred to was made for the purpose of ascertaining Clark's standing with the Damascus Lumber Company, he charged that company with every cent paid out by him for the purchase of the mill, for the purchase of timber, for taxes paid upon timber, and for all expenses incurred by him in connection therewith. It is a little hard for us to comprehend why the Damascus Lumber Company should be treated as owing him for the money advanced for the purchase of this timber, and for the money advanced by him for the purchase of the mill if, as he says, he still owns the timber and the lumber company never had any interest therein, and he received all of the capital stock of the company as the purchase price of the mill. The effect of this is that the Damascus Lumber Company in this audit is made to pay every cent that was paid for the mill and Clark gets all of its capital stock for nothing. It is likewise made to pay every cent paid out by him for the purchase of timber which he claims he still owns. But he says in explanation of this that this audit was made up only for the purpose of a settlement between him and McCullough, and that inasmuch as their interests in the corporation were the same as their interests in the timber and the land, it was not necessary to separate the two transactions and make a settlement showing how he stood in relation to the standing timber, and what his standing was with the Damascus Lumber Company. This explanation would be plausible were it not for the fact that Clark's interest

The questions propounded by plaintiff for the purpose of eliciting information with respect to the dangers attending the administration of an anæsthetic, and responses of the witness thereto, were irrelevant to the issues involved and therefore improper. They serve no good purpose in cases of this character and may improperly influence or prejudice the jury. The anæsthetic undoubtedly was necessary in this instance, and no harm resulted from its use. As to whether such questions and answers alone would constitute reversible error, we express no opinion, but for reasons stated repetition should be avoided.

The court properly modified plaintiff's instruction by the elimination therefrom of the words "or otherwise," for the only ground of negligence charged in the declaration is that defendant improperly came in contact with plaintiff's truck and thereby caused it to go over the embankment. No alternative ground is relied on, and for that reason the modification was proper.

Of eight instructions requested by defendant three were given. The one directing a verdict for defendant was properly refused, inasmuch as the evidence was such as to constitute a prima facie case of negligence, which required submission to the jury as ultimate triers of disputed facts, without such specific direction as to their finding. To determine what weight and force the evidence was entitled to clearly was within their province. The third instruction was properly refused because covered by defendant's second instruction given. The other three also were properly refused, first, because there is no substantial evidence of plaintiff's contributory negligence; second, because they are embodied, in effect, in the second and third instructions given, which require plaintiff to prove by a preponderance of the testimony that the injury was caused by the negligence of the defendant and that the striking of the truck by defendant's car was the proximate cause of the injury. These two instructions given, by necessary implication, require a finding of no contributory negligence, for in order to arrive at the conclusion that the striking of plaintiff's truck was the proximate cause of the injury, it is necessary to exclude contributory negligence as an intervening cause. But as a matter of fact there is no evidence to support the instructions refused. The nearest approach to it is found in the testimony of W. R. Carter, one of the two witnesses who saw the accident, who said it looked as if plaintiff would have gone over the embankment even if defendant had not struck him. But this is a mere expression of opinion, and without more would scarcely show that plaintiff was contributorily negligent in turning so far to the right in order to give defendant ample space in which to pass.

Our order therefore will reverse the judgment, set aside the verdict, and remand the case for retrial.

ALLEN v. ALLEN. (No. 1953.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia, Dec. 17, 1920.
Rehearing Granted Jan. 14, 1921. Judgment Adhered to March 5, 1921.)

(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

1. Evidence ⇨471(19)—Testimony that improvements were substantial, and such as a man would place on his own land, held conclusions.

In a suit for specific performance, testimony of a witness that improvements described by him were substantial in character, and were such as a man would place on his land, rather than such as he would place on rented land, was properly excluded, as mere conclusions of the witness.

2. Evidence ⇨471(24) — Testimony that plaintiff moved on land in pursuance of gift properly excluded.

In a suit by a son against his father for specific performance of an agreement to convey land, the son's testimony, after he had testified that he moved on the land, that he did so "in pursuance of the gift," was properly excluded.

3. Witnesses ⇨240(8) — Question held properly excluded as leading.

In a suit for specific performance, it was not error to exclude, as leading, the question, "Did you understand that it was a deed to carry out the contract?"

4. Specific performance ⇨29(2)—Description in petition sufficiently definite.

In a suit for specific performance, a description of the land as a tract located in a certain county, on a road leading from a certain gin to another designated road at a specified place, and bounded on the north, east, south, and west by lands of named persons, and containing 85 acres more or less, and being the place on which petitioner was residing, was not too indefinite.

5. Specific performance ⇨121(2)—Parol contract and its terms must be clearly established, so as to leave no reasonable doubt.

Where specific performance of a parol contract for the sale of lands is sought, the contract and its terms should be established so clearly, strongly, and satisfactorily as to leave no reasonable doubt as to the agreement.

6. Specific performance ⇨121(3) — Evidence indefinite and insufficient to support decree on theory of sale or gift of part of land.

In a son's action against his father for specific performance of an agreement to convey 85 acres of land, for which the son was to pay annually a specified quantity of cotton, because the other children were given only 50 acres, where there was no attempt in the evidence to separate any particular 50 acres, and the evidence did not disclose any agreement to execute a deed at any specified time, but showed that the specified payments of cotton were to be made until the father's death, or until he ceased to exact payment, and that neither event had occurred, the evidence was too indefinite and insufficient to support a decree, on the theory that there was a sale or gift of part of the land.

Error from Superior Court, Madison County; W. L. Hodges, Judge.

Action by George T. Allen against George H. Allen. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

C. E. Adams, of Danielsville, and John J. Strickland, of Athens, for plaintiff in error.

T. J. Shackelford and Shackelford & Meadow, all of Athens, and Berry T. Moseley, of Danielsville, for defendant in error.

ATKINSON, J. George T. Allen instituted an action against his father, George H. Allen, for specific performance. The contract, as alleged in the petition as amended, was to the effect that the defendant, desiring to divide certain of his real estate among his children, set apart and put the plaintiff in possession of 85 acres of land, under a parol agreement that, inasmuch as the other children were to receive only 50 acres, the plaintiff should pay to the defendant annually the sum of 2,040 pounds of lint cotton, so long as defendant lived, or so long as he exacted the same; the defendant to make a deed to plaintiff, "in proper form, conveying said described tract of land to petitioner for life, and then to his children, if any, and, if not, to the heirs of" the defendant. It was also alleged that on faith of the gift the plaintiff had made valuable improvements on the land, and had made annual payments in cotton to the defendant as stipulated. In the answer there was a denial of the contract; and an issue was presented by the pleadings, as to whether the contract had been made as alleged, and whether the improvements on the land were made at the expense of the plaintiff or the defendant. The defendant contended that plaintiff's occupancy was as the defendant's tenant. After the close of the evidence introduced by both sides, the judge directed a verdict for the defendant. The plaintiff made a motion for new trial, which was overruled, and he excepted. Held:

[1] 1. Where a witness for the plaintiff described certain improvements made upon the land by the plaintiff, in such manner as to enable the jury to determine the character of the improvements, his further testimony that the improvements were "substantial in character," and were of such "character that a man would place on his land," rather than "the character that a man would place on the land that he rented," amounted to mere conclusions of the witness, and were properly excluded from evidence.

[2] 2. After the plaintiff, testifying in his own behalf, stated that he moved on the land after the date of the alleged gift, it was not cause for reversal to exclude his further testimony that he moved on the land "in pursuance of the gift."

[3] 3. The court did not err in refusing to allow the plaintiff, while testifying in his own behalf, to answer the question, "Did you understand that it was a deed to carry out the contract?" the question being objected to on the ground that it was leading.

[4] 4. The description of the land was not too indefinite to be the basis of a decree for specific performance. The description was:

"A tract of land located in Madison county on a road leading from Lonny Williams' gin to the Danielsville and Athens road at the J. F. Colbert place, bounded on the north by lands of Van Jenkins, on the east by lands of W. T. Allen, on the south by lands of Hassey T. Rowe, and on the west by lands of W. J. Glenn and Robert Born, and contains eighty-five (85) acres, more or less, and being the place on which petitioner now resides."

[5, 6] 5. "Where specific performance is sought for the enforcement of a parol contract for the sale of lands, such contract and the terms thereof should be established so clearly, strongly, and satisfactorily as to leave no reasonable doubt as to the agreement." Lloyd v. Redford, 148 Ga. 575, 97 S. E. 523, and citations. There was no attempt in the evidence to separate any particular 50 acres to which a gift might apply from any 35 acres to which a sale might apply; nor did the evidence disclose any agreement to execute a deed at any specified time. Moreover, the plaintiff's evidence was to the effect that he was to make specified payments in cotton until the death of defendant or until he ceased to exact payment, and that neither of these events had occurred before institution of the suit. Under these circumstances the evidence was too indefinite to support a decree of specific performance on the theory of a gift of a part of the land, and too indefinite and otherwise insufficient to support a decree for specific performance on the theory of a sale of a part of the land. Construing the evidence for the plaintiff in its most favorable light, the judge did not err in directing a verdict for defendant.

Judgment affirmed.

SIGMAN v. ADAMS et al. (No. 1967.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 16, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Evidence \S 183(13)—Testimony as to inability to find bond for title held to justify parol evidence of its contents.

In an ejectment suit instituted by an administrator de bonis non cum testamento an- nexo, a defendant proposed to show paramount outstanding title against the plaintiff, relying in part upon evidence that in 1887 the testator had conveyed the land to a lender of money as security for a loan, receiving a bond for reconveyance of the land on payment of the loan, and that after receiving the bond for title the testator transferred and delivered it in pursuance of a contract of sale to a third person. Held, that foundation was properly laid for introduction of parol evidence as to the contents of the bond for title, and a transfer written thereon, by testimony of the widow of the alleged transferee to the effect that after the death of the transferee the bond for title, being in her possession, was turned over to a named attorney at law who represented her, and that it was never returned to her, and it could not be found among the papers left by her husband (who was the alleged transferee), and testimony of the son of the attorney at law, since deceased, to the effect that his mother was executrix, that he was in possession of all the papers and other effects left by his father, and that after diligent search among them, made by himself and by his mother, the paper could not be found.

2. Vendor and purchaser \S 219—Paper executed by transferee of bond for title held not conveyance, but admissible as tending to show terms of transfer.

The loan deed and bond for title were executed on May 21, 1887. F. M. Sigman was the grantor named in the deed, and the obligee named in the bond for title. W. T. Sigman was the alleged transferee of the bond for title. A paper dated November 19, 1890, was shown by aliunde evidence to have been signed and delivered by W. T. Sigman to F. M. Sigman, contemporaneously with the transfer of the bond for title, and to have been retained by him until his death, as follows: "Whereas W. T. Sigman, of Newton county, has bought of F. M. Sigman, of said county, said lands lying and being in said county, upon the following conditions, to wit: The said W. T. Sigman is to pay off the debt of F. M. Sigman to Corbin Banking Company, with interest, as it becomes due, and pay off all the indebtedness of said F. M. Sigman that is due other parties that may be due, and that the said W. T. Sigman is to furnish the said F. M. Sigman a two-horse farm and home for himself and wife as long as they live. It is further agreed that the crops grown on the place the present year and fall be applied to the debts of the tenants which the said F. M. Sigman shall be or is bound for. All of which consideration and agreement the said W. T. Sigman binds himself, his heirs, executors or administrators to perform or fulfill, this November 19, 1890." Other extrinsic evidence tended to show that W. T. Sigman recognized and carried out the obligations imposed upon him, as specified in the writing, until his death. Held, the paper does not purport to speak the whole contract, and, considered alone, is insufficient as a conveyance; but it was admissible in evidence, in connection with the other evidence in the case, as tending to show the terms and consideration of the contract for transfer of the bond for title.

3. Judgment \S 951(2)—Inadmissible as evidence without showing disposition of appeal.

A transcript from the court of ordinary showing that certain legatees had cited the executrix for a settlement, and that on issue duly made it was found that during his life the testator had disposed of the land now involved in the ejectment suit, and that the case was appealed to the superior court, if otherwise relevant, was not admissible without showing what disposition was made of the case on appeal.

4. Pleading \S 236(4)—Refusal to reopen case to permit amendment of petition held not abuse of discretion.

At the trial term, and after both sides had introduced evidence and announced closed, it was not an abuse of discretion to refuse to open the case for the purpose of allowing the plaintiff to amend the original petition (even if the proposed amendment was otherwise allowable) by setting up matter not alleged in the original petition, and offering new evidence in support of such amendment.

5. Vendor and purchaser \S 214(6) — Instrument reciting that party had purchased on specified conditions held to mean consideration or terms.

The words "upon the following conditions," as contained in the paper quoted in the second headnote of this decision, when properly construed in connection with the context, refer to "consideration" and "terms," and the paper does not create a condition precedent.

6. Appeal and error \S 1052(8) — Ejectment \S 9(3)—Administrator of one receiving and transferring bond for title cannot maintain ejectment against stranger; admission of evidence harmless where uncontradicted evidence shows no right to maintain action.

The plaintiff sues in ejectment in his representative capacity as an administrator with the will annexed. The uncontradicted evidence shows that the testator executed a security deed embracing the land in dispute, whereby he conveyed the legal title to a lender of money, and received from such lender a bond the condition of which was to reconvey to the grantor the land upon payment of the debt. After receiving such bond for title, the obligee therein (the testator) transferred the same under a contract of absolute sale to a third person. Held, the testator, by such sale and transfer of the bond for title, divested himself of all interest in the land, and after his death the legal representative of his estate could not maintain ejectment for recovery of the land against a stranger setting up such outstanding title. In view of this ruling, the error in admitting evidence, as ruled in the third headnote, is harmless.

7. Direction of verdict not error.

The judge did not err in directing the verdict for the defendant.

SHEHANE v. GREER et al. (No. 1998.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 17, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Action \S 50(10)—Petition in suit to wind up affairs of corporation multifarious, where one defendant was not interested in such winding up; petition in suit by purchasers of lots on contract against grantee held multifarious.

Where a land improvement corporation, the owner of a tract of land divided up into a large number of lots, sold off certain of these lots, deeds being given in certain instances and in others mere receipts, showing that the purchasers had bought under a "contract plan," of which there was no record notice, no bond for title being given, and afterwards the corporation executed a trust deed conveying all of the property, which provided for the execution of deeds by the trustee to purchasers of the lots, and which contained, also, a power of sale upon the happening of stated contingencies, and, the contingencies contemplated having occurred, the trustee sold the property under the power of sale, after duly advertising the same, and executed a deed to the purchaser at the sale, conveying all the lands embraced in the deed from the owner to the trustee except certain designated lots, and the land corporation, the original owner, ceased carrying on the business, a petition in equity, filed by a stockholder of the land corporation, in behalf of himself and other stockholders therein, and in behalf of certain parties who purchased certain of the lots, against the purchaser at the trustee's sale, holding under a deed duly executed by the trustee in conformity with the power contained in the trust deed, to wind up the affairs of the land corporation, and praying the appointment of a receiver to take charge of its assets and do other things necessary until the final winding up of the business of the corporation, was multifarious, because: (a) The purchaser at the trustee's sale was not concerned with the winding up of the affairs of the corporation which had gone out of business. (b) No such relation between the various purchasers of the lots, upon which they base their claim of equity therein, is shown that gives them the right to maintain a joint suit against the purchaser at the trustee's sale and have a decree against her establishing such equity.

2. Action \Rightarrow 50(10)—Reformation of instruments \Rightarrow 29—Purchasers of lots from mortgagor not entitled to have deed from trustee under power of sale reformed.

No facts are set forth showing the right of the plaintiffs to the reformation of the deed executed by the trust company to the purchaser of the property described in the trust deed.

3. Action \Rightarrow 50(10)—Purchasers from mortgagor not entitled to join in suit against trustee's grantee to prevent multiplicity of suits.

Nor was there such a community of right to be established as between the plaintiffs as to authorize them to maintain the petition under the provisions of Civ. Code 1910, § 5419, making multiplicity a ground for the consolidation of causes.

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

4. Mortgages \Rightarrow 372(1)—Grantee, to whom trustee conveyed under power of sale, held not charged with constructive notice of rights of purchasers from mortgagor.

Under a deed of trust covering land divided into lots, and providing that the mortgagor might sell lots by warranty deed, and that the trustee would execute quitclaim deeds on deposit of $50 for each lot, one to whom the trustee conveyed under power of sale on default was not charged with constructive notice of the equities of those who had purchased lots on contract, and who had neither a deed nor a bond for title on record.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; Geo. L. Bell, Judge.

Suit by R. L. Greer and others against Mrs. J. F. Shehane. Demurrers to the petition were overruled, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

The Southland Estates Corporation (hereinafter referred to as the Southland Company), a Georgia corporation, undertook to develop a certain tract of land located near Atlanta for residential purposes. The tract was named "Westland Estates," and was subdivided into approximately 1,950 lots. To procure the money necessary for this development, first mortgage bonds in the amount of approximately $28,000 were issued, and to secure them the Southland Company executed to the Hillyer Trust Company (now the Atlanta Trust Company), as trustee, a trust deed to this real estate. The property was described in terms of acreage in the deed. A copy of the trust deed is attached to one of the amendments filed in the case and made a part of the record. It was provided in this trust deed that the active management of the property was to remain in the Southland Company, and that it should be "permitted to improve, sell, or transfer" any part or all of the property by warranty deed countersigned by the trustee, and that, upon deposit by the Southland Company with the trustee of a sum equal to $50 for each 25-foot unit lot sold, the trustee should issue quitclaim deed to such lot to the purchaser. The trust deed further provided that—

"The company shall have the entire and exclusive charge, control, and management of said property, and shall make such improvements from time to time as shall be deemed necessary for the better and more rapid sale of this property, and shall collect and receive all moneys paid in and for any contracts for the sale of any lot on the contract plan of sale."

It further provided that all such moneys so received over and above 20 per cent. of the amount of sale of each lot up to the amount of $50 on each 25-foot unit lot of land so sold should be deposited with the trustee, to be applied to the payment of the bonds. Pursuant to the purposes for which it was organized, and under the powers expressly given it in the trust deed, as above set out, the corporation proceeded to sell off the lots into which the property had been subdivided, and to further promote the sale of the lots a contract plan of sale was instituted, whereby lots were sold on installment basis, with a small cash payment, and monthly notes for the balance. The contract provided that when the payments were completed the company should deliver to the purchaser a warranty deed to the lots bought by him.

In the early part of 1919 the corporation became in arrears in the payment of its obligations to the bondholders and to the trustee. The trust deed provided that in such event the trustee should have the right and power to take possession of the property, and—

"to sell any or all unsold portions of this property, either by private sale or public outcry, in whole or in part, for the benefit of the bondholders, and to convey by deed to purchasers land so sold."

Upon the default by the corporation above mentioned, the trustee advertised the entire property for sale, describing same in acreage as in the trust deed, and excepting only those lots for which warranty deeds had been issued by the corporation and quitclaim deeds given by the trustee. In April, 1919, it was sold to Mrs. James F. Shehane, the plaintiff in error. Thereupon the trustee executed a deed to Mrs. Shehane, conveying the entire property conveyed by the trust deed, excepting certain specified lots for which warranty deeds by the Southland Company and quitclaim deeds by the trustee had been given to purchasers. This deed, therefore, covered in terms all of the lots which had been sold by the company under the contract plan of sale, as above set out, upon which the payments had not been completed, and to which warranty and quitclaim deeds had not been issued. At the time of this sale there were 1,541 lots which had not been sold in any manner, and there were outstanding contracts with some 250 persons, who had purchased approximately 500 lots under the contract plan of sale. All of them had paid at least a part of their purchase money; others had paid in full. After the sale to Mrs. Shehane, the trustee refused to accept money tendered to it by the Southland Company on account of these lots, and to give quitclaim deeds to the purchasers upon the completion of their payments for same. It is alleged that at the time of said sale by the trustee Mrs. Shehane and the trustee had both actual and constructive notice of all of the details of the "contract plan of sale," and of the fact that a great number of these lots had been sold under same to various purchasers.

At this stage suit was instituted by R. L. Greer, a stockholder of the Southland Company, against that company and the trustee, both residents of Fulton county, Ga., and against Mrs. Shehane, a resident of Oglethorpe county, in behalf of himself and other stockholders and the purchasers of lots under the contract plan of sale, asking for a receiver for the corporation to wind up its affairs. The original petition and amendments set forth this state of facts, as well as allegations that the Southland Company had ceased to conduct any business, and that its only assets were the purchase-money notes on the lots sold as above stated, and that the corporation was making no effort to collect them. A temporary receiver was appointed by the court. The case coming on to be heard on July 4, 1919, the Southland Company was, on its answer and prayer, and without objection, made a party plaintiff by order of court, and the temporary receiver previously appointed was made permanent.

Interventions were filed by two of the holders of contracts of sale, asking that they be made parties plaintiff, and that they be granted relief to prevent the loss of the money which they had paid in on the lots purchased by them. One of these parties has paid all of the balance due on his purchase price, the other has met all of his payments under his contract as they became due, and now stands ready, able, and willing to continue his payments according to his contract. All of the plaintiffs pray that the affairs of the Southland Company be wound up under the direction of the court; that the defendants, the trustee and Mrs. Shehane, be compelled to execute such papers as are necessary to give good, legal title to the purchasers under the contracts of sale upon payment by them of the balance due; and that the deed from the trustee to Mrs. Shehane be so reformed as to include only those 1,541 lots of this real estate which had never been sold by warranty deed or contract plan of sale or otherwise.

The plaintiff in error filed demurrers, both general and special, to the original petition and all amendments and interventions in the case. Among other grounds of demurrer are those which, in substance, raise the contentions: (1) That the superior court of Fulton county had no jurisdiction over the defendant Mrs. Shehane, on the ground that substantial relief is not prayed against any of the other defendants, and therefore that the suit should be brought in the county of Oglethorpe where she resides. (2) That a stockholder, not having complied with the provisions of section 2224 of the Civil Code, could not bring a suit for and in behalf of others and of the purchasers, and ask for the appointment of a receiver for the corporation and other relief. (3) That there is a misjoinder of causes of action, and of parties plaintiff and defendant, and that the petition is multifarious. (4) That there is no equity shown by the petition. The court overruled the demurrers upon all the grounds.

McWhorter & McWhorter and Erwin, Erwin & Nix, all of Athens, for plaintiff in error.

Mallet & Bell, Troutman & Freeman, Wm. A. Fuller, and King & Spalding, all of Atlanta, for defendants in error.

BECK, P. J. [1-3] Certain of the grounds of the demurrer it is unnecessary to discuss or consider, except as incidentally involved in the contention made by one of the defendants, Mrs. Shehane (who is hereinafter referred to as the defendant), in her several demurrers, that the petition as it originally stood and the petition considered together with the several interventions was multifarious. It is unnecessary to determine whether she is in a position to urge her contention, set forth in one ground of her demurrer, that Greer had no right to bring the suit, not having complied with the provisions of section 2224 of the Civil Code relating to proceedings by minority stockholders for fraud, or acts ultra vires, against a corporation, because, so far as Mrs. Shehane is concerned, the case should have been dismissed as to her on the ground that the suit is multifarious, and that she could not be proceeded against in a suit brought in Fulton county; Oglethorpe being the county of her residence. The defendant bought the tract of land formerly owned by the Southland Estates Corporation (hereinafter called the Southland Company) at a sale by the trustee, the Atlanta Trust Company (hereinafter referred to as the Trust Company), in pursuance of a power contained in a trust deed made by the Southland Company. That deed contained the following provision, among others:

and operate the aforesaid real property and be permitted to improve, sell, or transfer any part or all of this property upon the terms and conditions following, that is to say: The company shall be permitted to sell from time to time, by issuance of warranty deed or deeds, which warranty deed or deeds shall be countersigned by the aforesaid trustee for any lot or lots in said property hereinbefore described, and known as Westland Estates on terms and conditions, as follows: That upon deposit by the company with the trustee of a sum equal to fifty ($50.00) dollars for each twenty-five (25) foot unit lot in the property hereinbefore described, the trustee shall issue to the person or persons, firm or firms, corporation or corporations, designated by the company, a quitclaim deed or quitclaim deeds to such lot or lots as may be so specified by the company. When making such deposit a plat of the property is to be filed with the trustee fully and clearly locating said lot or lots. Such payments made by the company to the trustee as hereinbefore set forth shall be used by the trustee for the payment of interest or the retirement and cancellation of bonds until all bonds are retired and interest paid, and for no other purpose. The company shall have entire and exclusive control, charge, and management of said property, and shall make such improvement from time to time as shall be deemed necessary for the better and more rapid sale of this property, shall keep all places, wherever of sufficient value to warrant, insured, and shall pay all taxes and improvement charges which may be assessed from time to time against the property, and shall collect and receive all moneys paid in for any contract for the sale of any lot on the contract plan of sale; but all such moneys so received over and above 20 per cent. of the amount of sale of each lot up to the amount of fifty ($50.00) dollars on each twenty-five (25) foot unit lot of land so sold shall be deposited with the trustee, to be by him applied to the payment of said bonds, interest and principal."

[4] Neither in the part of the deed set forth immediately above nor in any other part of the deed do we find anything that would give to the purchaser at a trustee's sale constructive notice of the equities of those who had purchased on the contract plan from the Southland Company, where they had neither deed nor bond for title recorded. Counsel for defendants in error insist in their argument that Mrs. Shehane had both constructive notice and actual notice of the rights of the numerous persons actually parties to the suit or for whose benefit the suit is instituted; but nowhere in the pleadings is there any attempt to point out what the actual notice was that Mrs. Shehane had received. The claim that she had constructive notice is based upon the wording of the trust deed. There is nothing in the trust deed nor in the advertisement of the property to show that the trustee was not selling what had been conveyed to it by the Southland Company, except the designated lots. If Mrs. Shehane had had constructive notice of the claims of numerous purchasers on the contract plan, there would have been no merit in her demurrer on the ground of multifariousness. There would have been a unity in the nature of the plaintiff's and the interveners' equities, which would have welded the claims of equity on the part of the purchasers into a harmonious whole, and they could have been joined in one suit as parties plaintiff. But, there being nothing to show constructive notice to Mrs. Shehane of these equities, then each one of the purchasers of the lots, who had no deed or bond for title recorded, must rely upon proof of actual notice. The suit does not indicate what actual notice was conveyed to her before she purchased; and in seeking to establish their equities, the proof to show actual notice will be as varied as the persons bringing the suits. If there had been one act, or possibly a class of acts, which could be insisted upon as giving actual notice—as if there had been an announcement at the sale that certain parties were vested with equities under these contracts for the sale, or some similar fact constituting notice—then possibly the parties could have made that unity in the character of the notice, it being common to all, the basis of a joint suit. But the claim of constructive notice not appearing to be valid, and no common fact being urged as constituting actual notice which would support the claims of equity on the part of the purchasers on the contract plan, there is no right shown to unite these purchasers in one suit against Mrs. Shehane to have their claims established and deeds executed to them.

So far as concerns the contention that the plaintiffs should have the right to maintain this joint action for the establishment of alleged equities, on the theory that it is necessary to reform the deed from the Trust Company, that also must fail so far as it affects Mrs. Shehane's rights, for the reason that the Trust Company executed the kind of deed that it was authorized to execute under the terms of the trust deed, and there was nothing in the latter instrument to indicate to Mrs. Shehane that there were outstanding equities adverse to the title conveyed to her.

So far as the petition seeks to make Mrs. Shehane a party to the proceedings to wind up the affairs of the Southland Company and to join all the parties with claims of equity based on the payment of a part of the purchase money who had no deed or bond for title recorded, the petition in this case is multifarious, and the court erred in not sustaining that ground of the demurrer. So far as it was a proceeding against Mrs. Shehane and the Trust Company, in order to compel the execution of deeds, the petition must fail, because as to the relief sought in this part of the petition Mrs. Shehane is the only party against whom substantial relief is sought, there being no case shown to authorize the reformation of the deed as against Mrs. Shehane.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 19, 1921.)

(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

1. Fraudulent conveyances \S 295(4)—Claimant in execution entitled to show note on which judgment was based was obtained by fraud and did not represent indebtedness.

Where after a note was given, but before judgment was obtained thereon, the maker made a voluntary conveyance of land to his wife, and execution was levied on the land and a claim interposed by the wife, she was not concluded by the judgment, but could show that the note was procured by fraud, and that the husband did not owe the payee anything.

2. Fraudulent conveyances \S 295(4)—Claimant in execution, having voluntary conveyance from husband, entitled to show husband was solvent and conveyance in good faith.

A wife, claiming property levied on under an execution against her husband, under a voluntary deed from him, was entitled to show that the husband was solvent when the deed was executed, and that the transaction was in good faith, and not for the purpose of hindering or delaying creditors.

Passmore & Forehand, of Sylvester, for defendant in error.

ATKINSON, J. [1] 1. A husband gave his promissory note to one claiming to be his creditor; a judgment was obtained on the note, and execution issued thereon was levied on land as property of the husband; and his wife interposed a statutory claim. On trial of the claim case it appeared that the wife was in possession of the land under a duly recorded voluntary deed executed by the husband to her after execution of the note, but before institution of the suit on the note. Held, that the wife was not concluded by the judgment, and on the trial of the claim she was authorized to introduce evidence tending to show that the note was procured by fraud of the payee practiced on the husband, and that the latter did not owe the payee anything at the time the note was given or at the date of the conveyance from the husband to the wife. Ruker v. Womack, 55 Ga. 399; Morris v. Murphey, 95 Ga. 307, 22 S. E. 635, 51 Am. St. Rep. 81; Elwell v. New England Mortgage Sec. Co., 101 Ga. 496, 28 S. E. 833; Moody v. Millen, 103 Ga. 452, 30 S. E. 258; Marshall v. Charland, 106 Ga. 42, 31 S. E. 791; 15 R. C. L. 1028, § 503, notes 18, 19.

[2] 2. Applying the principle above announced, the trial court erred in rejecting the evidence offered by the claimant, tending to show that the note did not represent an existing debt owed by the donor, at the time the deed was executed; that the donor was solvent; that the transaction between the donor and his wife was in good faith, and not made for the purpose of hindering or delaying creditors. The error in rejecting such evidence affected the verdict finding the property subject; and the judgment refusing a new trial must be reversed.

Suit by the Putnam Mills & Power Company against I. L. Stonecypher and others. To review an adverse order, plaintiff brings error. Writ of error dismissed.

See, also, 105 S. E. 482.

Davidson, Callaway & De Jarnette, of Eatonton, for plaintiff in error.

R. C. Jenkins, of Eatonton, for defendants in error.

FISH, C. J. The Putnam Mills & Power Company brought an action against I. L. Stonecypher and others, seeking to enjoin the defendants from obtaining a charter in the name of Stonecypher's Light Company to furnish electricity for light, heat, and power. Upon presentation of the petition the judge of the superior court granted an order requiring the defendants to show cause why the injunction should not be granted, and temporarily restrained them until further order. At the preliminary hearing the judge passed the following order:

"After hearing the application for injunction, the court is of the opinion that, under paragraph 2 of section 2823 of the Civil Code, it is the duty of the court to grant the application for charter of the Stonecypher Light Company, as it is legitimately within the purview and intention of said Code. This judgment is not intended to give to the Stonecypher Light Company any legal rights as to the streets of the city of Eatonton, or debar the complainant of hereafter raising the question as to any vested rights that they may now have."

The petitioner filed a bill of exceptions setting forth the case, the order as quoted, and then continuing as follows:

"To which order the plaintiff in error, the said Putnam Mills & Power Company, then and there excepted, and now excepts, and assigns the same as error as being contrary to law, and says that the judge should then and there have granted said injunction."

The order passed by the judge at the preliminary hearing did not refer to the prior restraining order, nor expressly refuse to grant an interlocutory injunction. There can be no order or judgment by inference or implication that can be the subject of review by an appellate court. As there was no judgment upon which error could be assigned, the bill of exceptions must be dismissed.

Writ of error dismissed.

WRIGHT et al. v. TOMLIN. (No. 2071.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 18, 1921.)

(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

New trial \Leftrightarrow 78(1)—Grant of second new trial in suit against administrator purchasing intestate's land held not error.

Where an administrator sold his intestate's interest in land for which he had a bond for title, and individually purchased it from the purchaser, and thereafter made final return including the proceeds of the sale, and the guardians of minor heirs contested the return and obtained judgments for a larger amount than as reported, and, after attaining majority, certain of the children sued to set aside the conveyances and recover an interest in the land and mesne profits, the grant of a new trial to defendant held not error, though he had already been granted a new trial by the judge presiding on a former trial.

Error from Superior Court, Carroll County; J. R. Terrell, Judge.

Action by Horry Wright and others against W. T. Tomlin. A new trial was granted on defendant's motion, and plaintiffs bring error. Affirmed.

S. Holderness and Smith & Smith, all of Carrollton, for plaintiffs in error.

F. S. Loftin and D. B. Whitaker, both of Franklin, and A. H. Freeman, of Newnan, for defendant in error.

ATKINSON, J. In 1893 B. E. Wright bargained with J. K. Roop for the purchase of a certain tract of land, agreeing to pay therefor $272 in subsequent separate payments. He paid a portion of the price, and died in possession, holding his vendor's bond for title. Early in 1898 the administrator upon the estate of B. E. Wright, having obtained an appropriate order of sale from the court of ordinary, sold his intestate's equitable interest in the land at public outcry. A deed was executed to the successful bidder, who on the same day executed a deed conveying such equitable interest to the administrator in his individual capacity. The administrator having no funds belonging to the estate to pay the obligor named in the bond for title the balance of the purchase money, made a personal contract with him for his interest in the land for such amount, and paid it with his individual money and received a deed from such obligor for the entire interest in the land. During the same year the administrator made a final return to the ordinary, in which was included as an item against himself the proceeds of the sale of his intestate's interest in the land. The guardians of the minor children of the intestate, who were his only heirs at law, appeared in the court of ordinary and contested the administrator's return, and upon an appeal to the superior court they obtained judgments against the administrator for a larger amount than as reported in his return, which judgment included the proceeds of the sale of the equitable interest of the intestate in the land. This judgment was rendered at the September term, 1898, of the superior court, and the amounts thereof were duly paid by the administrator to the guardians of the several minors. In 1914 three of the children of the intestate, who in the meantime had attained majority, instituted an action against the administrator to set aside the conveyance made by him to the purchaser at administrator's sale, and also the deed from such purchaser to the administrator in his individual capacity, and to recover an undivided three-fourths interest in the entire land, and mesne profits. At the time the action was brought the petitioners were respectively 23, 25, and 27 years of age. No attack was made on the judgments obtained by the petitioners against the administrator. A special verdict was rendered in favor of the petitioners, which included a recovery of a three-fourths interest in the entire land. Held, that the court did not err in granting the defendant a new trial, notwithstanding the fact that a new trial had been formerly granted him by another judge who presided on a former trial.

ANDERSON v. THORNTON. (No. 2094.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 17, 1921.)

(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

1. Appeal and error \S 1078(6) — Grounds of motion for new trial not argued in brief are abandoned.

The general grounds of a motion for a new trial are considered as abandoned in the Supreme Court when not argued or mentioned in the brief for plaintiff in error.

2. Cancellation of instruments \S 51 — Charge that grantor must act at once on discovering fraud faulty, but not fatal.

In a suit to cancel a deed for fraud and undue influence, an instruction that a party seeking to set aside a contract for fraud must act at once to set the contract aside on the discovery of the fraud, though not beyond criticism, did not mean that she must file suit at once, but that she must act in some manner to put defendant upon notice that she had repudiated the conveyance and demanded a reconveyance.

3. Appeal and error \S 1066 — Inaccurate charge on fraud held harmless where there was no evidence of fraud.

In a suit to cancel a deed for fraud and undue influence, an inaccurate charge as to plaintiff's duty to act promptly on discovery of the fraud was harmless where there was no evidence to sustain the allegation of fraud.

Error from Superior Court, Elbert County; W. L. Hodges, Judge.

Suit by Janie Anderson against C. G. Thornton. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Grogan & Payne, of Elberton, for plaintiff in error.

Worley & Nall, of Elberton, for defendant in error.

GILBERT, J. This is a suit to cancel a deed on the ground of fraud and undue influence, and because no consideration passed. The plaintiff alleges that she had confidence in her brother, and believed that he would carry out his promises to hold title to the property for her benefit and pay to her one-half of the rents received therefrom, and thus make her secure against the loss of the same through her husband. The defendant denied these allegations and alleged that the deed was made freely and voluntarily by his sister in settlement of a pre-existing indebtedness due by her to him, and that this was the consideration for the deed. The jury returned a verdict for the defendant. The plaintiff made a motion for new trial on the general grounds and afterwards amended by alleging error because the court charged the jury as follows:

"I charge you that a party on the discovery of the fraud—that is, where he seeks to set aside the contract for fraud—on the discovery of the fraud must act at once to set the contract aside."

Movant insists that the charge is contrary to law, and that it virtually charged the plaintiff out of court, because suit had not been filed immediately on discovering the fraud. Held:

[1] 1. The general grounds of the motion for new trial were not argued or mentioned in the brief of the plaintiff in error, and accordingly they are considered as abandoned.

[2, 3] 2. Under a fair construction of the charge excepted to, the words "must act at once" do not mean that the plaintiff must file suit at once, but that it was incumbent upon her to act in some manner to put the defendant upon notice that she had repudiated her act in executing the deed, and that she demanded a reconveyance. While the charge is not entirely beyond criticism, as a charge that the plaintiff must act promptly would have been more accurate, the charge as given is not ground for reversal under the facts of the case; for, while fraud is alleged, there is no evidence to sustain that allegation.

Judgment affirmed.

All the Justices concur; ATKINSON, J., in the result.

TIFT et al. v. SHAW, Sheriff. (No. 2079.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 17, 1921.)

(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

1. Judgment \S 435 — Failure of deputy clerk of city court to notify attorney held not to support suit attacking judgment.

Where judgment in a claim case in a city court was rendered against the claimant in the absence of him and his attorney, the failure of the deputy clerk to notify the attorney when court would convene, send him a calendar, and keep him informed as to when the case would be tried did not furnish ground for attacking the judgment in equity.

2. Injunction \S 135 — Refusal of interlocutory injunction against judgment rendered in claim case in claimant's absence held not abuse of discretion.

In a suit by a claimant of property levied on under a fi. fa. from the city court, against whom judgment was rendered in his absence, to enjoin prosecution of a suit on his forthcoming bond, the refusal of an interlocutory injunction held not an abuse of discretion.

Error from Superior Court, Tift County; R. Eve, Judge.

Suit by A. C. Tift and others against J. M. Shaw, Sheriff. An interlocutory injunction was refused, and plaintiffs bring error. Affirmed.

B. C. Williford, of Tifton, for plaintiffs in error.

Passmore & Forehand, of Sylvester, and Riddgill & Mitchell, of Tifton, for defendant in error.

ATKINSON, J. A statutory claim was interposed to a levy made on personalty under a fl. fa. issued from the city court of Sylvester. The claimant executed a forthcoming bond and obtained possession of the property. On the trial of the claim case, on call of the docket at a regular term of the city court, during the absence of claimant and his attorney, a verdict was returned, finding the property subject, and judgment was duly entered. The property was readvertised; and, the claimant having failed to produce it as provided in the bond, the sheriff instituted suit in the city court, for the use of the plaintiff in fl. fa., against the claimant and the surety on the forthcoming bond. Thereafter the claimant brought an equitable suit in the superior court against the sheriff, to enjoin prosecution of the latter suit, and for other relief. The exception is to the refusal of an interlocutory injunction. Held:

[1] 1. The failure of the deputy clerk of the city court of Sylvester to notify the attorney of record for the claimant, when the court would convene, and to send such attorney "a calendar and to keep him informed" as to when the case would be tried, will not furnish ground for attacking in equity the judgment rendered in the claim case as void, although neither the claimant nor his attorney had actual notice of when the case would be tried. Johnson v. Driver, 108 Ga. 595, 34 S. E. 158; Park v. Callaway, 128 Ga. 119, 57 S. E. 229; Lanier v. Nunnally, 128 Ga. 358, 57 S. E. 689.

2. Another ground of attack upon the judgment, alleged in the equitable petition, was that claimant's attorney had employed the attorney for plaintiff in fl. fa. (without knowing that he was such) to assist him in the trial of the claim case, and that the attorney so employed, without notifying claimant's attorney when that case would be tried, proceeded in his absence, for the plaintiff in fl. fa., with the trial of the claim case, and obtained judgment against claimant. The answer denied such employment or any duty to inform claimant's attorney when the case would be tried; and the evidence submitted at the interlocutory hearing of the suit in equity on those issues was conflicting, and did not require a finding for the plaintiff.

[2] 3. There was no abuse of discretion in refusing an interlocutory injunction.

Judgment affirmed.

(Nos. 1932, 1992.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 17, 1921.)

(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

1. Pleading \S 36(3)—Testimony cannot be permitted to contradict and overcome averment of witness to the contrary which has not been stricken.

Where in a suit for partition of partnership property defendant pleaded a settlement, under which he purchased plaintiff's interest, and performance of the contract by him except as to payment for plaintiff's interest, which he alleged had been tendered, his testimony that a payment made by him to plaintiff was consideration for all of plaintiff's interest could not be allowed to contradict and overcome his averment, never stricken, to the effect that such payment was to reimburse plaintiff for certain advances.

2. New trial \S 24 — Attacks on decree not proper ground of motion.

Attacks on a decree furnished no ground of a motion for a new trial.

3. Partnership \S 329—In suit for partition of property, verdict held properly directed for plaintiff.

In a suit to partition partnership property, where the evidence for plaintiff sustained his case as laid in the petition claiming a one-half interest in the property, and that for defendant failed to substantiate his answer alleging a settlement and payment made under agreement that defendant was to get all of plaintiff's interest, direction of a verdict for partition was required.

Error from Superior Court, Worth County; R. Eve, Judge.

Action by E. M. Johnson against T. J. Fowler. Judgment for plaintiff, and each party brings error. Affirmed on defendant's bill of exceptions, and plaintiff's cross-bill of exceptions dismissed.

Pope & Bennet and Milner & Farkas, all of Albany, and Perry & Williamson, of Sylvester, for plaintiff in error.

Claude Payton, of Albany, and J. H. Tip-ton, of Sylvester, for defendant in error.

FISH, C. J. This action was brought by E. M. Johnson against T. J. Fowler for a partition of property belonging to a partnership composed of the plaintiff and the defendant, and consisting of extensive farm lands, live stock, farm products, and implements, and for a receivership and rents. The plaintiff's contention is, in effect, that he and the defendant each own an equal undivided interest in all of the property; that defendant had wrongfully taken exclusive possession of all of it, and refuses to recognize plaintiff's rights. The defendant in his answer contends, in substance, that the parties had a settlement of the entire partnership business, under the terms of which the defendant was to pay the plaintiff the balance of defendant's indebtedness to him for defendant's part of the original purchase price of the property, defendant to assume and pay all of the indebtedness of the firm, and in addition a stated amount in payment for plaintiff's one-half interest in the property; that such agreement was carried out by the defendant except as to the payment to the plaintiff for his interest in the property; that defendant offered to pay this latter amount, and tendered it to plaintiff in accordance with the contract, but plaintiff refused to accept and to consummate the agreement. Defendant alleges a continuous tender, and prays that upon payment of the amount agreed on to plaintiff that he be decreed to convey his interest in the property to defendant. On the trial the evidence for the plaintiff was sufficient to sustain the case laid in the petition. The evidence for the defendant, consisting principally of his own testimony, failed to substantiate his answer, but tended to show that he had purchased from the plaintiff his entire interest in all of the partnership property, had paid him for the same, and that plaintiff had, in writing, conveyed his interest to the defendant, and placed him in possession. Held:

(a) In view of the pleadings and the evidence a proper decision of the case here does not depend upon the application of the statute of frauds.

[1] (b) Defendant's testimony relied on to show that the payment made by him to the plaintiff was the consideration for all interest which the plaintiff had in the property should not be allowed to contradict and overcome the averment made in the defendant's answer, which was never stricken, to the effect that such payment was made for the purpose of reimbursing the plaintiff for the money he had advanced in payment of the defendant's share in the property, and for a balance which the firm was due to the plaintiff on open account, which amounts had been ascertained by an accounting between the parties. See Florida Yellow Pine Co. v.

Flint River Naval Stores Co., 140 Ga. 321, 78 S. E. 900.

[2] (c) Attacks upon a decree furnish no ground of a motion for a new trial. Sweetman v. Owens, 147 Ga. 436, 94 S. E. 542.

[3] (d) Under the pleadings and the evidence the verdict directed as to the partition of the property was required, and so much of it as related to the recovery of rents was set aside.

Cross-bill of exceptions dismissed.

FIELD v. PROCTOR. (No. 1961.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 18, 1921.)

(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

1. New trial \Leftarrow 108(2)—Newly discovered evidence held not such as would probably produce different result.

In an action involving a dispute as to the location of a boundary, newly discovered evidence produced on motion for a new trial held not such as would probably cause a different result on a second trial.

2. New trial \Leftarrow 70—Refusal not error, when verdict supported by evidence.

When there was ample evidence to authorize the verdict, the refusal of a new trial on the general grounds was not error.

Error from Superior Court, Bulloch County; A. B. Lovett, Judge.

Action by J. T. Proctor against F. E. Field. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Brannen, Booth & Cowart, of Statesboro, for plaintiff in error.

Fred T. Lanier, of Statesboro, for defendant in error.

FISH, C. J. This is an action to recover a small strip of 4.65 acres of land lying along a disputed dividing line between the premises of the parties. The verdict was for the plaintiff, and the assignment of error is upon a judgment overruling the defendant's motion for new trial. The three special grounds of the motion are based on alleged newly discovered evidence, in substance as follows:

(1) The testimony of a witness (who testified at length, and in much detail on the trial in behalf of the defendant) to the effect that, some 12 or 14 years previously, the plaintiff pointed out to him "a corner tree, and also the location of what he then claimed to be the line between his land and movant's," which is the line contended for by movant; and the witness remembered that none of the land cleared by a designated witness for the plaintiff was on the defendant's side of the line.

(2) The testimony of another witness (who testified at length on the trial for the defendant), and two new witnesses, that there are now standing three pine trees on or near the line claimed by movant as the true line between his land and that of the defendant, on each of which trees there are three ancient side chops, the chops being nearly covered over with the growth of the bark on the trees "but unmistakable signs of the line when discovered."

(3) The testimony of a witness (who testified for the plaintiff on the trial) to the effect that he was mistaken in his testimony given on the trial as to the dates when he moved to and away from the land in question; this, in view of the respective contentions of the parties being material. Held:

[1] (a) The court did not err in overruling the motion on these special grounds. It would seem that the alleged newly discovered evidence could have been discovered by proper diligence before the trial, and, moreover, it is not probable that it would cause a different result on a second trial. See, as to the last special ground, Clark v. State, 117 Ga. 254, 43 S. E. 853; Heath v. Clark, 141 Ga. 65, 80 S. E. 288.

[2] (b) There was ample evidence to authorize the verdict, and the refusal of a new trial was not error.

1. Pleading \Leftarrow 221 — Overruling demurrer is adjudication that petition states cause of action.

A judgment overruling a general demurrer to the petition, unless excepted to and reversed, is an adjudication that the petition states a cause of action, of which the court may not by indirection deprive plaintiff.

2. Trial \Leftarrow 139(1) — Nonsuit erroneous, when evidence tends to support allegations.

SPELL v. SPELL. (No. 2100.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 19, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Trial \Leftarrow 139(1) — Verdict improperly directed when there is some evidence to support contrary verdict.

Under the evidence in this case, there being some evidence to support the contentions of the plaintiff, the court should have submitted the case to the jury, and it was error to direct a verdict for the defendant.

Error from Superior Court, Emanuel County; R. N. Hardeman, Judge.

Action by Mrs. E. P. Spell against Mrs. C. B. Spell. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

A. S. Bradley, of Swainsboro, for plaintiff in error.

F. H. Saffold, of Swainsboro, for defendant in error.

BECK, P. J. After a careful consideration of all the evidence contained in the record, we are of the opinion that there are conflicts in the evidence upon the material issues in the case that should have been submitted to the jury for their determination. On the trial of a case, however strongly the evidence may preponderate in favor of parties, the court cannot direct a verdict if this evidence is controverted by other material evidence. And we find in the brief of the evidence contained in this record some evidence upon the part of the plaintiff that entitled him to have his case submitted to a jury. It is true that much of the evidence, especially portions of it introduced by the plaintiff, is vague and unmeaning, because the witness delivering the evidence frequently referred to a map which evidently was before him at the time of his testifying, and would indicate the location of certain alleged points and lines by saying that such and such a line or point or boundary was "here" or "there," to which statement the reporter added in parenthesis "indicating." And we want to say here, what we have had more than once to say in regard to such testimony, that statements like this by a witness, though they may have been perfectly clear to the court and the jury, who could see from the map the lines or points or boundaries indicated, can have no meaning to one who reads the evidence without being able to know what point was indicated or pointed out on the map or diagram. But there is sufficient evidence in the record intelligible without the maps to show that there was a conflict on the material issue, and the court should have submitted the case to the jury and have refused to direct a verdict.

Judgment reversed.

Where defendant did not assign error on the direction of a verdict for plaintiff, but only on the overruling of the motion for a new trial, which was on the usual general grounds, the Supreme Court cannot review the direction of the verdict.

2. New trial \S 70 — Properly refused, when evidence authorized verdict.

The refusal of a new trial was not error, when there was evidence sufficient to authorize the verdict.

FISH, C. J. The bill of exceptions recites: "After hearing the evidence the court directed the following verdict: 'We, the jury find in favor of the injunction prayed in the within petition, and against the prayers of the answer and cross-bill'"—and that thereupon it was adjudged that the plaintiff recover for the use of the officers of court the costs in the case. There is a further recital that the defendant at a stated time filed a motion for new trial, that on a given date the motion was overruled, and that defendant "then and there excepted, and now excepts and assigns the same as error," because such judgment overruling the motion for new trial was error "because same was: (1) Contrary to law; (2) contrary to the evidence and without evidence to support it; (3) contrary to the law and evidence, and against the principles of justice and equity." The motion for new trial is on the usual general grounds that the verdict "is contrary to law, contrary to the evidence, and contrary to the law and evidence, and against the principles of justice and equity." Held:

[1] 1. There being no assignment of error upon the direction of the verdict, this court has no authority to decide whether the trial court erred in so directing. Stone v. Hebard Lumber Co., 145 Ga. 729, 89 S. E. 814.

One who purchases land with notice of an outstanding equity in the property held by a third person takes subject to the right of such person to enforce it. Civil Code, \S 4529; Stone v. Georgia Loan & Trust Co., 107 Ga. 524, 33 S. E. 861.

4. Mortgages \S 608½—Grantor under security deed may sue grantee's successor for accounting and recovery of land.

Where the owner of land executes a deed of the character mentioned in the first note, and remains in possession of the land, and the grantee conveys the land to another person who has no actual notice of the undisclosed agreement that the deed shall operate as a security for debt, and who has made no inquiry of the occupant, but, notwithstanding such possession of the owner at the time of his purchase, subsequently takes possession without consent of the owner and derives therefrom rents and profits sufficient to discharge the secured debt, the owner may by appropriate equitable pleadings sue for an accounting and recovery of the land, on the ground that such rents and profits were sufficient to discharge the debt. If on the trial it should appear that the debt has been partially, but not wholly, discharged, a verdict may be rendered declaring the amount of the debt remaining unpaid, and finding the property for the plaintiff on payment of such amount. *Berry v. Trial \S 236(2)—Instruction as to impeachment of witness held error.

It was error for the court, after charging the provision of Civ. Code 1910, \S 5881, that a witness may be impeached by contradictory statements as to relevant matters, to further charge that it was for the jury alone to say whether any witness had been thus impeached, and that, if they should find that any witness had been so impeached, they would discard his testimony from their consideration in its entirety unless corroborated in whole or in part by other competent testimony. Alvin G. Golucke, of Crawfordville, and Clement E. Sutton, of Washington, Ga., for defendant in error.

HILL, J. Martha Henrich filed a petition to the court of ordinary of Lincoln county for the probate of the will of Carl Henrich, deceased. Mrs. Ruby McCauley filed a caveat to the probate of the will on the ground that it was not signed by Carl Henrich or any one authorized by him. On appeal to the superior court the jury trying the issue found in favor of the caveatrix against the propounder. A motion for new trial being overruled, the propounder excepted.

1. The amended motion for new trial involves the question as to the charge of the court on the subject of impeachment of a witness by contradictory statements made by him previously as to matters relevant to his testimony and to the case, and also whether the charge was authorized by the evidence. It was error for the court, after charging the jury Civil Code 1910, \S 5881, which is as follows:

"A witness may be impeached by contradictory statements previously made by him as to matters relevant to his testimony and to the case," etc.

—to charge:

"It is for you and you alone to say whether or not any witness or witnesses have been thus impeached in the way set out in the section of the Code just read to you. If you should find that any witness in the case has been thus impeached and in the way set out, then you would discard his or their testimony from your consideration in its entirety unless corroborated in whole or in part by other competent testimony in the case." Powell v. State, 101 Ga. 9, 20, bottom of page, 29 S. E. 309, 317 (65 Am. St. Rep. 277); Waycaster v. State, 136 Ga. 95 (3), 70 S. E. 883.

2. There is sufficient evidence in the record to authorize a charge on the subject of impeachment of a witness by contradictory statements made previously as to matters relevant to his testimony and to the case.

3. As the case is to be returned for another hearing, we express no opinion on the suffidency of the evidence to support the verdict.

Judgment reversed.

All the Justices concur, except FISH, C. J., and GEORGE, J., dissenting, and BECK, P. J., concurring in the judgment.

Wills \S 294—Copy of lost will cannot be probated without calling living witnesses.

Under Civ. Code 1910, \S 3863, providing that a copy of a lost or destroyed will, clearly proved to be such by the subscribing witnesses and other evidence, may be probated, a copy of a lost will could not be probated on evidence of the existence and contents of the will and its destruction by fire without producing the living witnesses, though it was admitted that, if present, they would testify that they had no recollection of witnessing the will, but might have done so.

Where a propounder offered for probate in the court of ordinary a paper purporting to be a copy of the will of the testatrix, which he sought to establish in lieu of the original, which was alleged to have been burned subsequently to the death of the testatrix, and where on the trial of the case on appeal in the superior court it was admitted that one of the witnesses to the will was dead and the other two witnesses were in life, but the two living witnesses were not produced (it being admitted, however, that they would testify if present that they had no recollection of witnessing the will offered for probate, though they may have done so), a verdict setting up the will and admitting it to probate was unauthorized by the evidence, there being no proof of the execution of the will, though evidence was adduced to show the existence and contents of the will and its destruction by fire after the death of the testatrix. 1. Trial \S 25(16)—Too late to claim right to open and close after close of evidence.

Where the claimant in a statutory claim case permitted plaintiff to assume the burden of proof and open and conclude the introduction of evidence without admitting possession in the defendant in execution or claiming the right to assume the burden of proof and open and conclude, it was too late, after the evidence had closed, for her to assert the right to open and close the argument.

McWILLIAMS v. PAIR et al. (No. 1896.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 19, 1921.)

(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

1. Adoption \S 6—Surrender of custody of illegitimate child is consideration for agreement to adopt.

The surrender of an illegitimate child by its mother to its father was a sufficient legal consideration for the father's agreement to take the child as his own and adopt him as such with all the rights and powers of a legitimate child.

2. Specific performance \S 86—Agreement to adopt child performed by all save legal adoption is enforceable as to child's equitable property rights.

Where the mother of an illegitimate child surrendered his custody to the father on the father's agreement to support and adopt him, and there was full performance by all parties, but no steps were taken to adopt the child, he had such equitable rights in the father's property undisposed of by will as could be enforced in equity.

3. Specific performance \S 19—Agreement to adopt held enforceable by child's representative, though child predeceased parent.

Where an agreement by the father of an illegitimate child to support and adopt him as his own child with all the rights of a legitimate child was fully performed by all parties during their lives, except that there was no legal adoption, the fact that the child predeceased the father did not prevent the maintenance of an action by his personal representative to enforce the child's equitable rights in the father's property undisposed of by will.

John H. Boston, of Marietta, for defendants in error.

GEORGE, J. The petition (though set out in two counts), construed with respect to the matters material to a decision in this case, alleged in substance the following: The father of an illegitimate son received the son, while an infant, into his home, under a parol agreement with the child's mother that the father should have the sole custody, care, service, and company of the child during its minority; the father promising and agreeing to take the child as his own and to adopt him as such, with all the rights and powers of a son born to him in lawful wedlock. There was full performance of the agreement by the mother, the son, and the father during the minority of the son and during the life of all parties concerned, though no steps were taken by the father to legally adopt the son. The father survived the son, and both the father and the son died intestate. Held:

[1] 1. The surrender of the illegitimate son by its mother to its father was a sufficient legal consideration for the contract. See Pair v. Pair, 147 Ga. 754, 758, 95 S. E. 295.

[2, 3] 2. The son had such an equitable status and such equitable rights in the property of the father, undisposed of by will, as could have been enforced in a court having equitable jurisdiction. Crawford v. Wilson, 139 Ga. 654, 78 S. E. 30, 44 L. R. A. (N. S.) 773; Lansdell v. Lansdell, 144 Ga. 571, 87 S. E. 782. The action being for specific performance of contract and for the recovery of a designated interest in described property, the fact that the son predeceased the father will not prevent the maintenance of the action by the personal representative of the son. See Pair v. Pair, 147 Ga. 754, 95 S. E. 295; cf. Bell v. Elrod, 150 Ga. —, 105 S. E. 248.

JUKES v. HULL et al.

HULL et al. v. JUKES. (Nos. 2087, 2089.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 18, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Life estates \S 28—Evidence held insufficient to authorize finding that release by life tenant was on condition that remaindermen also sign.

The evidence, construed in the light most favorable to the claimant, Mrs. Hull, was insufficient to authorize the finding that the release was signed by her to be delivered to Mrs. Jukes on condition only that the remaindermen also signed. Her evidence shows merely that she believed the release would be ineffectual without the signature of the remaindermen, and that she did not believe they would sign. This requires a reversal of the judgment refusing to grant a new trial.

2. Execution \S 193—Amendment of issue in claim case held not demurrable.

The court did not err in overruling the demurrer to the plaintiff's amendment to the issue tendered.

3. Other assignments held not to require reversal.

The remaining assignments of error in the main bill and the cross-bill of exceptions are insufficient to cause a reversal.

Error from Superior Court, Clarke County: Thos. F. Green, Presiding Judge.

Proceeding on a claim interposed by Mrs. Rosa D. Hull and others to property levied on under a fl. fa. in favor of Nancy A. Jukes. Judgment for the claimants, and the plaintiff in fl. fa. brings error, and the claimants file a cross-bill of exceptions. Reversed on the main bill of exceptions, and affirmed on the cross-bill.

A fl. fa. for $500 principal, issued in favor of Nancy A. Jukes against J. T. Anderson, as executor of T. C. Deloney, was levied upon described land as the property of the estate of T. C. Deloney, deceased. A claim to the property was interposed by Mrs. Rosa D. Hull, Rosa Hull Carson, and Lella May, Henry, and Deloney Hull. It appears that T. C. Deloney was the brother of Mrs. Rosa D. Hull; that under the will of their mother Deloney had a life interest in the property levied upon; and that in the event he died without children Mrs. Hull would take a life interest, with remainder to her children, who are the other persons named as claimants in this case. By amendment to the issue tendered the plaintiff in fl. fa. pleaded that the property had been acquired by Deloney with the belief that it would belong to him absolutely; that he had contributed from his individual funds a portion of the purchase price and had expended considerable labor on the place before being informed that the claimants in this case would claim an interest in remainder; that subsequently Mrs. Hull had on divers occasions promised that she and her children would quitclaim to him their interest in the land, and upon the faith of this promise he had expended $3,600 in improving the place; that in equity and good conscience the estate of T. C. Deloney should have such interest in the land as would represent the enhancement in the value due to the improvements placed thereon by him; that this amount should be ascertained and subjected to the plaintiff's debt; that Mrs. Hull was estopped from claiming her life interest in the land, because she had executed a contract which recited that it was made between the persons [naming them] who are claimants in this case and Mrs. Jukes, for the purpose of enabling T. C. Deloney to borrow money upon the security of said land, containing the following language:

"The said parties of the first part [Mrs. Hull and the other claimants], each for himself or herself, hereby releases to the said Nancy A. Jukes all his or her interest in the tract of land hereinafter described to the extent of the $1,500 to be loaned by the said Nancy A. Jukes, and consent for the said T. C. Deloney to make title to the said Nancy A. Jukes to secure a note for $1,500.00 principal, due 12 months after date, with interest at 8 per cent., to the following land "

—describing it. This instrument was signed by Mrs. Rosa D. Hull alone. Deloney made to Mrs. Jukes a security deed conveying the land. Claimants allege that it was contemplated by plaintiff in fl. fa., at the time of the execution of the paper relied upon, that all of the children of Mrs. Hull should sign the same; that she signed the same "only with the agreement with the representative of the plaintiff in fl. fa. that, if her children did not also sign, said instrument was to be void and of no effect"; that the amount of money loaned is different from that stated in the instrument relied on, and the loan was not made upon the faith of the signing of that paper; and that the signing of the paper by Mrs. Hull was an act of suretyship on her part, and the loaning without her knowledge or consent of an amount different from that stipulated in the writing constituted such a novation as would relieve her from liability. The evidence relating to the question whether Mrs. Hull executed the release upon the condition that it should be signed also by the remainderman was as follows:

Mrs. Hull testified in substance, that J. T. Anderson presented the paper and urged her to sign it; that she stated to him, "I will sign the paper, but it won't do any good; I am afraid my children will not sign the paper;" that he requested her to sign it, and stated that he would then see if he could procure the signature of the only one of her children present; that this child refused to sign; that he led her [Mrs. Hull] to believe it wouldn't do any good without the children signing it; that he told her "it was no good." In answer to the question, "Was anything said by Mrs. Hull at the time of signing that paper, if others didn't sign, for you not to deliver that—it would not be binding on her?" Anderson replied:

"Why, of course, that applied to her. Mr. Strickland wanted Mrs. Hull's signature, and he wanted the children's signatures; and when I acquainted her with the fact that we wanted to get Tom this money, she said she would write to the children, and I think probably she did, or any way told me she had written to the children, and there was one she stated to me that was unwilling to sign it."

He also testified that Mrs. Hull did not tell him that he should not deliver the paper until it had been signed by all her children; that he stated to her that, while they desired the signatures of her children, the attorney representing Mrs. Jukes had informed him "that it would be all right just for her to sign it," and that the amount to be loaned would be reduced from $1,500 to $500 in consequence of the failure of the children to sign.

The jury found the issue in favor of the claimant, Mrs. Hull. A motion for new trial, filed by the plaintiff in fi. fa., was overruled, and she excepted to that ruling in the main bill of exceptions. In the cross-bill of exceptions error is assigned upon the overruling of a demurrer to the amended issue tendered by plaintiff in fi. fa., upon the admission of certain evidence, and upon a portion of the charge of the court.

W. M. Smith and John J. Strickland, both of Athens, for plaintiff in error.

WILKES et al. v. FOLSOM. (No. 2130.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 18, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Ejectment \S 84(1)—Evidence that defendant's deed was from minor and for specified purpose inadmissible under pleadings.

It was error for the court to admit and to refuse to rule out on timely motion of the defendant, based upon the ground that there was no appropriate pleading upon which to base the same, evidence by C. S. Wilkes, a witness for the plaintiff, that "at the time I made the deed to my mother I was a minor; there was no consideration for same; it was made because I wanted to borrow some money, and I made the deed to my mother for her to borrow the money, and she never did use the deed to borrow the money, and I never got the money." It necessarily follows that the court erred in giving to the jury instructions based upon the evidence thus admitted.

2. Evidence \S 317(4)—Testimony of witness concerning conversation with defendant held hearsay; testimony that grantor said sale was agreeable to former grantee held hearsay.

It was error for the court to admit evidence by a witness for the plaintiff, to the effect that he saw Margaret Wilkes, one of the defendants, and that she agreed to and acquiesced in the sale of the land by C. S. Wilkes to the plaintiff, and that he had reported such agreement to the purchaser; the defendant having interposed timely objection based on the ground that such evidence was hearsay. For the same reason it was error to allow the plaintiff to testify in substance that C. S. Wilkes said that the sale was agreeable to Margaret Wilkes.

3. Other assignments.

The above rulings are controlling, and require a reversal of the judgment refusing a new trial. Other assignments of error not specifically mentioned are mere repetitions of the foregoing assignments, or are not of such character as are likely to occur again on another trial, and do not require special mention.

4. Sufficiency of evidence.

Since the case is remanded for another hearing, we express no opinion upon the sufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict.

Error from Superior Court, Brooks County; W. E. Thomas, Judge.

Suit by I. L. Folsom against G. W. Wilkes and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Reversed.

See, also, 149 Ga. 512, 101 S. E. 185.

Folsom filed a petition against G. W. Wilkes and Mrs. Margaret Wilkes alleging, in substance, as follows: Petitioner is the owner of described land. The defendants are in possession thereof under a contract to work the place for one-half of the crop raised thereon. The contract has expired, and the defendants are holding over and retaining possession of the premises and the houses thereon, and refuse to deliver possession to the plaintiff without authority of law. Mrs. Margaret Wilkes is claiming title and right of possession of said land, and G. W. Wilkes, her husband, is holding the same under the alleged title of Mrs. Wilkes. Mrs. Wilkes claims title under an alleged deed dated February 14, 1914, but not filed for record until July 9, 1914, and recorded July 11, 1914, made to her by her son, C. S. Wilkes. The plaintiff claims title under a deed executed to him by C. S. Wilkes on June 23, 1917, and filed for record on the same day. At the time of the purchase of said land by the plaintiff he had no knowledge or notice, actual or constructive, of the existence of the deed from C. S. Wilkes to Mrs. Margaret Wilkes, if it was in existence at that time, but bought said land in good faith, paying therefor the sum of $750. G. W. and Mrs. Margaret Wilkes are insolvent, and during the year 1918 plaintiff received nothing from Wilkes on his contract for one-half of the crop. G. W. Wilkes and Mrs. Margaret Wilkes are trespassers upon the property, and are remaining in possession thereof without lawful authority or title, and have failed and refused to deliver possession to the plaintiff upon demand, and their remaining in possession, cultivating the land, and using the premises and houses thereon is a continuing and willful trespass in violation of the rights of the plaintiff. The defendants are incompetent farmers and are not preserving the fertility of the land, but are allowing it to run down and lose value because of their failure to properly cultivate and fertilize the soil; and the damage to plaintiff is irreparable. The prayers are: (a) For process; (b) that the defendants be enjoined from further trespassing upon plaintiff's property, and from withholding the possession of it from the plaintiff, and from keeping thereon or in the houses thereof their property and effects, "and from using the same in any way, or from doing anything else in defiance of or in violation of the rights of the plaintiff as the owner and possessor of said property, or from interfering in any way with the possession, use, and enjoyment by the plaintiff of said property;" (c) "that the plaintiff may have and recover said property from the defendants, and that the defendants may be ejected therefrom and the same may be decreed to be the property of the plaintiff." Rule nisi was issued, and the court granted an ad interim injunction restraining the defendants from "further trespassing upon said property, or withholding possession of said property from the plaintiff, and from keeping their property and effects thereon." The defendants sued out writ of error to the Supreme Court, Wilkes v. Folsom, 149 Ga. 512, 101 S. E. 185. Thereafter the defendants filed an answer denying that they were in possession as croppers or otherwise holding under the plaintiff, and alleging that the plaintiff obtained his deed from C. S. Wilkes with notice of the title and interest of Mrs. Margaret Wilkes. The case came on for trial, and a verdict was returned for the plaintiff; whereupon the defendants filed a motion for a new trial, to the overruling of which they excepted.

J. J. Murray, of Valdosta, for plaintiffs in error.

Branch & Snow, of Quitman, for defendant in error.

GILBERT, J. [1-4] The first headnote, relating to the second special ground of the motion for new trial, alone requires elaboration. During the trial, and before any evidence was admitted, the plaintiff offered an amendment, which was duly allowed and ordered filed, as follows:

"That the deed made by C. S. Wilkes to the said Margaret Wilkes, which bears date of February 19, 1914, referred to in the seventh paragraph of the petition, was not made by C. S. Wilkes for a valuable consideration, but was made by C. S. Wilkes for the purpose of conveying the said land to Mrs. Margaret Wilkes, for the sole purpose of allowing her to borrow a sum of money at the time on said deed, and the said Mrs. Margaret Wilkes did not use said deed for said purpose at said time; and said deed was made by the said C. S. Wilkes when the said Wilkes was only 18 years of age, and was a minor, and was therefore not a valid deed."

Counsel for defendants objected to the amendment upon the ground that it set up a new cause of action. Upon the allowance of the amendment the defendants pleaded surprise, announcing in open court that they were not in position to meet the amendment so offered and allowed. The court thereupon announced from the bench, "That seems to come up to the rule," and, addressing plaintiff's counsel, "They are entitled to a continuance." Thereupon plaintiff's counsel said:

"We will take an order striking the amendment in the case just offered, for the purpose of going into the trial of the case."

The case proceeded to trial, and C. S. Wilkes, a witness for the plaintiff, testified as follows:

"At the time I made the deed to my mother I was a minor; there was no consideration for same; it was made because I wanted to borrow some money, and I made the deed to my mother for her to borrow the money, and she never did use the deed to borrow the money, and I never got the money."

Counsel for defendants thereupon moved the court to rule out said evidence, upon the ground that it was irrelevant, immaterial, and prejudicial to the rights of defendants, and upon the further ground that there were no pleadings to authorize the same, the plaintiff having withdrawn the amendment which sought to attack the deed on the grounds that it was without consideration and that the grantor was a minor at the time of making the deed. The court held the ruling in reserve at the time; but at the conclusion of the plaintiff's evidence the defendants' counsel renewed their objection as made to the evidence; whereupon the court ruled as follows:

"I don't understand that that operates to estop them upon this particular issue. I will have to overrule the motion."

This ruling is assigned as error. We think the objection was well taken, and that the court erred in refusing to rule out the evidence. The court had already expressed his opinion that this was a material feature of the case, by his ruling that the amendment set up a new cause of action entitling the defendants to a continuance. The amendment was withdrawn expressly upon the ground that the plaintiff desired to avoid a continuance. Manifestly, if the amendment was of such materiality and importance as to require a continuance of the case on motion of the defendants, it was prejudicial to the latter to permit proof of the facts stated in the amendment without pleading. The plaintiff cannot attain the end sought by the amendment by dispensing with the pleading and proceeding with the evidence, for the sufficient reason that there must be appropriate pleading to permit the proof. This ruling was prejudicial to the defendants, and the court should have granted a new trial.

Judgment reversed.

All the Justices concur.

YAUGHN et al. v. HARPER. (No. 2126.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 19, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Partition —5—Parol partition followed by possession gives equity which will support recovery against one entering without better title.

Where tenants in common agree by parol upon a partition, defining in the agreement the boundaries of the part assigned to each in severalty, and each enters into possession, thus executing the agreement, the partition clothes each with a perfect equity, and is thus the equivalent of legal title; and on such title recovery may be had in ejectment, or in a statutory action for land, against one who subsequently enters without a better title.

2. Estoppel —29(1)—Owner who accepts deed from another conveying a life estate only is not divested of title.

Though one who is the owner of land, having perfect title, accept a deed from another purporting to convey to such owner and a third person a life estate, with remainder to the children of the grantor, the interest of the owner of the land is not thereby reduced to a life estate; nor does the conveyance to the owner and the third person of a joint life estate in the land, with remainder over, constitute a covenant binding upon the owner, though he accepted the deed.

Error from Superior Court, Crawford County; H. A. Mathews, Judge.

Suit by Mrs. G. R. Harper against Mrs. Lula Yaughn and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Affirmed.

Mrs. G. R. Harper brought suit, alleging that she was sole heir at law of G. R. Harper, deceased; that her husband died seized and possessed of the land in controversy, the west half of a designated lot of land; that the defendants, Lula Yaughn and the children of A. Y. Yaughn, were asserting that they had an interest in the property, and that they were doing acts inconsistent with and destructive of petitioner's rights. The prayer was for injunction and other equitable relief. Demurrers to the petition were filed by the defendants, and were overruled. Upon the trial the jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, and a decree was entered accordingly. A motion for a new trial was overruled, and the defendants excepted.

L. D. Moore, of Macon, for plaintiffs in error.

R. Douglas Feagin, of Macon, for defendant in error.

BECK, P. J. A deed executed on the 9th day of January, 1911, by W. J. Marshall, conveyed to George R. Harper and A. Y. Yaughn lot No. 27 in the Sixth district of Crawford county, Ga. Subsequently to the execution of this deed, Yaughn and Harper, the tenants in common, made a parol agreement for a partition of the land, defining in the agreement the part each was to have. According to the contention of the plaintiff, her husband, George R. Harper, was to have the west portion, and Yaughn the east. Harper was in possession of the west portion, as the plaintiff contends, under the parol agreement for partition; and defendants introduced evidence to show that Harper took the east portion and Yaughn the west portion, and that after the line was run Harper continued to occupy the east half and Yaughn the west half of the lot. The testimony was conflicting, and the court submitted the issues to the jury. In the course of his instructions the court charged the jury:

"If G. R. Harper and A. Y. Yaughn, after having bought this land, agreed upon a division of it, and if Harper upon that agreement went into possession of the west part of it, or if Harper and Yaughn agreed upon a division by which Harper was to take the west part, and after that a line was run and agreed on, dividing the west from the east side, at a time when Harper was holding and occupying the west part and Yaughn the east part, then the absolute fee-simple title vested in Harper to the west part to the dividing line agreed upon, if such a line was agreed upon, and the same kind of title vested in Yaughn to the east part. That is to say, if these two parties, Harper and Yaughn, owning the entire tract, agreed between them that one would take the west part and the other the east part, and a line was run and each took possession of what he had agreed to take, why that became a conveyance of the land in law as between the parties; and if Yaughn had the east part under the agreement when the line was run, then Yaughn took title to the east part; and if Harper took the west part under that agreement, and that was the understanding at the time the division was made, and Harper took possession of the west part with the knowledge and consent of Yaughn, and Yaughn took the east part, then Harper took an absolute title to the west part and it became his without any deed. * * * If such a division was made between the parties, and no agreement was made at the time about any deed, but they merely divided it between them in that way, and no deed was made, as I said, the very fact in the case would determine the title of the parties; and if Harper took the west part under that agreement, and a dividing line was run, then the land became his in fee simple, that is, he owned the entire title in the west half. * * * Now I charge you that if Harper took a title of that sort to the west half, and you believe the evidence so shows, and that the division was made without reference to any deed or any agreement about any deed, but merely a division, if you believe that he took that sort of title, then Mr. Yaughn had no right or title in the west at all; he had nothing to convey to Harper or any one else; provided there had been an independent division of the land between the two men who owned it in common, by a dividing line, and an agreement by which Harper took the possession of the west part."

[1] These instructions were excepted to on several grounds, but especially upon the ground that the court in giving them ignored a deed, which, many years after the division, was executed by Yaughn conveying a life interest in the west half of lot No. 27 to George R. Harper and Lula Yaughn, jointly, and after their death to the children of A. Y. Yaughn. The instructions given contain substantially the law relating to oral partition of lands between joint tenants and occupation of the lands in accordance with the terms of the agreement. The principle is stated in several cases decided by this court that—

"Where tenants in common agree by parol upon a partition, defining in the agreement the boundaries of the part assigned to each in severalty, and each enters into possession, thus executing the agreement, the partition clothes each with a perfect equity and is thus the equivalent of legal title; and on such title recovery may be had in ejectment, or in a statutory action for land, against one who subsequently enters without a better title." Adams v. Spivey, 94 Ga. 676, 20 S. E. 422.

See, also, Powell's Actions for Land, § 145, and cases cited.

The charge complained of substantially applied this principle to the facts in the record.

[2] But the plaintiffs in error insist that, several years subsequently to the parol partition between them, there was a mutual interchange of deeds, that Harper executed and delivered to A. Y. Yaughn a deed conveying the east half of lot No. 27, and Yaughn made the deed to Harper and Lula Yaughn recited above, conveying the west half of the lot; and it is insisted that these deeds were part of one transaction, and that the acceptance of the deed by Harper vested the latter and Lula Yaughn with a life estate in the property and the remainder to the children of A. Y. Yaughn. If there was a parol partition, as petitioner insisted and adduced evidence to show, and possession was taken in accordance with that agreement by the parties, then Harper acquired a perfect equity to the west portion, which was the equivalent of legal title; and the mere fact that Yaughn afterwards executed a deed conveying to Harper and another person a life estate in the land did not divest his title nor reduce it to a life estate. The mere fact that he executed a deed which conveyed a life estate to Harper and to the other person could not divest Harper of his title to the entire estate. The plaintiffs in error insist that the recitals in the deed were in the nature of covenants, but do not undertake to discuss or state the purpose of the covenants. Counsel argues that it was a case for the application of the principle of law contained in section 4180 of the Civil Code that—"When a grantee accepts a deed and enters thereunder, he will be bound by the covenants contained therein, although the deed has not been signed by him."

We cannot construe the grant in this deed of a life estate to G. R. Harper and Lula Yaughn, with remainder to the children of the grantor, as containing either a covenant or condition binding upon the grantees. There is nothing in the language that placed upon Harper the implied obligation to convey or deliver the land to Lula Yaughn or the children of the grantor, and we do not see how any act upon the part of Yaughn would divest Harper of title and convey it to some one else.

The charge of the court submitted the real issues in the case; and the court did not err in giving those portions of the charge excepted to, nor in refusing the requests to charge. Judgment affirmed.

LEWIS v. TRIMBLE. (No. 2063.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 16, 1921.)

(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

1. Specific performance ¶64—Granted as of course respecting contract for sale of land.

Where a written contract for the sale of land signed by both parties is certain and fair, for an adequate consideration, and capable of being performed, it is a matter of course for a court of equity to decree specific performance.

2. Specific performance ¶66—Compellable at instance of vendor of land.

Specific performance of a written contract for the sale of land which is certain and fair, for an adequate consideration, and capable of being performed, may be compelled at the instance of the vendor as well as the vendee.

3. Vendor and purchaser ¶22—Description capable of application to land intended by extrinsic evidence is sufficient.

The description of land in a contract of sale is sufficiently definite where the premises are so described as to indicate the grantor's intention to sell a particular lot of land and is capable of practical application to the land intended by extrinsic evidence.

4. Specific performance ¶117—Plaintiff must allege and prove extrinsic matter applying description to particular property.

In a suit for specific performance of a contract to exchange lands where the description of defendant's land is sufficient but that of plaintiff's requires extrinsic evidence to apply it, plaintiff must allege and prove such extrinsic matter as will definitely apply the description to the land intended to be conveyed by him.

5. Exchange of property ¶3(1)—Specific performance ¶29(2)—Description held sufficient to support contract, but not to authorize specific performance without allegation and proof of extrinsic matter.

A description of property in a contract of exchange as two brick store buildings, being four storerooms, one hotel building, two dwellings, one negro house, and ten vacant lots, being all the property owned by the party in E., can be applied by extrinsic evidence to the contemplated subject-matter, and is sufficient to support a valid contract, but will not authorize specific performance in the absence of allegation or extrinsic evidence applying it to the land intended to be conveyed.

Error from Superior Court, Colquitt County; W. E. Thomas, Judge.

Suit by H. H. Trimble against B. M. Lewis. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

R. J. Lewis, W. A. Covington, and Dowling & Askew, all of Moultrie, for plaintiff in error.

Shipp & Kline, of Moultrie, for defendant in error.

ATKINSON, J. [1, 2] 1. "Where a contract for the sale of land is in writing signed by both parties, is certain and fair, is for an adequate consideration, and capable of being performed, it is as much a matter of course for a court of equity to decree the specific performance of it as it is for a court of law to give damages for a breach of contract. Specific performance of such a contract may be compelled at the instance of the vendor as well as at that of the vendee." Clark v. Cagle, 141 Ga. 703, 82 S. E. 21, L. R. A. 1915A, 817.

[3] 2. The description of land in a contract of sale is sufficiently definite where the premises are so described as to indicate the grantor's intention to sell a particular lot of land, and is capable of practical application to the land intended to be conveyed, by introduction of extrinsic evidence. King v. Brice, 145 Ga. 65, 88 S. E. 960; Dean v. Turner, 105 S. E. 603 (2).

[4] 3. The principle stated in the preceding note is applicable in a suit for specific performance of a contract for exchange of lands; and where the description of the plaintiff's land is such as to require extrinsic evidence to apply it to the land intended to be conveyed by him, and the description of the land of the defendant is sufficient without the aid of such extrinsic evidence, it is necessary for the plaintiff to allege and prove such extrinsic matter as will definitely apply the description of his property, as stated in the contract, to the land intended to be conveyed by him. McIntosh v. Roane, 148 Ga. 273, 96 S. E. 387.

Without such allegations and proof the plaintiff would not carry the burden of showing the whole contract to be certain and fair.

[5] 4. In a suit instituted by H. H. Trimble against B. M. Lewis for specific performance, the contract (omitting the caption and signature of the parties and witnesses) was:

"This agreement entered into between B. M. Lewis, of the first part, and H. H. Trimble, of the second part: First party agrees to trade a tract of land, being south half of lot No. 156 in the Eighth land district Colquitt county, Ga., with all improvements on this place, for two (2) brick store buildings, being four storerooms, one hotel building, (2) two dwellings, one negro house, ten vacant lots, this being all the property now owned by party of the second part in Ellenton, Ga., and fifty-five hundred dollars ($5,500.00). Party of the first agrees to give possession the 1st of January, 1919. Party of the second part agrees to give possession of one dwelling and sheet iron shop on vacant lot by December 1, 1918, and to give possession of all the other property by the 1st day of January, 1919. The fifty-five hundred dollars is to be paid as soon as loan can be obtained on property (farm) of the second part."

The land which H. H. Trimble was to convey was described in the petition only as set forth in the contract. On the trial there was no extrinsic evidence tending to apply the description of the plaintiff's land, as expressed in the contract, to the land intended to be conveyed by him. Held:

(a) The description of the land of H. H. Trimble set forth in the contract was of such character as that it could be applied by extrinsic evidence to the subject-matter contemplated by the parties, and consequently was sufficient to support a valid contract.

(b) However, as there was no allegation or extrinsic evidence in support thereof tending to apply the description expressed in the contract to the land intended to be conveyed by H. H. Trimble, the verdict for the plaintiff was unauthorized, and it was error to refuse a new trial.

Judgment reversed.

LANCASTER v. WILSON et al. (No. 1988.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 18, 1921.)

(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

1. Specific performance \S 32(3)—Contract of exchange describing defendant's land sufficiently, but not plaintiffs', lacks mutuality.

Where an agreement to exchange lands contains a sufficient description of the land of one of the parties, but not of the other, a suit to specifically perform the contract cannot be maintained by the party owning the land insufficiently described, for want of mutuality in the contract.

2. Specific performance \S 29(2)—Contract of exchange held not to describe lands sufficiently to support suit.

An agreement to exchange "certain property owned by the said W., W., and O. in Monticello, Fla., for a certain hotel owned by the said L. in Forsyth, Ga." does not sufficiently describe the land to support a suit for specific performance.

3. Exchange of property \S 3(1)—Defective description not cured by execution of deeds left with parties' attorneys.

Where an agreement to exchange property did not sufficiently describe the property, the defect was not cured or the agreement ratified by deeds executed by both parties accurately describing certain lands and left by them with their respective attorneys.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; J. T. Pendleton, Judge.

Action by Mrs. C. W. Wilson and others against Mrs. H. T. Lancaster. A temporary injunction was granted, and a receiver appointed, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Reagan & Reagan, of McDonough, for plaintiff in error.

Moore & Pomeroy, of Atlanta, for defendants in error.

HILL, J. [1-3] 1. Where two parties sign an agreement to exchange lands belonging to them respectively, although the description of the land belonging to one of the parties is sufficient, if there is an insufficient description of the property belonging to the other party to such contract, a suit to specifically perform the contract could not be maintained at the instance of the party owning the land insufficiently described, for want of mutuality in the contract. Lewis v. Trimble, 106 S. E. 101; Buick Motor Co. v. Thompson, 138 Ga. 282, 75 S. E. 354. Accordingly an agreement to "exchange certain property owned by the said Wilson, Walker, and Cox in Monticello, Fla., for a certain hotel owned by the said Mrs. Lancaster in Forsyth, Ga." is not a sufficient description of the land so as to form the basis of a suit for specific performance. Clayton v. Newberry, 138 Ga. 735, 76 S. E. 63. The fact that both parties executed deeds accurately describing certain lands, which deeds were left with their respective attorneys, would not have the effect of curing the defect or of ratifying the agreement.

2. Applying the above ruling to the facts of this case, the trial court erred in granting a temporary injunction and appointing a receiver.

Judgment reversed.

SOUTHERN TIMBER CO. v. NEWPORT LAND CO. (No. 1983.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 18, 1921.)

(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

1. Evidence \S 353(14)—Description of land in entry of levy held not insufficient to admit deed as evidence of title.

An entry of levy on a fi. fa. describing the property levied on as "95 acres, more or less, in the 1359th district G. M. of said county [Liberty county], said land described as being lot No. 14 of subdivision of tract of land containing 763 acres, more or less, recorded in Book of Deeds AC, p. 568," was not insufficient, and the sheriff's deed was admissible in evidence as a muniment of title.

2. Pleading \S 129(1)—Statement that defendant could not admit or deny allegation held evasive, and allegation to be taken as true.

In a suit to enjoin the cutting of timber, in which the petition alleged that both parties claimed title under S., and that defendant claimed title under a year's support assigned to the wife of S., but that before the death of S. the land was sold by the sheriff at a sale under execution, a statement in the answer that defendant could neither admit nor deny the allegation that the parties claimed title from a common grantor and that plaintiff's title was superior to defendant's held evasive, and the allegations to be taken as true under Civ. Code 1910, § 5637.

Error from Superior Court, Liberty County; W. W. Sheppard, Judge.

Suit by the Newport Land Company against the Southern Timber Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Newport Land Company filed a petition against Southern Timber Company, Dunlevie Lumber Company, and E. V. Dunlevie to "enjoin them from cutting or removing, or in any manner entering upon, injuring, or interfering with the trees and timber upon said tract of land, and from trespassing upon said land in any way or manner, and from entering upon or passing over the same."

There was a prayer also that the title to the timber and trees and to the land be decreed in the plaintiff. The petition alleged that the plaintiff was the owner in fee simple of "all that tract or parcel of land containing 95 acres, more or less, lying and being in the 1359th district of Liberty county, Ga., known as lot No. 14 in the subdivision into lots of that tract of land containing 763 acres, more or less, conveyed to Greig and Jones by Henry G. Walte by deed dated October 14, 1892, and recorded in the office of the clerk of the superior court of Liberty county, Ga., in Book AA, pp. 95, 96, said lot bounded north by lot No. 7 of said subdivision, east by the Sunberry tract, south by the road from Hinesville to Sunberry, west by lot No. 13 of said subdivision." The third paragraph of the petition alleged that the tract of land was conveyed by Benjamin Greig and Francis F. Jones to Edward Solomon by deed dated June 10, 1897, and recorded August 4, 1898, in Book AC, p. 568, of the Record of Deeds for Liberty county, Ga., and "both your petitioner and said defendants claim title under and through the said Edward Solomon, as common grantor." Paragraph 4 of the petition alleged that the defendants claimed title to the land or the timber thereon under a year's support assigned to Nancy Solomon and her children from the estate of Edward Solomon, Nancy Solomon, under the name of Nancy Burk, being alleged to have conveyed the land to one Alfred Le Conte, under whom defendants claim title to the timber on the tract of land in controversy. The fifth paragraph of the petition alleges that before the year's support was assigned to Nancy Solomon and her children, and before the death of Edward Solomon, the land was sold by A. B. Brewer, sheriff of Liberty county, to E. P. Miller, and was conveyed by the sheriff to Miller as the property of Edward Solomon by deed dated April 4, 1905, under an execution issued by the superior court of Liberty county in the case of A. L. Jones v. Edward Solomon. It was alleged in paragraph 6 that by reason of the sheriff's sale Edward Solomon had no title to the property in controversy at the time of the assignment of the year's support, and that the title claimed by the defendants, or any of them, under the year's support is void. The defendants filed an answer, in which the Dunlevie Lumber Company and E. V. Dunlevie disclaimed any title or interest in the land or timber. Answering the third paragraph of the petition, the substance of which is set out above, defendants neither admit nor deny the allegations contained therein. In answer to paragraph 4 it was averred that the defendant Southern Timber Company "admits that it claims title to said timber, but denies that Dunlevie Lumber Company, or E. V. Dunlevie, or either of them, claim any rights, title, or interest in the said timber." To paragraph 5 defendants answer that for want of sufficient information they can neither admit nor deny the allegations contained therein. Defendants amended their answer by further answering the fourth paragraph of the petition, as follows:

"Defendant Southern Timber Company claims title to said timber under a lease from Alfred Le Conte, Manerver Le Conte, Frank Mallard, and Mabel Mallard, and under a previous from Nancy Solivan to said parties, and a prescriptive title under said deed. For want of sufficient information defendants can neither admit or deny the other allegations in said paragraph."

At the conclusion of the plaintiff's evidence the defendant moved for a nonsuit, which motion was overruled, and the defendant excepted. The defendant offered no evidence; whereupon the court directed a verdict for the plaintiff, and entered a decree enjoining the defendant as prayed.

N. J. Norman, of Savannah, and A. S. Way, of Reidsville, for plaintiff in error.

Travis & Travis, of Savannah, for defendant in error.

HILL, J. [1] 1. On the trial of the case the plaintiff offered in evidence, as part of his muniment of title, a sheriff's deed to the land in controversy, together with the execution and entry of levy thereon. The entry of levy on the fl. fa. was as follows:

"Georgia, Liberty County. I have this day levied the within execution on 95 acres, more or less, in the 1359th district G. M. of said county, said land described as being lot No. 14 of subdivision of tract of land containing 763 acres, more or less, recorded in Book of Deeds AC, p. 568. This Feb. 21, 1905. A. B. Brewer, Sheriff."

The deed and execution with the entry thereon were objected to on the ground that the description of the land was too indefinite, and that the sheriff had no legal right to sell the land under such description, and that accordingly no legal title to the land under such description passed by the sheriff's deed to Miller, the purchaser at sheriff's sale, and under whom, and Solomon, the plaintiff claims title. Held, that the court did not err in admitting the sheriff's deed in evidence. Tolbert v. Short, 150 Ga. 413, 104 S. E. 245; Lewis v. Trimble, 106 S. E. 101, this day decided.

[2] 2. Under the facts alleged in the petition, the answer of the defendant that he could neither admit nor deny the allegation that plaintiff and defendant both claimed title to the land in controversy from a common grantor (Solomon), and that plaintiff's title was superior to the defendant's, is evasive; and the allegations are to be taken as true. Civil Code 1910, § 5637; Horne v. Peacock, 122 Ga. 45 (1), 49 S. E. 722; Raleigh, etc., R. Co. v. Pullman Co., 122 Ga. 700 (5), 50 S. E. 1008. See, also, 39 Cyc. 1713, 1714, and authorities cited.

3. Under the pleadings and evidence in the case the court did not err in overruling the motion for nonsuit, or in directing a verdict for the plaintiff.

Judgment affirmed.

COOPER v. HARPER et al. (No. 1921.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 16, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Executors and administrators \S 407—One purchasing at executor's sale regularly conducted, without knowledge of intent to misapply proceeds, held to have good title.

The motion for new trial in this case contains only the usual general grounds that the verdict is contrary to the evidence and without evidence to support it. Under the evidence in the record the jury were authorized to find that the defendants in this action, brought to recover certain lands, were the successors in title to those who had bought at executors' sale regularly conducted, after the procurement of proper orders, without notice of any facts or circumstances as to an intent upon the part of the executors to unlawfully divert the proceeds of the sale, which would make void the executors' deed, and the verdict in favor of the defendants should not be disturbed.

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

2. Executors and administrators \S 138(1)—Executors held authorized under will to sell land without order of court.

Under a will devising land to the testator's wife for life, with remainder to the children for life, and with remainder over to their children, naming the wife and two of the children as executors, and authorizing the wife to trade property, provided the value was returned to the estate or divided among the children, and providing that any sale should be made jointly by the wife and executors, the executors, acting jointly, were authorized to sell and convey land without an order from the court of ordinary.

3. Executors and administrators \S 349(2)—Order for sale by executors supports sale, so long as unchallenged by direct attack.

An order of the court of ordinary, regularly granted after the death of one of the executors, who was also a life tenant, for a sale of land, so long as it was unchallenged by direct attack, validated the sale, and gave the purchaser a good title.

4. Appeal and error \S 927(1)—Question of fact presumed properly submitted, in absence of exceptions.

It will be assumed that a question of fact was properly presented to the jury, where there is no exception to any part of the charge in the record.

Error from Superior Court, Clarke County; H. S. West, Judge pro hac vice.

Action by M. L. Cooper against W. A. Harper and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Holden, Jennings & Holden and Lamar C. Rucker, all of Athens, for plaintiff in error.

Thomas & Thomas, H. A. Nix, Wolver M. Smith, and John B. Gamble, all of Athens, for defendants in error.

BECK, P. J. Henry Jennings died testate, and his will was probated in December, 1862. By its terms his widow was given a life estate in all his property, remainder to his children for life, and remainder over to their children. Susan Jennings was one of his children, and Mary Cooper, the plaintiff in this case, was the daughter of the last named. The will contains, among other provisions, the following:

"I give and bequeath to my children the remainder of all my estate, both real and personal, after the decease of my said wife, to be divided among them all equally. My daughters' portions I give to them severally for their use during their natural lives, and to their children after their death, not subject to their contracts nor their husbands' contracts. * * * I give my said wife leave to trade any property for the interest of the estate, provided the value thereof is returned in the estate or divided among our said children; but whatever sale of property shall be made must be made jointly by my wife and executors. I hereby appoint my beloved wife, Nancy Jennings, my executrix, and my two older sons, James Jennings and Jefferson Jennings, my executors to this my last will and testament. I hereby authorize my said executrix and executors to carry out this my last will and testament, after being duly qualified by the court, without giving security."

The persons named as executors qualified as such. This action of ejectment was brought to recover certain lands, consisting of two tracts, a 14-acre tract and a 26-acre tract (referred to hereinafter as tract No. 1 and tract No. 2). Upon the trial of the case the issues involved were submitted to the jury, and a verdict was returned in favor of the defendants. A motion for a new trial was made by the plaintiff, and was overruled.

[1, 2] 1. The defendants in the case are successors in title to purchasers of the tracts of land involved in this suit, which were sold at executor's sale. Tract No. 2 was sold after the death of the widow of Henry Jennings; tract No. 1 was sold during her life, and she joined with the other executors in the execution of a deed. The will itself authorized these executors, under the power of sale contained in the will, heretofore set forth, to sell the lands belonging to the estate; and they could have sold it and conveyed the title thereto without an order from the court of ordinary, provided they acted jointly. This was done, and a deed was made by them conveying tract No. 1 to a predecessor in title of the defendants. The executors, in selling tract No. 1, procured an order from the court of ordinary. The application for the order was made by all the executors, including the widow of Henry Jennings, and showed that they were desirous of selling a tract of land, describing it, which included tract No. 1, sued for in the present case; and the application contains, in addition to the usual recitals, the statement that the applicant, "Nancy Jennings, widow of said deceased, having relinquished her life or widowhood interest in the land to be sold, and reserving a portion of the money to arise from the sale thereof in lieu of the said life or widowhood interest," and, further showing that notice of their intention to apply for leave to sell has been duly published, prays "for leave to sell the same in terms of the law and in pursuance of the will of said deceased." The order granted upon this application recites that—

"It appearing that notice has been duly published in terms of the law, and no cause being shown or appearing to the contrary, and it appearing that it is necessary for a division among the legatees, it is ordered that said petitioners have leave to sell said tract of land [including the land in controversy] in terms of the law and in pursuance of the will of said deceased."

The sale of tract No. 1 took place in pursuance of this order, and the deed was executed by all the executors, as stated above. The purchaser at this sale acquired title to the property, though there may have been an intention on the part of the executors to misapply a part of the proceeds, if he was without knowledge of the wrongful intent, or if he did not have knowledge of some circumstance that should have put him upon inquiry as to an intent upon the part of the executors to misappropriate the proceeds of the sale. And the jury were authorized to find that he was without knowledge or notice of any wrongful intent to misapply the proceeds of the sale.

[3, 4] The sale of tract No. 2 was under an order of the court of ordinary, regularly granted after the death of Mrs. Jennings, the widow of the testator. That order, so long as it existed unchallenged by direct attack upon it in a court of competent jurisdiction, made the sale under it valid, and a deed of the executors in pursuance of the order and the sale conveyed title to the purchaser. Whether or not the executors had assented to the legacy of the remaindermen in this case, before the order to sell tract No. 2 was procured, was a question of fact, which we assume was properly presented to the jury, as there is no exception to any part of the charge contained in the record.

Judgment affirmed.

SMITH et al. v. SLADE et al. (No. 2060.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 19, 1921.)

1. Wills \S 597(1)—Construed as devising fee simple.

A testator bequeathed and devised as follows: "Second. I give and bequeath all the rest, residue, and remainder of my entire estate, both real and personal, to my beloved wife, Emily Harty Slade, to have and to hold to her, my said wife, and to her heirs and assigns forever. * * * Fourth. After said indebtedness has been fully paid I bequeath remainder of said land to remain undivided and under my wife's control until her death. Should she decide to marry again, I then desire said estate to be divided equally between all the heirs of my body and Emily Harty Slade; she receiving a child's part in lieu of dower. I hereby revoke all former wills made by me." Held, that the second item of the will conveyed a fee-simple estate to the wife of the testator.

2. Wills \S 601(1)—Fee devised absolutely will not be reduced by subsequent limitations, unless intention manifest.

The general rule is that courts will not by construction reduce an estate once devised absolutely in fee, by limitations contained in subsequent parts of the will, unless the intention to limit the devise is clearly and unmistakably manifest. Thomas v. Owens, 131 Ga. 255, 62 S. E. 218. See Crumbley v. Scales, 135 Ga. 300, 308, 69 S. E. 531; Kimbrough v. Smith, 123 Ga. 692, 53 S. E. 23.

3. Wills \S 601(3)—Fee simple given wife held not cut down by subsequent provisions.

Subsequent parts of the will do not clearly and unmistakably manifest an intent to limit or cut down the absolute fee-simple estate conveyed in the second item of the will to a life estate. It follows, therefore, that the father of the plaintiffs in error had no interest in the estate to convey, and the purchaser from him acquired no title thereto, for the reason that the entire estate belonged to the mother; she never having remarried after the death of the testator. The plaintiffs in error, as heirs at law of their deceased father, would take one share per stirpes in the estate of their deceased grandmother. The case of Porter v. Thomas, 23 Ga. 467, 471, relied upon by the defendant in error, is distinguishable from the case at bar. In the Porter Case the language of the will never created a fee-simple estate at all. Here a fee-simple estate is clearly created by the second item of the will, and the question is whether it is cut down to a life estate by subsequent language in the will.

Error from Superior Court, Crisp County; O. T. Gower, Judge.

Proceeding by J. O. Slade and others against H. A. Smith, guardian, and others. Decree construing a will, and defendants bring error. Reversed.

This case was tried, upon the pleadings and the following agreed statement of facts, by the trial judge acting as court and jury:

"J. Z. Slade, the father of J. O. Slade, T. A. Slade, Mrs. J. L. Raines, Mrs. J. T. Ingram, Mrs. Zachie Cox, and Mrs. J. W. Askew, and the grandfather of the minor children, Lucile Slade, Effie Slade, Thomas Slade, Fred Slade, and Lois Slade, died intestate, a resident of Dooly county, Ga., on September 2, 1898. Mrs. Emily Harty Slade, the wife of J. Z. Slade, was likewise the mother and grandmother of the aforementioned parties. The will of the said J. Z. Slade was duly probated in the ordinary's court of Dooly county, Ga. (the territory in which J. Z. Slade lived now being Crisp county), and said will is as follows, to wit:

"Georgia, Dooly County. Last Will and Testament of J. Z. Slade. I, J. Z. Slade, of the county of Dooly and state of Georgia, being of sound mind and memory, do make and publish and declare this to be my last will and testament.

"First. All my just debts and funeral expenses shall be first fully paid.

"Second. I give and bequeath all the rest, residue, and remainder of my entire estate, both real and personal, to my beloved wife, Emily Harty Slade, to have and to hold to her, my said wife, and to her heirs and assigns forever.

"Third. I nominate and appoint my said wife, Emily Harty Slade, to be the executrix of my last will and testament, without bond, for her to sell such perishable property and stock she sees fit to settle all my indebtedness; should such sale be insufficient to settle said debts, she may further sell such lands as she may deem necessary to finish paying the remainder of said indebtedness.

"Fourth. After said indebtedness has been fully paid, I bequeath remainder of said lands to remain undivided and under my wife's control until her death. Should she decide to marry again, I then desire said estate to be divided equally between all the heirs of my body and Emily Harty Slade; she receiving a child's part in lieu of dower. I hereby revoke all former wills made by me.

"In witness whereof I hereunto set my hand and seal, this the 18th day of Aug., 1898.

"J. Z. Slade. [L. S.]

"Witnesses: J. B. Scott, J. M. Lewis, W. E. Hawkins, Howard M. Smith."

"Mrs. Emily Harty Slade * * * duly qualified as executrix of said will upon the probate thereof, and acted as such executrix until the date of her death, on December 17, 1918; she having died intestate. She never remarried, and did not sell any of the real estate of which J. Z. Slade died seized and possessed, amounting to approximately 700 acres of land, located in the territory now embraced in Crisp county, Ga., and certain city lots in the city of Cordele, in said county and state, the particular description of which is not deemed essential to this litigation. During the period of her administration as executrix Mrs. Emily Harty Slade sold certain sawmill timber off of the real estate above referred to, receiving therefor the sum of $5,000 in cash, which she later invested in Liberty bonds of the United States government, and was in possession of the same at the time of her death; and both sides agree that the same stands in lieu of the timber so sold, there being at the time of the sale of said timber no outstanding debts of any kind against J. Z. Slade, deceased, and no necessity, under the terms of the law, compelling the sale of said timber for any purpose. After the death of Mrs. Emily Harty Slade, J. O. Slade, petitioner in the court below, was appointed as administrator of J. Z. Slade, with the will annexed, in the ordinary's court of Crisp county, Ga., J. O. Slade was also appointed by said court as the administrator of the estate of Mrs. Emily Harty Slade, qualified in each of said representative capacities, and is now acting as such in each case. Mrs. Emily Harty Slade, at the time of her death, owed no debts of any kind. The real estate heretofore referred to is so located as that it would be impracticable to divide said lands into as many as 35 divisions, which would be necessary in the event it should be held that the minor children of T. J. Slade, deceased, have an interest therein; and in this latter event it would be necessary that the lands be sold under the direction of the court for division.

"T. J. Slade, the father of the minor children, Lucile, Effie, Thomas, Fred, and Lois, was a son of J. Z. Slade and of Mrs. Emily Harty Slade, and died in 1914, after the death of his father, and before the death of his mother. Prior to his death, and subsequent to the death of his father, T. J. Slade conveyed by deed all of his interest in the estate of his father, J. Z. Slade, to his brother, J. O. Slade, one of the parties in this cause, this being one of the reasons why J. O. Slade is asking that the will of J. Z. Slade be so construed as that by it only a life estate in the property of J. Z. Slade, deceased, passed into his wife, Mrs. Emily Harty Slade. At the time of the will in question by J. Z. Slade, the ages of the children of himself and Mrs. Emily Harty Slade were as follows: Mrs. J. L. Raines, 27 years; J. O. Slade, 25 years; T. J. Slade, 20 years; T. A. Slade, 17 years; Mrs. E. A. Johnson, 13 years; Mrs. J. W. Askew, 9 years; Mrs. Zachie Cox, two months. Mrs. E. A. Johnson is in no wise involved in this proceeding."

The court rendered a decree holding that the will of J. Z. Slade conveyed only a life estate to Mrs. Emily Harty Slade in the property in question, and that upon her death all of the property, including the lands referred to, reverted and became a part of the estate of J. Z. Slade, deceased, and that on account of the conveyance by T. J. Slade, one of the heirs, during his lifetime, of his interest in the estate of J. Z. Slade, the minor children of T. J. Slade, who are the plaintiffs in error in this case, had no interest whatever in the property. To this judgment the plaintiffs in error excepted.

CROFT v. SORRELL et al. (No. 2040.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia, Feb. 16, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Mortgages \S 369(3) — Sale not set aside for mere inadequacy, but set aside for fraud, etc., causing gross inadequacy.

Inadequacy of price at a public sale under power will not of itself be a sufficient ground to set aside a sale; yet, when it is grossly inadequate and is connected with fraud, mistake, misapprehension, surprise, or other circumstances which tend to bring about such inadequacy, to the injury of parties interested, the sale will be set aside by a court of equity.

2. Mortgages \S 369(1,2) — Setting aside of sale for surprise causing inadequacy of price denied; mortgagor's administrator cannot complain of inadequacy when endeavoring to chill sale.

But under the facts of this case the jury were not authorized to find a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, on the ground of surprise or other circumstances which tended to bring about gross inadequacy in the price bid at the sale by the purchaser, to the injury of the complainant.

3. Refusal of new trial held error.

The court erred in refusing a new trial.

Error from Superior Court, Colquitt County; W. E. Thomas, Judge.

Suit by J. T. Sorrell, individually and as administrator of J. J. Sorrell, deceased, against L. C. Croft and others. Judgment for plaintiff and defendant Croft brings error. Reversed.

James Humphreys and Dowling & Askew, all of Moultrie, for plaintiff in error.

Hill & Gibson and P. Q. Bryan, all of Moultrie, for defendants in error.

HILL, J. J. T. Sorrell, individually and as administrator of the estate of J. J. Sorrell, deceased, brought an equitable petition against L. C. Croft, British-American Mortgage Company, Limited, and Robert L. Shipp, to enjoin the two defendants last named from executing and delivering, and Croft from receiving, a deed conveying 260 acres of land, more or less, to him on the grounds that the land sold had been improperly advertised, and that the sale of it as the property of the mortgagor, J. J. Sorrell, who at the time of the sale was dead, was illegal. Subsequently the plaintiff amended his petition, alleging that the inadequacy of the price at which the land was bid off, combined with the circumstances attending the sale, amounted to fraud. A general demurrer to the petition was overruled, and also special demurrers; but it appears that the special demurrers were filed after the first term of the court, which was too late. The court did not err in overruling the demurrer. At the trial the judge by his ruling eliminated the question of irregularity in the advertisement of the land under the power of sale contained in the mortgage and the contention that it could not be sold as the property of the mortgagor after his death. The plaintiff acquiesced in this by failing to except thereto; and the case went to trial solely on the question of whether the land was sold for a grossly inadequate price and whether in the sale there was fraud, accident, or mistake, etc.

In the view we take of this case the evidence was not sufficient to authorize the verdict, and the court erred in refusing a new trial. The evidence for the plaintiff showed that the sale had been going on for half an hour, and that it "was a slow sale." R. L. Shipp and Croft, the defendant, had been bidding against each other. Shipp primarily was bidding as attorney for the British-American Mortgage Company, Limited, in order to make the land bring the amount that was due his clients, which was about $1,000. Croft was bidding for himself. After Shipp had made the property bring the amount of his client's debt, he continued to bid for Mrs. J. J. Sorrell and her son, who were the widow and son respectively of J. J. Sorrell, deceased, the mortgagor. Shipp and Croft had raised each other's bids until the bid was in the neighborhood of $1,800, the limit that Shipp was authorized to bid for Mrs. Sorrell and her son. When Shipp made his last bid he turned in the direction of J. T. Sorrell, L. L. Moore, and W. W. Stokes, threw up his hands, and repeated twice: "I am through." The three were standing within 10 or 15 feet of Shipp and of the sheriff, Boyd, who was "crying the property." After Shipp announced that he was through bidding, Croft bid the sum of $1,800; and at least one witness for the plaintiff testified that the sheriff then cried, "One, two, three," and knocked the property off to Croft. J. T. Sorrell testified:

"I was aiming to bid on it, but it was knocked off before I knew it. Mr. L. L. Moore, Mr. W. S. Stokes, and myself were talking. Mr. W. W. Boyd [the sheriff] cried the property, standing up on the porch out there where he usually stands. We were standing about as far away as from here to Mr. Gibson [the attorney examining him], I suppose, when it was knocked off. We were standing out there on the ground. I discovered that the property was knocked off when he was reading an advertisement on another piece of property. I did not do anything, but Mr. Moore started to notify Mr. Boyd. * * * I would not say how long he cried it off; the sheriff can answer that for himself. He did not cry it off in the usual tone; he was talking very low towards the last. I did not have a talk with the sheriff after the sale nor with Mr. Less Croft myself. I could not tell how many other mortgages outstanding against the property in addition to the executions which I had as administrator purchased. I have not run any citation on it. I bought one fl. fa. other than any of them that ought to have been put ahead of them."

L. L. Moore, sworn for the plaintiff, testified:

"I was there for the purpose of bidding for Mr. J. T. Sorrell. Mr. W. W. Boyd, sheriff, cried off the property for sale. Mr. Boyd was selling it for the British-American Mortgage Company, Limited, and not as an execution sale, and was designated to act as auctioneer. I do not recall how long it was when it was first offered for sale until it was knocked off, but was an ordinary short sale. I do not think we put in a bid, but there was bidding going on, Mr. Croft and Mr. Shipp; and for the purpose of consulting we stepped aside just to the left of the east door of the courthouse, about 12 or 15 feet from Mr. Boyd, the auctioneer; and when we left his presence he was crying bids as the sheriff usually does, with no prospects, and I thought of coming on, and the business was going along, and we had not been gone over the total of half a minute before I discovered the silence around there, and I rushed up to see what had happened, and I was informed that it had been knocked off to Mr. Croft for $1,800. The sheriff informed me, and I offered him $1,850 for it and insisted that he accept it. We were ready to pay it at that time, and we were making another bid. I asked him to reoffer the property, but he said that it had been knocked off; and I said, 'Reopen it,' and he said that he could not do it, or refused to do it. I do not remember his exact words. I grant you the sheriff was in good faith then, and could not reopen. * * * We got away for the purpose of discussing the bids a little further, and the sheriff was crying off at that time, and I had an ear open to hear it; and when the silence came I went back to see what had transpired. * * * Certainly I knew that a land sale was going on there. I was trying to get his limit when they were talking to me. I heard the sheriff calling for bids when I left, but I did not hear him say he would knock it off to anybody. I do not think he counted a single thing. If he did, he did it in a low tone, as I was trying to keep up with him and I failed to hear it. I believe Mr. Croft was not over six or eight feet from the sheriff. When I discovered that the property was knocked off, I went up to the sheriff and conveyed to him that I wanted to bid, I think. * * * I heard Less Croft make bids on the property. I do not know whether Mr. J. E. Sorrell bid on the property. My idea was to get the property bid off into the Sorrell family, and I was there to buy it, and I tried to discourage Mr. Croft from bidding. I told him that I did not know whether it was good or not. I knew the point was raised here as to the administration, but did not have that in mind then, as there was a conflict in the land lines. I thought he would have trouble on that. I knew that there were other lawsuits against the place, as there were some other liens against it."

W. S. Stokes testified for the plaintiff:

"I was sorter a third party in the conversation between Mr. Sorrell, Mr. Moore, and myself. Mr. Moore and Mr. Sorrell were more in the conversation than myself. I would say that I was about 12 to 15 feet from the auctioneer when the property was knocked off. * * * Mr. Shipp stopped bidding and said that he was done, and the sheriff having received a bid from Mr. Croft for more, making the bid for $1,800, and the property was knocked off, and I remarked about the abruptness with which it was ended, and I think I called Mr. Sorrell and Mr. Moore's attention to the fact. Mr. Moore immediately got busy with a request to reopen. * * * I heard Mr. Shipp bid. The reason I did not bid then was because Mr. Shipp said he was done, and I was not accustomed to seeing it done, without hollering out a few times. We had been there for about half an hour. I do not think that much hollering had been done. Yes; they had been doing that for some little time; it was a slow sale; the bids were small with Mr. Shipp and Mr. Croft, and there was not anybody else bidding toward the last. I was not engaged in the conversation so much, I was not watching the progress of the sale, but I kept up with the bids. The sheriff cried, 'One, two, three,' mighty close on to one another, but I did not know whether he went over it so deliberately."

Robert L. Shipp testified for the plaintiff:

That he had charge of the sale of the land in behalf of the British-American Mortgage Company, which he was representing in the transaction. Sheriff Boyd and Shipp were good friends, and the sheriff for accommodation "cried the sale." "I was present at the sale, and represented the loan company. Mr. Boyd was acting for accommodation, and got no pay for it. J. J. Sorrell was dead at the date of the sale. I do not know how long he had been dead, except that he died before the advertisement started. Mr. Sorrell and I had been friends for years; and his boy asked me to sell this property this way, and it is contrary to the rule of the British-American Mortgage Company. There were only two heirs, J. E. and the widow. Yes; I bid at the sale. * * * I was bidding for them, and I do not suppose they knew. I suppose both of them knew I was trying to save the property for them. My company only had about $1,000 in it, and there was no question about us getting our money, and whatever I could do there I would do it for them. No; I had no personal interest in the case. * * * I do not remember Mr. Stokes, but Mr. Moore and Mr. Sorrell were on the ground opposite the other abutment. I know that he was about the sale. I know that Mr. Croft heard Mr. Moore offer to raise the bid. * * * Mr. Moore and Mr. Sorrell were close enough to hear me when I said, 'I am through.' When I got through bidding, I turned around to Mr. Sorrell and Mr. Moore and said I was through, twice; that my bidding was up. I was as close to them as from here to you when I said, 'I am through.'"

We have quoted above entirely from the evidence for the plaintiff. The evidence for the defendant is even stronger against the contention of the plaintiff.

[1] The general rule is that inadequacy in price at a sheriff's sale will not of itself be a sufficient ground to set aside a sale. "Yet, when it is grossly inadequate and is connected with fraud, mistake, misapprehension, surprise, or other circumstances which tend to bring about such inadequacy, to the injury of parties interested, the sale will be set aside by a court of equity." Smith v. Georgia Loan & Trust Co., 114 Ga. 189, 39 S. E. 846. We see no reason for a different rule as to a public sale under a power.

[2, 3] Applying this rule to the facts of the present case, the strongest in the plaintiff's favor being set out above, we do not think that the facts show such a case of legal "surprise," or otherwise, as to bring it within the rule stated above. In order for the plaintiff to prevail, he must show that the circumstances complained of produced gross inadequacy of price, and that he himself was free from fault. From the facts testified to by his own witnesses he was not free from fault at the time of the sale. He had withdrawn himself apart from the place of the sale, and was engaged in conversation with others when the property was knocked off to the purchaser. In addition to that, at least one of complainant's friends endeavored to make this property bring as little as possible in order, according to his evidence, that the Sorrell family might purchase it; and, even if the property actually brought less than its real value, under the circumstances, the plaintiff will not be heard to complain. There is evidence tending to show that he and his friends were endeavoring to chill the sale, according to the evidence of one of his witnesses, speaking of liens against the land, and that there was a dispute as to the land lines, thus endeavoring to keep down competitive bidding at the sale. In addition to this, the evidence shows that, after the land was knocked off to Croft at $1,800, Moore, for complainant, offered to raise the bid only $50, which presumably he thought was a fair price. This is a case in equity, and the plaintiff must come into court with clean hands before he can recover.

STANDARD LIFE INS. CO. v. CITY OF ATLANTA. (No. 1987.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 18, 1921.)

(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

1. Taxation \S 387—"Total value of assets" and "reserve" of insurance companies defined.

As used in Civ. Code 1910, \S 980, providing that the value of the personal property of insurance companies on the legal reserve plan shall be ascertained by deducting from the total value of the assets certain deductions, including the amount of the reserve held for policy holders, the "total value of the assets" refers to assets owned by the company, and "reserve" refers to property not designed to be taxed as property of the company.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Reserve—Reserved.]

2. Taxation \S 193, 194—Statute providing method of ascertaining value of personal property of insurance company unconstitutional as exempting the reserve.

Civ. Code 1910, \S 980, providing the method for ascertaining the value of the personal property of companies doing business on the legal reserve plan, though not expressly exempting the reserve, accomplishes the same result, and violates Const. art. 7, \S 2, pars. 1, 2, 4, requiring taxes to be uniform and ad valorem, and prohibiting the exemption of property other than that enumerated in the Constitution.

ATKINSON, J. It is declared in the Civil Code, \S 980:

"Every fire insurance company and life insurance company incorporated under the laws of this state, and doing business on the legal reserve plan, shall be required to return for taxation all of its real estate as other real estate is returned, and all of the personal property owned by such company shall be returned as other personal property is returned for taxation, and the value of the personal property owned by it shall be ascertained in the following manner: From the total value of the assets held by the company, both real and personal, shall be deducted the assessed value of all the real estate owned by the company in this state, the nontaxable bonds deposited by the company with the state treasurer, and the amount of the reserve or net value of its policies required by law to be held by the company for its policy holders and which belong to such policy holders; the remainder shall be the value of the personal property owned by and taxable against such company."

Held:

[1, 2] 1. When considered in connection with the preceding part of the statute, the words "total value of the assets held by the company" refer to assets owned by the company. "Reserve," as employed in the latter part of the statute, refers to property not designed to be taxed as property of the company. Under such construction, deduction of "reserve" from "total value" of the assets held by the company, while not expressly exempting the "reserve" as such, would accomplish a result amounting to the same thing, namely, a reduction of the ascertainable value of the personal property of the company equal to the amount of the reserve.

2. So much of the statute as refers to method for ascertaining the value of personal property is violative of the Constitution, article 7, section 2, paragraphs 1, 2, 4 (Civil Code, §§ 6553, 6554, 6556), providing that taxes shall be uniform and ad valorem and prohibiting the exemption of property from taxation otherwise than is specially mentioned. No question as to constitutionality of the statute was decided in City of Atlanta v. Standard Life Insurance Co. 149 Ga. 501, 101 S. E. 122.

3. Under the pleadings and the agreed statement of facts, the judge did not err in directing a verdict for the defendant.

Judgment affirmed.

SOUTHLAND S. S. CO. OF DELAWARE v. DIXON, Sheriff. (No. 1981.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. March 3, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Taxation §371—Foreign corporation authorized to engage in navigation is "navigation company," required to make return to comptroller general.

A corporation chartered under the "general incorporation law" of the state of Delaware, having its capital stock paid in for the purpose of carrying on the corporate business, and having power under its charter to engage in the business of navigation and other industrial enterprises in the state of Georgia, which establishes a branch office and agency in this state and acquires property having a situs in this state for the purposes of taxation, is a navigation company within the meaning of section 8 of the general tax act passed by the General Assembly of Georgia in the year 1918 (Acts 1918, p. 76), requiring "navigation companies," among others, to make returns of their property for taxation to the comptroller general of the state.

Error from Superior Court, Chatham County; P. W. Meldrim, Judge.

Suit by the Southland Steamship Company of Delaware against M. W. Dixon, Sheriff. Judgment refusing an interlocutory injunction, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Adams & Adams, of Savannah, for plaintiff in error.

Geo. W. Owens, of Savannah, for defendant in error.

ATKINSON, J. The exception is to a judgment refusing an interlocutory injunction against the sheriff of Chatham county, to prevent the levy and sale of plaintiff's property under a tax execution issued by the comptroller general of the state, for state and county taxes on plaintiff's property located in this state, payable in the year 1919. The plaintiff, on April 19, 1919, made a return to the receiver of tax returns of the county of Chatham for the year in question, showing its property and values as follows:

Ossabaw Island, 22,000 acres of land.....	$150,000
Shipbuilding plant on leased land.....	50,000
Moneys in bank.....	125,000
Office furniture	500

The return was rejected by the receiver of tax returns, at the instance of the comptroller general, who contended that the law required it to be made to him. Upon refusal of the plaintiff to make returns to the comptroller general, he proceeded to assess the property. The assessment was as follows:

Real estate located in Chatham county, known as Ossabaw Island	$220,000
Shipbuilding plant	50,000
Money, notes, and accounts.....	125,000
Office furniture, fixtures, etc.	500

The plaintiff having declined to pay the tax on such assessment, the comptroller general issued an execution on the basis of his assessment. The plaintiff contended that the property was not returnable to the comptroller general, and that, he being without jurisdiction, the execution issued by him was void and should be enjoined from enforcement against its property. The case is therefore reduced to the single question of power of the comptroller general over tangible property of plaintiff located in this state, for the purpose of levying and collecting taxes. Such power is asserted by the comptroller general on the ground that the plaintiff is a navigation company, and as such is required to make returns of its tangible property located in this state to him, in virtue of section 8 of the general tax act of 1918 (Acts 1918, pp. 43-83), which, in so far as is material to the question at issue, provides:

"That all railroad companies * * * equipment and navigation companies through their president, general manager, or agents having control of the companies' affairs in this state, shall be required to make returns of all property of said company located in this state to the comptroller general, and the law now of force providing for the taxation of railroads in this state shall be applicable to the assessment of taxes from said business as above stated."

The plaintiff is an incorporated company. Its charter was granted December 23, 1918, in the state of Delaware, under the "general corporation law" of that state, applicable for the grant of charters for corporations to engage in any and all kinds of business. Its corporate name was declared to be "Southland Steamship Company of Delaware." Its principal office was required to be in the state of Delaware, city of Wilmington, and it was "to have one or more offices to carry on all or any of its operations and business." The amount of its capital stock with which the corporation would commence business was $1,000, which was distributed among five original subscribers to stock in the proportion of two shares to each subscriber, one of whom was a resident of the state of Maine and the others were residents of the state of Georgia. The total authorized capital stock was $5,000,000, divided into 50,000 shares of the par value of $100 each. Some of the objects of the corporation, as declared in the charter, were:

"To engage in commerce and navigation upon the oceans, seas, sounds, lakes, rivers, canals, bays, harbors, and other waterways between ports of the United States, its territories and/or possessions, Canada, Central America, Mexico, South America, British Isles, Europe, Asia, Africa, Japan, Australia, West Indies, and/or other islands belonging to foreign powers; and, as incidental thereto, for the purpose of contracting for, purchasing, building for its own use and/or owning and/or equipping, furnishing, and fitting, and/or navigating, and/or chartering to or from others, steam, mail, and/or other boats, ships, vessels, and/or other property, to be used in any lawful business, trade, commerce, or navigation upon the oceans, seas, sounds, lakes, rivers, canals, bays, harbors, and other waterways aforesaid, and for the carriage, transportation, and storing of freight, mails, property, and passengers thereon."

The charter also empowered the corporation to engage in general commercial business, and—

"to carry on all or of the business of ship-brokers, managers of shipping property, freight contractors, barge owners, lightermen, forwarding agents, warehousemen, and/or wharfingers, * * * to manufacture, purchase, or otherwise acquire, own, mortgage, pledge, sell, assign, and transfer or otherwise dispose of, to invest, trade, deal in and deal with goods, wares, and merchandise, and real and personal property of every class and description. * * * In general to carry on any other business in connection with the foregoing, whether manufacturing or otherwise, and to have and exercise all the powers conferred by the laws of Delaware upon corporations formed under the act hereinafter referred to, and to do any and all of the things hereinbefore set forth to the same extent as natural persons might or could do."

A few days after the grant of the charter the corporation was duly organized and its authorized capital stock fully issued. It established branch offices in the cities of New York and Savannah and proceeded to engage in business. Among the things done was the "taking over" of the business and properties of the "Southland Steamship Company," which was a corporation created as a navigation company under the laws of Georgia (admittedly a navigation company) upon application by substantially the same parties who incorporated plaintiff, the Southland Steamship Company of Delaware. This transaction occurred on December 31, 1918, at which time the Southland Steamship Company went out of business, transferring all its property and assets to the Southland Steamship Company of Delaware; the latter corporation assuming all the obligations and contracts of the former and continuing to carry on its business. Included among the properties of the Southland Steamship Company was Ossabaw Island. At the time of the transfer the Southland Steamship Company did not own any ship or vessel.

The petition, which was introduced as evidence, alleged, among other things:

"That petitioner has never owned a ship or vessel of any kind or character; has never at any time engaged in the business of a navigation company; that there is no immediate prospect of petitioner ever doing so; and that petitioner may never in point of fact engage in the business. It will, in any event, not do so during the year 1919. The only business that petitioner has in point of fact done in Georgia has been the construction of some tugs for the United States government, under a contract taken over by the petitioner. Petitioner's New York office has entered into some charter parties and freight contracts for petitioner."

Referring to the charter parties thus spoken of in the petition, one of the witnesses for the plaintiff testified that they—"were the ordinary charter parties and contracts, involving only the contracts of affreightment; that the charterers or freighters did not become the owners of the ship for the voyage, and there was no demise of the ship to the plaintiff, and the owner of the ship retained the possession, command, and navigation of the ship during the voyage, the master and the crew remaining the servants of the shipowner. * * * These contracts were made in New York by the New York office, are kept in New York City, and are not in Georgia."

A witness for the plaintiff also testified:

"The * * * Southland Steamship Company of Delaware did not, at any time during the year 1919, in any way do the business of a navigation company, and was not at any time during the year 1919 the owner of any ship or vessel, or equipped in any way for the doing of the business of a navigation company. * * * There is no immediate prospect of the plaintiff ever owning any ships, or of doing the business of a navigation company."

Other evidence was introduced, going into greater details as to the controversy between the parties to the suit; but it is not deemed necessary to go into it at greater length. While some of the evidence as to the character of the business carried on by the plaintiff was in the nature of conclusions, there was no conflict of evidence as to any of the matters stated above. The question is: Was the judge authorized, under the facts as indicated, to hold as he did that the Southland Steamship Company of Delaware was a navigation company, within the meaning of the statutes of this state, and require it as such to make returns to the comptroller general?

It is provided in Civil Code, § 2565:

"All corporate powers and privileges to navigation companies in this state shall be issued and granted by the secretary of state."

In Civil Code, § 2566, it is provided that in the petition for incorporation there—

"shall be stated the names and residences of each of the persons desiring to form said corporation, the name of the navigation company they desire to have incorporated, the amount of the proposed capital stock, the number of years it is to continue, the place where its principal office is to be located, a request to be incorporated under the laws of this state."

In Civil Code, § 2567, the form of the certificate of incorporation is prescribed, which declares that the incorporators may exercise the powers and privileges of a corporation:

"For the purpose of owning, constructing, equipping, maintaining, and operating vessels, steamboats, and all other water crafts to be engaged in navigation."

Civil Code, § 2575, deals further with the subject of power of such corporations, by declaring that they shall be empowered:

"1. To acquire, purchase, hold, and operate all such real and personal property as may be necessary or convenient for the maintenance and operation of its said business and to accomplish the purposes of its organization. 2. To convey persons, vessels, and other property, by the use of steam, sail, or other means, and to receive compensation therefor; and to do all other things incident to a general navigation business, including the right to tow, assist, and rescue vessels. 3. To erect and maintain convenient buildings, wharves, docks, fixtures, and machinery for the accommodation and use of their passengers, freight, and other business. 4. To regulate the time and manner in which passengers, vessels, and other property shall be transported, and the compensation to be paid therefor, subject to any existing law of this state upon the subject. 5. To borrow such sum or sums of money, at such rates of interest and upon such terms, as said company or its directors may agree upon, and to execute trust deeds or mortgages, or both, if in their judgment the occasion may require it, for securing the payment thereof."

These provisions in the statute tend to show the character of corporation contemplated by the Legislature, when it required, in section 8 of the general tax act of 1918, supra, "navigation companies" to make their returns to the comptroller general. The taxing act, however, extended to all navigation companies, including those incorporated in other states, but having property in this state, as well as those incorporated under the laws of this state. A comparison of the powers conferred in the charter issued in the state of Delaware to the Southland Steamship Company of Delaware, with the provisions of the statutes above indicated, will show that, while it was authorized to carry on other kinds of business, it was also authorized to carry on the business of a navigation company, such as indicated in the statutes of Georgia. It appears that one of the purposes for which the Southland Steamship Company of Delaware was organized, and therefore one of the objects of the subscribers of its capital stock, was to engage in business in Georgia as a navigation company, and that it had ample charter power; also that it had an agency in Georgia and money and other property in Georgia available as a basis of credit, or otherwise, for carrying on a navigation business. To use the language of the witness, there was "no immediate prospect of the plaintiff owning any ships or of doing the business of a navigation company"; but the fact that there was no such prospect would not destroy the power of the company to engage in such business or prevent it from being a navigation company. In the brief of counsel it is said:

"If plaintiff in error had done no business of any kind anywhere, it would not be compelled to make a return to the comptroller. If it had done no business of any kind in Georgia, the same result would follow. This being true, if the only business done in Georgia is that stated without dispute, namely, the building of some tugs for the Government, then the case ought to stand, in logic and in law, just as if it had done no business whatever in Georgia."

This is a forceful statement of the contention of the plaintiff, but it does not exactly state the case. It overlooks the purpose for which the corporation was organized and its capital stock paid; the powers conferred by the charter; the establishment of an agency in Georgia to carry on the corporate business and the acquisition of capital in Georgia, that could be employed directly or indirectly in navigation. It is not necessary that the company should have actually owned or commenced navigating a ship. If that were necessary, it might require several years' preparation in the building of ships or the like, before the company would make return of its taxable property to the comptroller general. That would not comport with the meaning of the statute. It might as well be said that a railroad company duly organized, which had acquired property consisting of a railroad and equipment—proper subject-matter for taxation—would not be a railroad company within the meaning of the act, and required to make its returns to the comptroller general, until it had commenced to carry on the business of transportation for which it was organized, or, having engaged in such business, its property could not be so taxed, if for any cause there should be a suspension of its transportation business.

The trial judge was authorized to hold that the plaintiff was a navigation company, within the meaning of the statute, and there was no error in refusing an injunction.

Judgment affirmed.

CHURCH v. CHURCH et al. (No. 2077.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 16, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Process \S 63—Order for perfection of service after lapse of seven terms from filing of declaration held too late.

It is too late for the trial judge to pass an order to perfect service on the defendant, after the lapse of seven terms of court from the filing of the declaration, where no legal reason is shown for the failure to perfect service.

2. Dismissal and nonsuit \S 57—Dismissal when service not made for seven terms held not error.

Under the facts of the case, the court did not err in dismissing the petition on motion.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; Geo. L. Bell, Judge.

Action by R. E. Church against L. M. Church and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

R. E. Church brought a petition against J. Harry Helmer, a resident of Fulton county, and Mrs. Lillian M. Church, who it was alleged resided without the state of Georgia, and whose place of residence was unknown to the plaintiff, praying that he recover certain described premises in Fulton county, together with mesne profits, and that certain deeds recited in the petition be canceled as clouds upon the plaintiff's title; also praying for process. The process was dated April 10, 1918. On April 11, the sheriff made a return, reciting that the defendant Mrs. Lillian M. Church was not to be found in Fulton county. On the same date Judge Bell passed an order that service be perfected on this defendant by publication. On May 29, 1919, Judge Pendleton made an order in which it was recited that service had not been perfected on the defendants; it was ordered that the case be made returnable to the September term, 1919, of the superior court, and that service on Mrs. Church be perfected by publication to the September term, 1919, as theretofore ordered on April 11, 1918, and that service be perfected on the other defendant, J. Harry Helmer, according to law to the same term of court. Service was perfected on J. Harry Helmer personally, by the deputy sheriff, on June 9, 1919, and on the same date the deputy clerk of the court certified that he had that day mailed a copy of the Fulton County Daily Report, containing a marked copy of the present suit, properly stamped and addressed to the defendant, Mrs. Lillian M. Church, at a named place in New York. On August 2, 1919, Judge Bell passed an order in which it was recited that service had been perfected on Mrs. Lillian M. Church by publication to the September term, 1919.

On September 18, 1919, the defendants moved to dismiss the petition, for the reasons: (1) That the suit was filed April 10, 1918, and process issued returnable to the May term, 1918. Entry of non est inventus was made as to the defendant Mrs. Lillian M. Church on April 11, 1918, and an order for publication granted, which publication was never had, nor was service ever made on this defendant, although service was claimed to have been made by publication in June and July, 1919. (2) No prayer for amendment of process or new process was ever made, but process did issue on May 29, 1919, in the suit that was already lifeless, and the process was wholly unauthorized by law and void. After this long lapse of time the process could not be amended by the court, and service based upon process which did issue under the circumstances is a mere nullity and the case should be dismissed. Whereupon Judge Bell, on April 1, 1920, dismissed the petition on the ground that seven terms of the court had elapsed, and there was no entry of non est inventus as to the one defendant who was alleged to be a resident of Fulton county, and who had not been served; that the other defendant was not served by publication, though an order was taken at the first term for such service; and that the order of May 29, 1919, authorizing service was a nullity, the case being lifeless, and the judge ordering the service had no jurisdiction. To this order the plaintiff excepted.

Anderson, Rountree & Crenshaw, of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error.

Willis M. Everett and Moore & Pomeroy, all of Atlanta, for defendants in error.

HILL, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] 1. The single question for decision is whether under the facts, after the lapse of more than seven terms of the court without service upon the defendants, service can be perfected, and whether it was legally done in the instant case. Civil Code (1910) § 5570, provides that—

"Whenever process is not served the length of time required by law before the appearance term, such service shall be good for the next succeeding term thereafter, which shall be the appearance term."

In the case of Branch v. Mechanics' Bank, 50 Ga. 413, it was held:

"Where a declaration was filed and process attached against a corporation, and a regular return made by the sheriff that the defendant was not to be found, and that the president of the corporation was dead, the plaintiff is not entitled after the lapse of five terms of the court without having taken any further action, or showing sufficient legal reason for the delay, to amend the process so as to make it returnable to the then ensuing term, and to perfect service by publication."

In delivering the opinion of the court in that case Trippe, J., said:

"We are fully aware of the great liberality allowed by law, and as shown by many of the decisions, as to amendments both of declarations and process, and, also, as to perfecting service; but we do not think that any statute or decision has gone so far as to permit a plaintiff to file his petition, and after a return of no service by the sheriff, to await the expiration of five terms without any action whatever, and then, without any legal cause shown for the laches or delay, ask to be permitted to do that which could as well have been done, and should have been done more than two years previously."

In the instant case, so far as the record discloses, there was no effort to serve the resident defendant until after the seven terms of court had passed. In the case of Brunswick Hardware Co. v. Bingham, 110 Ga. 526, 35 S. E. 772, it was held:

"It is too late for the trial judge to pass an order to perfect service on the defendant, after the lapse of seven terms of court after the filing of the declaration."

In Cox v. Strickland, 120 Ga. 104 (7), 47 S. E. 912, 1 Ann. Cas. 870, the court held:

"The filing of the petition is treated as the commencement of the suit only when followed by due and legal service. If there is no process and no service, and the plaintiff is guilty of laches, the writ becomes abortive, and the court loses jurisdiction to issue process or to have service perfected."

In McClendon v. Ward-Truitt Co., 19 Ga. App. 495, 91 S. E. 1000, the above ruling is repeated and followed. The case of Sims v. Sims, 135 Ga. 439, 69 S. E. 545, was one where process was duly issued in a case requiring personal service, but no service was made, by reason of the defendant's absence from the state, and it was held in that case that the judge had the right, upon the return of the defendant to the state, to pass an order amending the process by making it returnable to the next term after the date of the order, and providing for service. In speaking for the court in that case Fish, C. J., said that—

"This court has repeatedly recognized the right of the trial judge, where there was process and no service, but some legal reason for the want thereof, to pass an order, at a subsequent term to the appearance term, amending the process and extending the time for service"—citing a number of authorities.

In the cases relied on by the plaintiff application was made to amend the process at the second term of court, and they are cases where diligence had been shown in amending the process and in perfecting service. In the instant case such diligence has not been shown on the part of the plaintiff, but, on the contrary, he has been guilty of laches in awaiting until after seven terms of the court had passed before moving to perfect service on the defendant. The defendants in error, on the other hand, made their timely motion to dismiss the case after they were served with notice of the purpose of the plaintiff to perfect service.

[2] In view of the foregoing authorities and the facts of this case, the effort of the plaintiff to perfect service on the defendants, after seven terms of the court had elapsed without any effort to do so, was "abortive and void." It follows that the trial judge did not err in sustaining the motion of the defendants and in dismissing the plaintiff's case.

Judgment affirmed.

PUCKETT v. HEATON. (No. 2046.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 21, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Receivers \S 54—Petition for injunction and receiver not bar to petition for receiver on new facts.

Where one who brought complaint for land subsequently filed an ancillary petition asking for injunction and receiver on account of waste alleged to have been committed by the defendant, and on the hearing a temporary injunction was refused, and no exception was taken; and where subsequently, after a lapse of two years from the filing of the first ancillary petition, a second ancillary petition was filed, and on the hearing of the last petition it appeared that the proceedings instituted by the plaintiff to recover the land had always been continued by the defendant from time to time, the filing of the first ancillary petition and the refusal of the injunction thereunder would not bar a renewed application for receiver, where new and additional facts were alleged and proved, arising since the former hearing, authorizing the appointment of a receiver. See, in this connection, Winkles v. Simpson Grocery Co., 138 Ga. 482 (2, b, c), 75 S. E. 640; Barrett v. Maynard, 150 Ga. —, 102 S. E. 896; Blizzard v. Nosworthy, 50 Ga. 514 (1).

2. Receivers \S 19—Properly appointed in suit to recover land where defendant was committing waste and repeatedly had case continued.

The court did not err in appointing a receiver.

Error from Superior Court, Haralson County; F. A. Irwin, Judge.

Action by W. W. Heaton against Dug Puckett. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

On June 26, 1917, W. W. Heaton filed a complaint for land against Dug Puckett, alleging that he was the owner of a certain 50 acres of land in the southwest corner of land lot No. 10 in the 9th district and 5th section of Haralson county, and that the defendant was in possession of the land and refused to deliver possession or to pay plaintiff the annual profits, which he alleged to be $200 per year. On September 29, 1917, the defendant filed his answer, denying title in the plaintiff, setting up an equitable title in himself, averring that he had paid the plaintiff the purchase price, and praying that the plaintiff be required to execute to him title to the land. On February 1, 1918, the plaintiff filed an ancillary petition to his petition for complaint for land, alleging that the defendant was committing waste by cutting, hauling, and removing the timber on the land without the consent of plaintiff; that the defendant had already disposed of as much as $100 worth, and had received the rents and profits valued at $200 for the year 1917, and was threatening to make another crop on the land; that the defendant was insolvent and could not respond in damages for rents; and that the damages would be irreparable unless the defendant was restrained. The prayer was that the defendant be enjoined from cutting and removing the timber and wood; and that a receiver be appointed to take charge of the land and preserve the rents and profits pending a recovery. On February 25, 1918, the defendant filed his answer to the ancillary petition, denying the material allegations, and setting up certain improvements which had been made by him and the payment of taxes on the land. On January 30, 1918, the judge granted a restraining order, and required the defendant to show cause why an injunction should not be granted and a receiver be appointed. On October 30, 1918, Judge Bartlett revoked the restraining order, but no express ruling was made by the judge on the prayer of plaintiff for the appointment of a receiver. On February 14, 1920, the plaintiff filed against the defendant an additional ancillary petition, in which the grounds were substantially the same as those filed February 1, 1918, except that the plaintiff alleged that since the date of commencing the suit the plaintiff had been unable to obtain a trial of the case, although he had made every possible effort to do so; that the case had been set for trial several different times, and each time it had been continued by the defendant, and he had refused to try the case; that he had been all the while in possession of the land receiving the rents and profits and refusing to pay them to the plaintiff; that the defendant is absolutely insolvent and unable to respond to any judgment that plaintiff may recover against him in the final trial of the case, if he ever succeeds in getting a trial; that he has a perfect title to the land, and that the defendant has no title and no right to the rents or profits. It is charged that to allow the defendant to retain possession of the land and to receive and use the rents and profits will amount to allowing him to have the same without paying anything therefor; and that as long as he is allowed to use the land without payment of rent or the giving of security for the same he will continue by every dilatory practice possible to delay and to continue the case as he has done in the past. It is prayed that a receiver be appointed to take charge of and rent the land, and collect and hold the rents and profits, until the final determination of the case. To this ancillary petition the defendant, on February 28, 1920, answered, and averred that on the first ancillary petition the plaintiff alleged the same facts that are alleged in his present petition, and that on that petition the court made an order revoking the temporary restraining order and setting it aside. Wherefore the defendant averred that the former judgment, which was unexcepted to, was a final adjudication of the cause of action now sued upon. He also denied the material allegations of the ancillary petition. On the hearing the court adjudged that the pleas of res adjudicata be overruled on the ground that the present petition is an application for receiver, the former one being for injunction. It was further ordered that the defendant give to the plaintiff a bond in the sum of $500, conditioned to pay whatever sum may be recovered as mesne profits or rents on the trial of the main case, and that in default of making bond in 10 days, the sheriff of the county be appointed as receiver to take charge of the premises described, rent the same, and collect and hold the rents to be applied on any judgment that may be recovered as mesne profits. To this judgment the defendant excepted.

WILLINGHAM v. SMITH et al. (No. 2124.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 16, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Deeds \S 56(1, 2, 4), 208(2)—Undelivered voluntary conveyance to imbecile held ineffective where proof of intention that it should take effect insufficient; intent essential to delivery.

Even if, in order to invest an imbecile with title to land, it may not be absolutely essential that there should be in every instance a manual delivery to such imbecile, or some one else for him, of a voluntary conveyance in which he is named as grantee, yet no effect can be given to an instrument of that character which the maker thereof, after signing and acknowledging in the presence of witnesses, retained in his own custody, in the absence of satisfactory proof that it was his intention that such instrument should operate to immediately convey to the imbecile the legal title to the premises therein described.

2. Deeds \S 66—Existence of facts constituting delivery is for jury, but sufficiency is for court.

Whether the facts constitute a delivery of a deed is a question of law; whether such facts exist is a question for the jury. Where the undisputed facts are insufficient to constitute a delivery of the deed, the court need not submit the issue of delivery to the jury.

Error from Superior Court, Troup County; J. R. Terrell, Judge.

Suit by Clarence Willingham, as guardian of Hughey Smith, against Mrs. Hattie Smith and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

E. A. Jones, of La Grange, for plaintiff in error.

F. P. Longley and A. H. Thompson, both of La Grange, for defendants in error.

GEORGE, J. The plaintiff, as guardian of Hughey Smith, filed a petition in equity against Mrs. Hattie Smith and Mrs. Nena Myers Boney. The purpose of the suit was to have title to a tract of land in Troup county decreed in plaintiff as guardian of Hughey Smith, and to have recovery of the land, with judgment for rents and profits. At the conclusion of the plaintiff's evidence the court granted a nonsuit, and the plaintiff excepted. The petition and the evidence made the following case: Hughey Smith had been since birth an idiot. He was a cousin of Sam P. Smith, with whom he resided for many years, and until the death of Sam P. Smith in 1910. Sam P. Smith died intestate, leaving his widow and adopted daughter, the defendants in the suit, as his sole heirs at law. Some time prior to his death (the exact time not being disclosed) Sam P. Smith made a deed to the land in question to Hughey Smith for life, with remainder to Mrs. Nena Myers Boney. The deed was attested in the presence of two witnesses, one of them being an official witness. It was never recorded. After the death of Sam P. Smith the deed was found among the private papers of the maker and in an envelope marked, in the handwriting of the maker, "For Hughey." The envelope also contained certain corporate bonds. Sam P. Smith also made deeds to certain other relatives, but none of these deeds were recorded or delivered. Some time prior to his death (the exact time not being disclosed) he stated to a witness "that he had made Hughey a deed to the Cleveland place," the land involved, and that he had also made deeds to certain other named relatives. About three days before his death he again stated to the same witness:

"I am not able to do any business to-day, but you come back in a short time. I want to turn those papers over to you."

The witness was trustee for Mary Paul Smith, a minor, to whom Sam P. Smith wished to make a gift of certain stocks and bonds.

[1, 2] A legal act does not come into existence as such until its utterance is final. At common law a deed of grant came into existence as such at the stage known as "delivery." Hence the delivery of a deed is essential to its validity; that is, the delivery is a part of the execution thereof. The expression "delivery," as applied to written instruments, had its inception in connection with written conveyances of lands. Nevertheless the question of delivery seems identical, whatever the character of the deed or covenant. 1 Williston on Contracts, 424, § 211. In the early English cases the delivery of a deed of grant was regarded as in effect the symbolical transfer of the land itself, analogous to livery of seisin. Hence a physical or manual delivery was deemed essential. Contrary to the doctrine of the earlier cases, the modern English view seems to be that delivery is largely a question of intention. In Xenos v. Wickman, L. R. 2 H. L. 296, followed in Roberts v. Security Co., [1897] 1 Q. B. 111, it was held that a policy of insurance was delivered, though still in the possession of the insurer, on the ground that the evidence showed an intention on the part of the insurer to execute the policy as an immediately binding obligation. The Supreme Court of this state, in New York Life Ins. Co. v. Babcock, 104 Ga. 67, 30 S. E. 273, 42 L. R. A. 88, 69 Am. St. Rep. 134, though it did not go quite so far as the English decisions, seems to have accepted the English doctrine that the thing essential to delivery is some manifestation by word or act on the part of the insurer that the instrument is to be an immediately binding obligation. Nevertheless the Civil Code 1910, § 4179, provides that—

"A deed to lands in this state must be in writing, * * * and delivered to the purchaser, or some one for him."

Under the decisions of this court, delivery, as applied to deeds, depends not only on act, but also on intent. In deeds of bargain and sale and in voluntary deeds the mere manual delivery to the grantee or donee is not sufficient; an intention to surrender dominion must be present. Story v. Brown, 98 Ga. 570, 25 S. E. 582; Ross v. Campbell, 73 Ga. 309; O'Neal v. Brown, 67 Ga. 707 (2); Bowman v. Owens, 133 Ga. 49, 51, 65 S. E. 156. The delivery of a deed is complete as against the maker at the moment when the deed is in the hands or in the power of a grantee or donee or some one for him, with the consent of the grantor and with the intention that the grantee shall hold it as a muniment of title. O'Neal v. Brown, supra. See, also, Lowry v. Lowry, 150 Ga. 324, 103 S. E. 813, 814, and cases there cited. In view of the statute quoted above, and the decisions of this court, whether a deed has been delivered cannot be made to turn merely on the question of intention. But, since the donee in the deed in the instant case was an imbecile, it is said that it was impossible to have made delivery to him, and was unnecessary that the deed be actually passed from the hands of the donor to the donee or to some one else for him. Where a deed is executed in behalf of an infant, its delivery to a witness of the deed for the benefit of the infant grantee is delivery to the infant. Watson v. Myers, 73 Ga. 138.

"Where a grandfather delivers to a father a deed conveying to the latter's daughter (an infant of tender years), in consideration of love and affection, title to a tract of land, such delivery to, and possession of the deed by, the father, is evidence of delivery to the infant. This is true, although the deed does not purport on its face to be delivered, but, being signed and witnessed by two persons, neither of whom was an officer, was afterward probated by one of the witnesses and duly recorded." Parker v. Salmons, 101 Ga. 160 (3), 28 S. E. 681, 65 Am. St. Rep. 291.

In Jenkins v. Southern Railway Co., 109 Ga. 35, 34 S. E. 355, it was ruled:

"Even if, in order to invest an infant of tender years with the title to land, it may not be absolutely essential that there should be in every instance a manual delivery to such infant himself, or to a third person as his agent, of a voluntary conveyance in which he is named as grantee, yet no effect can be given to an instrument of that character which the maker thereof, after signing and acknowledging in the presence of witnesses, retains in his own custody, in the absence of satisfactory proof that it was his intention that such instrument should operate to immediately convey to the infant grantee the legal title to the premises therein described."

The question, therefore, is whether the deed can be treated as ever having become an operative deed. It was retained by the maker, and was never recorded. The record discloses that the maker of the deed was a man of affairs. We are authorized to infer that he was familiar with the forms of procedure requisite to make a valid conveyance of real estate, in view of the fact that he had requested the witness, a kinsman, to whom he had imparted the information that he had made deeds to several of his relatives, including Hughey Smith, to "come back in a short time," adding, "I want to turn those papers over to you." The most that can be said is that Sam P. Smith signed the deed for the purpose of thereafter delivering the same. Under the evidence, a finding that any of the acts or words of the maker were intended by him as delivery of the deed, or that by his acts and declarations he intended the deed to become presently operative as a conveyance of title, was unauthorized. This being true, the court did not err in granting a nonsuit. Hill v. Merritt, 146 Ga. 307, 91 S. E. 204.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 19, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Motion to dismiss denied.

The motion to dismiss the writ of error is denied.

2. Wills \S 782(10)—Widow not required to elect between will and year's support.

The question as to whether the court erred in instructing the jury that the will did not call for an election on the part of the widow between a year's support and taking under the provisions of the will being for decision by a full bench of six Justices, who are equally divided in opinion, Fish, O. J., and Atkinson and George, JJ., being of the opinion that the court did err, and Beck, P. J., and Hill and Gilbert, JJ., being of the contrary opinion, it is considered and adjudged that the judgment of the court below as to this question stand affirmed by operation of law.

3. Executors and administrators \S 194(5½)—Instruction that year's support must come out of general and not specific legacies proper, where residuary estate ample.

It appearing from the uncontradicted evidence that the residue of the estate was ample to provide for the payment of the year's support, the court did not err in instructing the jury to the effect that the year's support must come out of the general legacies before any of the specific legacies could be applied thereto. Rust v. Billingslea, 44 Ga. 306.

4. Executors and administrators \S 178—Bequests of household furniture not considered in allowing year's support.

The court did not err in instructing the jury that they should not consider the bequests made to the widow by the testator; nor in the charge that the widow was entitled to the household furniture, and that this should not be considered as a part of the year's support. Civ. Code 1910, § 4041.

5. Wills \S 782(10)—Widow not required to elect between will and year's support.

One ground of the motion for new trial complains that "the court erred in directing the jury to find against the caveat of the executor, for the reason that this was an invasion of the province of the jury, and that, on the contrary, the court should have charged the jury that, if they should find that the will of W. N. Casey, Sr., contained an annuity for the widow, which had been accepted by her, she would not be entitled to a year's support; and further, even though there was no annuity in the will for the widow, yet, if they should find that there was a provision in the will, either expressly made in lieu of a year's support, or that the intention of the testator to that effect was deducible by clear and manifest implication from the will, founded on the fact that the claim of a year's support would be inconsistent with the will and so repugnant to its provisions as necessarily to defeat them, then in that event they should find against the claim of the widow; otherwise in her favor." Held, that this is controlled adversely to the plaintiff in error by the ruling in the second headnote.

6. Executors and administrators \S 194(5½)—Jury not limited to passing on return of appraisers allowing year's support.

Error is assigned on the following charge to the jury: "You have the right to set aside this sum for a year's support; in setting aside this sum for a year's support, to designate that it shall be paid out of a certain property, or that it shall be paid out of money, with money, or other property, or that it shall be paid part money and part personal property, or that it shall be paid part money and part personal property and part of realty; that is a matter entirely left to your discretion under the facts and circumstances of the case." Held, that this was not error.

7. Cause for reversal not shown.

None of the remaining assignments of error show cause for a reversal, and they are not of such character as to justify discussion.

Error from Superior Court, Camden County; E. D. Graham, Judge.

Proceedings by T. E. Casey against M. E. Casey and others. Judgment for the petitioner, and the defendant named brings error. Affirmed.

Mrs. Mary E. Casey, the widow of W. N. Casey, made application for a year's support. The appraisers appointed made a return setting apart 200 acres of described land and all of the household and kitchen furniture. Caveats were filed by Mrs. Casey, Mrs. Ella Lee Carlton, and Thomas E. Casey, executor of W. N. Casey. The grounds of the latter caveat were that the will of W. N. Casey, which had been probated in solemn form, without objection, contained a provision which by necessary implication was intended to be in lieu of a year's support, and which was so inconsistent with and repugnant to the allowance of a year's support that to allow it would defeat the provisions of the will; that the executor had complied with the provisions of the will, and the widow had elected to take under the will and was thereby barred and estopped from having a year's support set aside. The basis of Mrs. Carlton's caveat was that the land set apart to the widow was specifically devised by the will of W. N. Casey to her, and was not a part of his estate; that the applicant had acquiesced in that disposition of the land in failing to object to the probate of the will; that the land set apart was wild land, yielding no income, and would be a burden and expense to the applicant; and that the residue of the estate was sufficient for the purposes of a year's support. The widow's caveat asserted that the provision made for a year's support was inadequate, and that the appraisers had not considered the circumstances and standing of the family in setting it apart. By agreement of all the parties the case was appealed to the superior court. The executor demurred to the caveats of Mrs. Carlton and the widow, and objected to the allowance of an amendment to the caveat of the widow. These were overruled, and error is assigned upon exceptions pendente lite taken. Upon the trial in the superior court a certified copy of the will of W. N. Casey was introduced as follows:

"Item third: I give, bequeath, and devise to my beloved sister-in-law, Mrs. Ella Lee Carlton, two hundred acres, more or less, of land in Camden county, granted to me by James M. Smith as Governor of Georgia, on the twelfth day of April, 1873, and bounded in said grant on the north by vacant lands, east by lands of J. B. Mizell, south by the St. Mary's river and west by Smith land. * * *

"Item fifth: It is my will and desire and I hereby direct that in the event my beloved wife shall survive me, then in that event she is to have the free use and enjoyment of the home in which I now live in the city of St. Mary's during her life, and be paid from my estate the sum of forty dollars per month.

"Item sixth: It is my will and desire and I hereby direct that no part of the property herein bequeathed to Mrs. Ella Lee Carlton shall be delivered or surrendered to her during the life of my wife, Mary E. Casey, but that the said property shall be held by my executor during the life of my said wife, and the income from same shall constitute a portion of my estate until the death of my wife, when the same shall be surrendered by my executor to the said Mrs. Ella Lee Carlton."

The jury found against the caveat of the executor, and that the return of the appraisers, so far as the land was concerned, should be set aside, and that in lieu thereof $2,210 in cash should be set aside from testator's estate. Motion for a new trial filed by the executor was overruled, and he accepted.

Cowart & Vocolle and S. C. Townsend, all of St. Mary's, and Spencer R. Atkinson, of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error.

Bennet, Twitty & Reese, of Brunswick, and Emmett McElreath, of Kingsland, for defendant in error.

GILBERT, J. [1-7] Save the sixth, none of the headnotes require elaboration. The twelfth ground of the amended motion for a new trial, which is quoted in the sixth headnote, squarely makes the issue whether, on the trial of the caveat to the return of appraisers setting aside a year's support for a widow, the amount set aside may be changed or modified, and a judgment rendered to that effect, or whether the sole issue on such a trial is one of allowance or disallowance of the return of the appraisers. It is insisted by the plaintiff in error that on the trial in the superior court, to which the case had been appealed by consent, the court should have restricted the jury to the simple issue of improving or disapproving the return of the appraisers, that in the event of disapproval "the court should have remanded the case to the court of ordinary for the appraisers to properly perform their function under proper instructions from the court," and that the jury had no right to set aside a year's support if the appraisers' return was void. This contention is based upon the well-recognized rule that in trying an appeal the superior court can deal with no question of merits except such as could have been raised in the inferior court, and can render no final judgment except such as the inferior court had jurisdiction to render. Greer v. Burnam, 69 Ga. 734; Maloy v. Maloy, 134 Ga. 432, 438, 68 S. E. 80, and cases cited. In considering the question raised in this ground of the motion, we proceed on the theory that the superior court can, on appeal, render only such a judgment as might have been rendered in the court of ordinary. The Code of Georgia makes no express provision for such a situation. While not constituting authority affording justification for deciding the question, it may be stated that the practice in the superior courts of this state, so far as we are aware, has been contrary to the contention of the plaintiff in error. We admit that this alone would not be conclusive; for instances of this kind have been completely overturned when the point was properly raised, as in the case of trover suits. It must be admitted also that to permit the court of ordinary or the superior court to modify or change the return of appraisers setting aside a year's support may bring about complications. This would be especially true where the appraisers set apart a tract of land which for some legal reason could not be set aside, and where the ordinary or the superior court were called upon to substitute another tract or money in lieu of the original tract of land. These complications, similarly to the practices above mentioned, furnish only persuasive reasons for accepting the view of the plaintiff in error as the solution of this question. Again, suppose the jury simply found that the allowance was excessive or insufficient, remanding the matter to new appraisers, with no further explanation than that the allowance was excessive or insufficient; this might result in another allowance being disallowed for similar reasons. If it be argued that the jury should say how much too large or how much too small, thus fixing the amount, it would seem to be absurd to send it back to appraisers with instructions to fix the allowance at an amount stated. This would result only in loss of time and increase in expense with no corresponding benefit. This court has, however, passed upon the question in two cases. In one of the cases the question cannot be said to have been directly raised except by the assignment of error on the denial of the motion for new trial complaining that the verdict was contrary to law. In that case, Aiken v. Davidson, 146 Ga. 252, 91 S. E. 34, there was, as in the present case, an appeal by consent from the court of ordinary to the superior court. The appraisers had set apart the sum of $1,000 for the support of the widow. On the trial in the superior court this amount was reduced to $300. A judgment was rendered thereon modifying the return of the appraisers and making the latter sum, by judgment of the court, the amount to be paid to the widow as year's support. A motion for new trial was made, and among the grounds was that above stated, and this court held:

"The verdict finding for the applicant a sum less than that set apart by the appraisers was authorized by the evidence. The refusal to grant a new trial was not erroneous."

The judgment was affirmed, all the Justices concurring. While the precise point now under discussion was not mentioned in the above case otherwise than as stated, the question, it would seem, was necessarily involved and decided. Perhaps counsel in that case did not have specifically in mind the question of law now under discussion, but the ground of the motion for a new trial was so broad and comprehensive as to include it. However this may be, the question seems to have been more directly raised in the case of Winn v. Lunsford, 130 Ga. 436, 61 S. E. 9. The second headnote in that case is as follows:

"Where objections to the return of appraisers to set apart and assign a 12 months' support to the widow and children of a decedent have been filed and sustained, so as to have the effect of amending the return, the return of the appraisers and the judgment may be recorded, and will be effective to set apart as a 12 months' support the property or money included in the report as corrected and amended by the judgment."

From the statement of facts it appears that the appraisers set aside as a year's support for the widow and children $346, constituting the entire estate, as they apparently believed. The widow, and also the children, filed caveats to the return, setting up the fact that small items of personalty had been overlooked by the appraisers. Pending the trial of this issue the caveators reached an agreement among themselves, and on their application the ordinary passed an order in open court reciting that the caveators had come to an agreement and their caveats were withdrawn, and amending the return of the commissioners so as to read as per stated agreement of the parties. It was further ordered and adjudged that "the said commissioners return, as thus amended, be, and the same is hereby, made the judgment of the court." Thereafter an administrator was appointed upon the estate, and he filed suit in the superior court for the purpose of recovering the property to be applied to the expenses of administration and such lawful claims against the intestate as might be presented, the balance, if any, to be distributed to the heirs at law of the decedent. To this petition of the administrator the widow demurred. The court sustained the demurrer and dismissed the case. The administrator excepted. One of the allegations of the petition of the administrator was that the order of the ordinary setting aside the year's support was void, "because the ordinary had no authority to modify or in any wise change the return of the appraisers." It was said in the opinion of Mr. Justice Evans, speaking for his court, viz.:

"There is no provision, in case the objections are sustained, that the matter be again referred to the same or different appraisers. Where the appraisers file their return with the ordinary, they have discharged their full duty. Their commission becomes functus officio. The statute does not contemplate any further action on their part or the appointment of new appraisers. It would therefore seem that the legislative intent must have been that, in case the objections were sustained, the return should be amended conformably to the judgment sustaining the objections, and, as thus amended, should be recorded by the ordinary. As was observed by the present Chief Justice in Moore v. Moore, 126 Ga. 739: 'If, in making their return, the appraisers have acted upon insufficient or misleading information as to the property owned by the decedent at the time of his death or as to any other relevant fact upon which their return may in part be predicated, the law provides a remedy for any person whose legal rights may be injuriously affected thereby, by giving to such person the right to caveat the return; and, upon a trial of the issue thus raised before the ordinary, all the relevant facts may be developed by competent and legal evidence introduced for this purpose, and the return, if incorrect and improper, under the facts disclosed, may be corrected.'"

Under authority of the two last-named cases we hold that the court did not err in the instructions to the jury of which complaint is made as above stated. Our attention has been called to the procedure in cases where dower has been set aside; and it is argued that by analogy the same rule should apply in the case of year's support. While there is some analogy between dower and year's support, the two are quite dissimilar in some respects. In the case of dower the proportionate share due the widow is fixed by law. The only question to be determined by commissioners is the selection, and for this purpose explicit provision is made in Civil Code, § 5257. In year's support the amount is not fixed, relatively or otherwise, except that—

"Among the necessary expenses of administration, and to be preferred before all other debts, except as otherwise specially provided, is the provision for the support of the family * * * to be estimated according to the circumstances and standing of the family previously to the death of the testator or intestate, and keeping in view also the solvency of the estate. If there be a widow, the appraisers shall also set apart, for the use of herself and children, a sufficient amount of the household furniture. The provision set apart for the family shall in no event be less than the sum of one hundred dollars; and if it shall appear upon a just appraisement of the estate that it does not exceed in value the sum of five hundred dollars, it shall be the duty of the appraisers to set apart the whole of said estate for the support and maintenance of such widow and child or children, or, if no surviving widow, to the lawful guardian of the child or children, for their benefit." Civil Code, § 4041.

In that division of the opinion in Winn v. Lunsford, supra, which discussed this issue, it was said:

"When it was adjudged that articles of such value as would not enlarge the estate above this sum were omitted from schedule, the appraisers' return could be corrected so as to include them. When the beneficiaries adjusted their differences by agreeing to a different division from that made by the appraisers, it was of no concern to others whether the ordinary had the right to effectuate such an agreement by amending the return in that respect. The whole estate was theirs, and the particular apportionment affected only the beneficiaries, who are not complaining."

We do not think this reference to the adjustment of the differences between the beneficiaries restricts the ruling to a case of that kind. The agreement between them seems to have had reference to the apportionment between the beneficiaries, and does not limit in any way the ruling in regard to the power of the ordinary to correct and amend the returns and to make the same the judgment of the court.

Judgment affirmed.

HALEY v. ATLANTIC NAT. FIRE INS. CO.
et al. (No. 2092.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 18, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Executors and administrators § 115—Must not do any act inconsistent with interest of estate; when purchasing property individually after foreclosure in part with foreclosure judgments, not entitled to reimbursement for amount paid for judgments.

It is the duty of an executor of an estate not to accept any position or to enter into any relation or to do any act inconsistent with the interest of the estate. Applying this principle, the decree complained of was demanded by the evidence.

Error from Superior Court, Bibb County; H. A. Mathews, Judge.

Proceeding by M. H. Haley, as executrix of Herbert F. Haley, opposed by the Atlantic National Fire Insurance Company and others. Exceptions to an auditor's report were sustained, and the petitioner brings error. Affirmed.

Mrs. Mamie H. Haley, as executrix of the estate of Herbert F. Haley, filed an equitable petition, in which she alleged that the funds of the estate in her hands amounted to $19,927.45; that the claims against the estate held by numerous creditors were largely in excess of the assets in her hands; that the claimants were asserting various priorities; and that she was unable to determine who were the creditors entitled to receive the funds in her hands. She prayed that the creditors named in the petition be required to prove their several claims and set up their respective priorities; that the assets of the estate be marshaled; and that she be given direction. In the schedule of creditors attached to the petition the plaintiff named herself, as an individual, as a creditor of the estate. Thereafter she filed an intervention, as an individual, asserting a claim for $12,382.52 against the estate, alleged to have been paid by her to Isaac Block out of her individual funds, in satisfaction of the balance due on three large judgments in favor of Block and against Herbert F. Haley. The case was referred to an auditor for a report on all issues of both law and fact. One of the creditors of Herbert F. Haley's estate, the Atlantic National Fire Insurance Company, hereinafter called the company, resisted Mrs. Haley's claim, but the auditor's findings of law and of fact were favorable to Mrs. Haley. To the report of the auditor the company filed its exceptions both of law and of fact; and the exceptions were approved by the judge. Upon the trial of the exceptions of fact the court directed a verdict sustaining each of the exceptions, and rendered a decree sustaining the exceptions of law. Mrs. Haley excepted.

P. F. Brock, of Macon, for plaintiff in error.

Miller & Jones, P. F. Brock, Ryals & Anderson, R. O. Jordan, Chas. H. Garrett, Ellis & Glawson, and T. S. Felder, all of Macon, for defendants in error.

GEORGE, J. (after stating the facts as above). Herbert F. Haley, during his lifetime, borrowed $10,000 on his home place on Mulberry street in the city of Macon, $22,500 on the Findley foundry property, and $25,000 on the Lawton-Jordan property, all from Isaac Block. The loan on the Lawton-Jordan property was subsequently reduced to $20,000. Haley failed to pay these loans, and Block instituted proceedings to foreclose them. Haley interposed various objections to the foreclosure proceedings, but Block finally obtained judgments. Further litigation ensued; and when Block advertised the properties for sale Haley interposed affidavits of illegality. Under agreement, one of the affidavits of illegality was withdrawn; and the Mulberry street place, or home place, was sold in May, 1917, and Block became the purchaser of this property. Block entered into an agreement with the Rutherford Investment Company, a corporation, in which Haley was interested and of which he was president, by the terms of which the investment company was to be permitted to redeem the Mulberry street property upon conditions stated. The consideration of this agreement, or a part thereof, was a transfer of certain city lots, parts of the Rutherford place, to Block. At the same time a rent contract was made by Block with Haley, by the terms of which Haley agreed to pay certain rent for the Mulberry street property. One thousand dollars was paid to Block on August 1, 1917, and was credited on the fl. fa.; but other conditions of the agreement were not carried out.

In October, 1917, Block made a new agreement with the Rutherford Investment Company, Herbert F. Haley, Incorporated, and Herbert F. Haley, individually. In substance the agreement recited the terms of the previous agreement and the desire that further time be given on some of the conditions therein named; that judgments had been obtained in favor of Block against Haley on the Findley foundry loan and the Lawton-Jordan loan, and that affidavits of illegality had been filed to said judgments; that in consideration of the withdrawal of the affidavits of illegality Block agreed to give further time to redeem the Mulberry street property, and also agreed not to sell the Findley foundry and Lawton-Jordan properties until the first Tuesday in January, 1918; and that in the event certain payments were made before that time further indulgence should be granted to Haley. The terms of this agreement were not carried out; and on the first Tuesday in January, 1918, the Findley foundry property and the Lawton-Jordan properties were sold by the sheriff, and were purchased by Block for $5,000 each. On the date of the sale Block entered into another agreement with Haley and the two corporations named, which agreement referred to the previous agreements, and recited that Haley had failed to comply with the terms thereof, and that in consequence the Findley foundry and Lawton-Jordan properties had been sold, but gave to Haley the privilege of redeeming these properties upon named conditions to be performed within 20 days thereafter. At the expiration of the 20 days the agreement was extended 10 days. On the 10th day after the extension Block's attorney communicated with Haley, and reminded him that his time was about to expire, and that he would be given until midnight to comply with the conditions named in the agreement. Haley promised to comply, but failed to do so. He died the next day. Mrs. Haley qualified as executrix of her husband's will, and her representatives thereafter advised Block's attorney that they had found the agreements hereinbefore referred to among the papers of Haley, and in effect asked that Mrs. Haley be substituted for Mr. Haley in the agreements. Block's attorney and Mrs. Haley's representatives entered into negotiations to that end. In the meantime Block, through his attorney, sold the Mulberry street property at a larger sum than Mrs. Haley was willing to pay for it; and it was agreed that this excess should be credited on the two remaining fl. fas., Mrs. Haley having theretofore advised Block that she would pay the indebtedness due him and take over the properties.

At this point there is some conflict in the evidence. Mrs. Haley contended that an agreed sum was to be paid and was paid as the purchase price of the Findley foundry and the Lawton-Jordan and Rutherford properties, and a separate sum for the judgments against Haley. It is not disputed that Block (the negotiations on his part having been conducted entirely by his attorney) insisted upon the payment of the full balance due upon the judgments after the amount realized from the sale of the Mulberry street property had been credited thereon. In making the calculation it is also undisputed that payments made by Haley during his lifetime on account of his indebtedness, and the rents paid by him for the dwelling house under the first agreement mentioned above, were credited on the remaining fl. fas. It also appears that nothing was charged by way of purchase price except the principal, interest, attorney's fees and cost, taxes, and insurance paid by Block on account of said properties, and certain incidental expenses incurred by him in protecting or defending his claims upon said properties. The amount finally agreed upon was $48,382.50. Block refused to convey the real estate for any sum which would leave an unpaid balance on the fl. fas.; that is to say, Block insisted upon the payment of the full balance due on the fl. fas., plus certain additional items above mentioned, as a condition precedent to a transfer of the properties or the fl. fas. Mrs. Haley insisted, however, that she was unwilling to pay more than $36,000 for the land, and that she in fact paid $36,000 for the Findley foundry property, the Lawton-Jordan property, and the Rutherford lots; and that the balance, to wit, $12,383.52, was paid for the transfer of the judgments. It is, however, not disputed that the balance of $12,383.52 was to be paid for these judgments, because such amount represented the unpaid balance on the judgments after crediting the judgments with the purchase price of the real estate. Two separate checks were given by Mrs. Haley to Block, one for $38,000 and one for $12,383.52. The checks were accepted and the deeds to the property from Block to Mrs. Haley were executed and delivered, and the fi. fas. transferred to her.

Mrs. Haley contends that Herbert F. Haley, at the time of his death, had no right whatever, by option to purchase or otherwise, in the real estate conveyed to her by Block. On the other hand, the company (the defendant in error) contends that it was not necessary for the estate of Herbert F. Haley to have an enforceable interest in the properties in order to prevent Mrs. Haley from purchasing them at less than the judgment debts, under the admitted facts. This is the controlling question; and in the view we take of the matter it is unnecessary to rule upon the questions of pleading and practice presented by the record.

The evidence establishes without dispute that Block was willing to surrender the real estate and the judgments upon the payment of the judgment debts, including certain items mentioned above, even though he had purchased the properties at foreclosure sale, and even though the right of Haley or the corporation to redeem the property or any part of it had expired. It is likewise undisputed that Block refused to make a conveyance of the properties, or any of them, unless and until he received the full amount due upon the judgments. It appears that it was immaterial to him whether a portion of the money due him should be considered as the purchase price of the real estate and a portion as the purchase price of the fi. fas. It is admitted, however, that the amount to be paid for the land, accepting Mrs. Haley's contention as true, was to be credited upon the fi. fas., and that the balance then remaining was to be paid to Block, and that in consideration of the full payment of the balance upon the judgments both the real estate and the judgments were to be transferred. Although no legal obligation rested upon Mrs. Haley, as executrix, to redeem the property for the benefit of the estate, and although the estate had no right to redeem which it could enforce in law or in equity, in effect Block agreed to the redemption of the property by the payment of the amount due him on the judgments. He carried out the agreement. Mrs. Haley must be presumed to have known that the estate had a sum of money in hand, or which would come into her hands as executrix. Accepting Mrs. Haley's version of the transaction as true, when she became the purchaser of the real estate from Block she put herself as an individual in a position that was in conflict with the proper discharge of her duties as executrix. Upon the terms and conditions named by Block the executrix of Haley's estate, as an individual, was not at liberty to purchase the property and claim the right to be reimbursed out of the funds of the estate for the money paid for the judgments. It is obvious that it was to her interest as an individual to buy the real estate for as low a price as possible. If she had been willing to pay $48,383.50 for the real estate, the judgments would have been fully paid under Block's agreement. It is manifest, therefore, that under the terms and conditions named by Block the interest of the estate demanded that the value of the lands be placed as high as possible, while Mrs. Haley's interest demanded that she buy the land for as small a price as possible, in order that she might have the largest possible claim against the estate for reimbursement as transferee of the fi. fas. We do not assert that Mrs. Haley acted in bad faith. Under the authorities, the question of good faith, in such circumstances, is immaterial. It may be that the purchase by Mrs. Haley was in fact advantageous to the estate. This argument has been often advanced, and as often rejected. The broad rule of equity, applicable alike to agents, partners, guardians, executors, administrators, and directors, and managing officers of corporations, is that it is the duty of a trustee not to accept any position or to enter into any relation or to do any act inconsistent with the interest of the beneficiary. 2 Pomeroy's Equity, 655, § 1077. See Fleming v. Foran, 12 Ga. 594; Michoud v. Girod, 4 How. 503, 11 L. Ed. 1076; Nivens v. Nivens, 133 Fed. 39, 66 C. C. A. 145; Grumley v. Webb, 44 Mo. 444, 100 Am. Dec. 306; Davis v. Hamlin, 108 Ill. 39, 48 Am. Rep. 541; Trice v. Comstock, 121 Fed. 620, 57 O. C. A. 646, 61 L. R. A. 176; Fulton v. Whitney, 66 N. Y. 548. We think the general principle is applicable and controlling here. Although the estate represented by Mrs. Haley had no enforceable right under the contract with Block, she could not as an individual accept the offer of Block and appropriate the benefits of his offer to her own use, to the possible injury of the estate. The controlling fact is that the agreement was made by Block, and that he did actually carry out the agreement in all substantial particulars. Whether the estate represented by Mrs. Haley was in position to accept the offer of Block is likewise immaterial.

Mrs. Haley cannot claim the balance due upon the fi. fas., although such balance was actually paid by her out of her own funds, so long as she withholds from the estate the advantage obtained by her in the transaction by which the outstanding claim was acquired. If she had offered to surrender to the court to be administered for the benefit of the estate, the land that she acquired in the transaction, her right to be reimbursed by the estate for her expenditures in acquiring said land and judgments could not have been questioned.

It follows from what we have said that the decree rendered by the court was right, irrespective of the correctness of the court's ruling upon the questions of pleading and practice presented by the record.

UPSHAW BROS. v. STEPHENS.
(No. 11555.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2. Feb. 15, 1921.)

(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

1. Appeal and error \Leftrightarrow 1050(2)—Evidence as to collateral issue held not prejudicial.

Admission of evidence as to fact of levy on cotton held to relate only to a collateral issue in the case, and hence not prejudicial if erroneously admitted.

2. Appeal and error \Leftrightarrow 728(2)—Assignment of error to documentary evidence, without giving contents, incomplete.

Assignment of error, excepting to certain documentary evidence described as cotton bills only, without giving the contents of the bills or their substance, is incomplete, and cannot be considered.

3. Appeal and error \Leftrightarrow 499(3)—Admission of evidence not reviewable, where objection does not appear.

An assignment of error, excepting to admission in evidence of a certain account book kept by the plaintiff, cannot be considered, where it does not appear what objection, if any, was made to its admission when it was offered in evidence.

4. Appeal and error \Leftrightarrow 1068(1)—No complaint of charge relating to set-off, where there was no recovery.

Jury not having found a verdict for defendant's set-off or counterclaim, any error in the charge relating to defendant's right to recover such set-off or counterclaim was harmless to the plaintiff.

5. Trial \Leftrightarrow 256(6)—Charge held not erroneous, in absence of special requested charge.

Charge of court in action to foreclose landlord's lien for guano furnished, not stating the issue so that the jury could understand exactly what was their duty, and what issues they really were trying, is not error, in absence of special request to charge.

6. Trial \Leftrightarrow 233(1)—Instruction held not erroneous in failing to state issue.

A charge, "You look to the papers and see what the amount is, if I don't correctly quote it; that is the issue, and it is a pure and simple issue of fact which you are to determine," held not erroneous, in that it did not state any issue to the jury.

Error from Superior Court, Douglas County; F. A. Irwin, Judge.

Action by Uphaw Bros. against Robert Stephens. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

The fourth ground of the amendment to the motion for new trial was as follows:

Because the court did not sustain the objections of J. H. McLarty, counsel for the plaintiff, to objections made of L. O. Uphaw, a witness sworn for the plaintiff: "Q. What did you do then? A. We levied on some—referring to crop. He had some cotton there and it was levied on by some other party." Mr. Merritt objected and said: "The levy would be the best evidence." The Court: "Just state what they did." Addressing plaintiff's counsel, the court stated: "Have you those liens?" Mr. McLarty says: "I have mine." It is insisted that the court erred in not allowing L. O. Uphaw, witness for the plaintiff, to explain about the levy, because there was no dispute about it, and Uphaw would have shown that the plaintiff got nothing on account of the cotton that was levied on, when taken in connection with his other evidence in the record in the case.

The charge relating to defendant's right to set-off or counterclaim was as follows:

"Uphaw Bros. foreclosed a landlord's lien for guano furnished to make a crop, and levied upon certain property of Robert Stephens, and he filed a counter affidavit, denying that he owed the amount set out in the lien, or any part of it, and further claims, as set out in the papers, judgment against them, says he has overpaid them in this amount, and that makes the issue that you are to try in this case. The plaintiff claims 130 and some odd dollars due and foreclosed their lien for that amount. The defendant filed a counter affidavit, and denied owing any part of that amount, and in addition sets up the claim that the plaintiffs are indebted to him, I believe, in the amount of $55. You look to the papers and see what the amount is, if I don't quote it correctly; and that is the issue, and it is a pure simple issue of facts that you are to determine. You look to the papers that have been introduced before you, all the books that have been introduced, and the witnesses that have been examined here on this stand, and see what the truth of this transaction is. You see the witnesses on the stand, hear their manner of testifying, and it is left with the jury to say what the truth is."

It was insisted by appellant that the foregoing charge of the court was error, on the ground that it did not state the issue before the jury clearly, so that the jury could understand exactly what was their duty, and what issues they really were trying, and appellant claimed that the court erred further in this charge in saying to the jury:

"You look to the papers and see what the amount is, if I don't correctly quote it; that is the issue and it is a pure and simple issue of facts which you are to determine"

—on the ground that this is not stating any particular issues to the jury, and it was error in not stating it.—Statement by editor.

J. H. McLarty, of Douglasville, L. Z. Dorsett, of Carrollton, and James & Bedgood, of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error.

D. S. Strickland and Astor Merritt, both of Douglasville, for defendant in error.

STEPHENS, J. [1] 1. The evidence as to the fact of levy, the admission of which is objected to in the fourth ground of the amendment to the motion for a new trial, relates only to a collateral issue in the case, and, even if erroneously admitted, could in no way have operated to prejudice the plaintiff's case before the jury.

[2] 2. The fifth assignment of error, excepting to certain documentary evidence described as cotton bills only, without giving the contents of the bills or their substance, is incomplete and cannot be considered.

[3] 3. The sixth assignment of error, excepting to the admission in evidence of a certain account book kept by the plaintiff, cannot be considered, because it does not appear what objection, if any, was made to its admission when it was offered in evidence.

[4] 4. The jury not having found a verdict for the set-off or counterclaim of the defendant, any error in the charge relating to the defendant's right to recover such set-off or counterclaim was harmless to the plaintiff.

[5, 6] 5. The charge of the court fairly submitted the issues to the jury, and, in the absence of any special request to charge, was not subject to any of the exceptions urged thereto.

6. The evidence supports the verdict for the defendant which has the approval of the trial judge, and, no error of law appearing, the plaintiff's motion for a new trial was properly overruled.

Judgment affirmed.

KAHN v. AMERICAN RAILWAY EXPRESS CO. (No. 4199.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia. Feb. 22, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Commerce §88 — Questions as to commerce regulations determinable exclusively by federal law.

Questions pertaining to the validity, construction, and operation of an interstate commerce regulation prescribed or approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission, under the authority conferred upon it by the Carmack Amendment of the Hepburn Act (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 8604a, 8604aa), passed by the Congress of the United States, are determinable exclusively by federal law.

2. Carriers §159(2) — Contract requiring claim for loss to be made within four months after reasonable time for delivery held valid.

As tested by such law, a clause in a contract of affreightment between an express company and a shipper, respecting an interstate shipment, and providing that, in case of the failure of the carrier to make delivery, a claim for loss, damage, or injury must be made in writing to the originating or delivering carrier, within four months after a reasonable time for delivery has elapsed, as a condition precedent to right of recovery, is valid.

3. Carriers §159(2) — Requirement of claim for loss within four months held applicable to loss of portion of goods by theft.

The limitation prescribed in such clause is applicable to a claim for the loss of a portion of a package of goods, due to abstraction and theft thereof in transit, and consequent failure to deliver it.

4. Carriers §159(2) — Nondiscovery of loss by shipper within time for making claim held not to extend time thereof.

In the absence of conduct on the part of the carrier working hindrance, obstruction, or concealment of such loss, nondiscovery thereof by the shipper within the period of the limitation does not exclude the claim from the operation of the limitation, nor extend the time thereof.

5. Carriers §166 — Reasonableness of time for delivery as determining time for making claim held question of law.

If, upon the question of reasonableness of "time for delivery" under such contract, the facts are such as afford no ground for two different and intelligent opinions respecting it, the court may determine it as one of law.

6. Carriers \Rightarrow 159(3) — Carrier held not to have waived limitation of time for making claim for loss.

Although a carrier may waive the benefit of such a limitation by express agreement or by inconsistent conduct, a waiver thereof cannot be predicated upon conduct which neither admits liability nor denies it, upon receipt of verbal notice of the loss, after expiration of the period of limitation, and later invokes protection of the limitation, upon disclosure of actuality of the loss and the time and circumstances thereof.

Error to Circuit Court, Mercer County.

Action by E. Kahn against the American Railway Express Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Russell S. Ritz, of Bluefield, for plaintiff in error.

McClagherty & Richardson, of Bluefield, for defendant in error.

POFFENBARGER, J. The judgment complained of on this writ of error was rendered in favor of the defendant, on a demurrer to the plaintiff's evidence, in an action of assumpsit against a common carrier engaged in interstate transportation, for the value of goods delivered to it at Bluefield, W. Va., for carriage to the city of New York and delivery there, and not delivered, but, on the contrary, lost by the carrier.

The goods in question were part of a consignment of furs, from the plaintiff to the firm of Kruskal & Kruskal of New York, invoiced at the sum of $1,422.50. The package was delivered to the consignee within three days, but it contained goods of the value of only $882.50. The balance, amounting to $540 in value, had been abstracted and stolen therefrom. The loss was not discovered, however, until about six months had elapsed from the date of the shipment. The furs were part of a lot that had been shipped to the plaintiff on consignment, with right of return of such portions thereof as should not be desired or could not be sold. Those in question were returned for credit on plaintiff's account with Kruskal & Kruskal and they were credited as received, but receipt thereof was not acknowledged. The shipment was made October 5, 1918, and settlement was not made until about April 1, 1919. In the checking up at about that date, the shortage and loss were discovered and a demand made upon the carrier for compensation for the loss, through its local manager at Bluefield, very soon afterward. The agent neither admitted nor denied the validity of the claim. He advised the claimant to ascertain all the facts relating to the matter and obtain an affidavit from the consignees. Having done so, he again applied to the agent, who denied liability, on the ground that the claim had not been asserted or made within the time stipulated in the contract of affreightment, four months after the lapse of a reasonable time for delivery. Avoidance of the effect of this limitation of right of recovery is attempted on the grounds of invalidity thereof, inapplicability thereof to the demand in question, if valid, and waiver thereof, if valid and applicable.

The clause in question, purporting to limit liability, reads as follows:

"Except where the loss, damage, or injury complained of is due to delay or damage while being loaded or unloaded, or damage in transit by carelessness or negligence, as conditions precedent to recovery, claims must be made in writing to the originating or delivering carrier within four months after delivery of the property, or, in case of failure to make delivery, then within four months after a reasonable time for delivery has elapsed."

[1] The shipment having been an interstate one, the issues as to the validity and applicability of the clause in question depend altogether upon the law as declared by the federal courts. The Carmack Amendment of the Hepburn Act (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 8604a, 8604aa) has withdrawn all such questions arising in interstate transportation from the field of state law and legislation. Robinson v. B. & O. R. Co., 64 W. Va. 406, 63 S. E. 323; Mo., Kan. & Tex. Ry. Co. v. Harriman, 227 U. S. 665, 33 Sup. Ct. 462, 57 L. Ed. 700; Adams Express Co. v. Croninger, 226 U. S. 491, 33 Sup. Ct. 148, 57 L. Ed. 314, 44 L. R. A. (N. S.) 257; Mich. Cent. R. Co. v. Vreeland, 227 U. S. 59, 33 Sup. Ct. 192, 57 L. Ed. 417, Ann. Cas. 1914C, 176; Ga., Fla. & Ala. Ry. Co. v. Blish Milling Co., 241 U. S. 190, 36 Sup. Ct. 541, 60 L. Ed. 948.

[2] There can be no debatable question about the validity of the stipulation under federal law, whatever it might be under state law. It is not a limitation against liability for negligence or other wrongful conduct. Admitting liability, it requires only reasonable diligence on the part of the claimant in the assertion thereof. Common carriage is a public function and, as such, it is regulated by statute. In the statute, power is conferred upon a commission to determine what are reasonable regulations, and that commission has approved this time limitation upon the right to assert claims for losses. The reasonableness and legal soundness of such a limitation had been affirmed before such authority was conferred upon the Interstate Commerce Commission Express Co. v. Caldwell, 21 Wall. 264, 22 L. Ed. 556. Similar regulations have been judicially approved and upheld since. Mo., Kan. & Tex. Ry. Co. v. Harriman, 227 U. S. 665, 33 Sup.

Ct. 397, 57 L. Ed. 690; Ga., Fla. & Ala. Ry. Co. v. Blish Milling Co., 241 U. S. 190, 36 Sup. Ct. 541, 60 L. Ed. 948.

[3] The circumstances and character of the loss do not render it exceptional and the limitation inapplicable. There can be no difference in principle, as regards the duty to exercise diligence, between the loss of an entire package of goods and a part of a package, nor between loss by theft and loss in some other way, resulting in nondelivery. The terms are general and cover all instances of failure to deliver. The terms "failure to make delivery" have been authoritatively defined as being "fully adequate in their literal and natural meaning to cover all cases where the delivery has not been made as required," Mr. Justice Hughes, in Ga., Fla. & Ala. Ry. Co. v. Blish Milling Co., cited.

[4] Nor can the period of limitation be extended for lack of discovery of the loss. Negligence and unnecessary delay in the assertion of claims for losses in transportation are the evils against which the limitation provides. It allows reasonable time for discovery of the loss and preparation of the claim, and the claimant must avail himself of it. Otherwise, the regulation would be useless and ineffective. Inability to discover the loss in time is not claimed. That it could have been discovered immediately after the happening thereof is obvious. A letter, or telegraphic or telephonic message, of inquiry would have disclosed it in ample time.

[5] Whether nearly 60 days is "a reasonable time for delivery," in transportation by express-carrying trains between Bluefield and New York, is a question about which there cannot be the slightest doubt. The package was delivered within three days. That a period of one or two months suffices is so clearly manifest as to leave no room for two different and intelligent opinions. In all such cases, the function of the jury may be dispensed with and the question disposed of by the court as one of law. Schoonover v. B. & O. Ry. Co., 69 W. Va. 560, 73 S. E. 266, L. R. A. 1917F, 1, Ann. Cas. 1913B, 964; Hysell v. Central City, 68 W. Va. 769, 70 S. E. 767. Reasonableness of time for performance of an act of any kind is governed by the general rule as to the functions of court and jury. The question is often one for the court. Detroit Steel Products Co. v. Daily Telegraph Printing Co., 102 S. E. 139; Craft v. Isham, 13 Conn. 28; Manufacturing Co. v. Brower, 49 N. C. 429.

[6] The undisputed facts relied upon as constituting waiver by the defendant are manifestly insufficient. Its local agent neither admitted nor denied liability at any time before the rejection of the claim for delay in presentation, about a month after the discovery of the loss. When the matter was brought to his attention, he did no more than ask for information and evidence as to actuality of the loss and its circumstances. When the information was obtained, it revealed inexcusable delay in assertion, and he rejected the claim on that ground. There is no evidence of any promise at any time to adjust or pay the claim, nor of any rejection of the claim on any ground other than delay in assertion. The limitation was invoked and relied upon. There are numerous instances in which the benefit of such limitations has been waived by conduct. Michie, Carriers, § 1453, citing many decisions. In this case, however, there is no proof of any fact that can be deemed to have wrought a waiver.

For the reasons stated, the judgment will be affirmed.

DAY et al. v. KRAMER. (No. 4073.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Feb. 22, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Frauds, statute of § 118(3)—Letters by defendant in suit for specific performance held sufficient compliance with statute.

In a suit for specific performance in which the statute of frauds was pleaded and relied on, the following letter of the defendant, viewed in connection with the prior and subsequent letters of plaintiff and the circumstances and condition of the parties, was sufficient to constitute a memorandum in writing by the defendant to satisfy the statute of frauds:

"Davis, W. Va., April 10, 1919.

"Mr. Wheeler Day, Dear Sir: Your letter of April 7, 1919, received and contents noted. Make the deed for the lot to me and I will take the house and also the vacant lot, so you can make both of the deeds to me. I will collect the rent for the house when your month is up for which he paid you.

"Resp. yours, J. F. Kramer.

"P. S.: If you have not had the release of the deed of trust put on record, kindly bring it with you so that it can be recorded in order to make the title clear on the house and 1/2 lot."

Appeal from Circuit Court, Tucker County.

Suit by Wheeler Day and another against J. F. Kramer. Decree for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. K. Pritt, of Parsons, for appellant.

D. E. Cuppett, of Thomas, for appellees.

MILLER, J. Specific performance of a contract for the sale and purchase of a house and two lots in the town of Davis was decreed in favor of vendors against vendee. The present appeal by the vendee seeks to reverse the decree below.

The answer admits a verbal contract substantially as alleged in plaintiffs' bill, except that by its terms the sale was to be conditioned on plaintiffs making and delivering a deed for the property on or about April 13, 1919, which the answer alleges plaintiffs failed to do.

On the question of fact as to whether or not the sale and purchase was so conditioned, the decree below on conflicting evidence was against the pretensions of defendant, and we think the finding of the circuit court thereon was clearly right. The subsequent letters of defendant, admitting a contract, and his conduct in collecting the rent from the tenant before the deed tendered, are corroborative of the evidence of the plaintiffs, and these with the evidence of other witnesses negative any such condition.

But while admitting the verbal contract, defendant pleaded and relied on the statute of frauds; and to overcome this defense plaintiffs pleaded in the bill and introduced in evidence two letters, one written by Wheeler Day on behalf of himself and his sister, Maggie Day, on April 7, 1919; the other defendant's reply thereto, dated April 10, 1919; as follows:

"Petersburg, W. Va., April 7, 1919.

"Mr. J. F. Kramer,

"Dear Sir: I have been looking for a letter from you but have failed to hear from you, and I want to know what you want to do about the lot. I will have the deed made for the house and $\frac{1}{2}$ lot and bring it out with me when I come out. But I do not expect I will get out before the last of this month. The cold spell has put us back with our work. Please let me hear from you at once.

"Wheeler Day."

To which Kramer replied as follows:

"Davis, W. Va., April 10, 1919.

"Mr. Wheeler Day,

"Dear Sir: Your letter of April 7, 1919, received and contents noted. Make the deed for the lot to me and I will take the house and also the vacant lot, so you can make both of the deeds to me. I will collect the rent for the house when your month is up for which he paid you.

"Resp. yours, J. F. Kramer.

"P. S.: If you have not had the release of the deed of trust put on record, kindly bring it with you so that it can be recorded in order to make the title clear on the house and $\frac{1}{2}$ lot."

Kramer's reply was not mailed at Davis until 4 p. m., April 11, 1919. Wheeler Day replied to Kramer by letter dated at Petersburg, W. Va., May 5, 1919, as follows:

"I have made the deeds for both properties and have them in my possession now and will bring them out in a few days, the rent on the property will be yours from the 13th day of April, the rent will be due the 13th of May, so you take the property in your charge.

"Yours respectfully, Wheeler Day."

It seems to us quite evident from Kramer's reply to Day that there was no condition in the contract as originally made for delivery of a deed on a specified day. Kramer makes no mention of such condition in his letter. He took charge of the property, at least to the extent of collecting rent from the tenant, and gave his receipt for the money, on April 21, 1919, eight days after the day on which he says the deed was to have been delivered. He told the tenant he had bought the property; and the record shows that he had told others substantially the same thing.

The pivotal question in the case is: Does Kramer's letter of April 10, 1919, read in connection with the letters from Day to him, introduced in evidence, constitute such a sufficient promise, contract, agreement, representation, assurance, or ratification, or a memorandum or note thereof in writing, as to relieve the contract from the interdiction of the statute of frauds?

As this statute has been previously interpreted by this court, we think Kramer's letter satisfies the statute. At the time of the contract he lived in Davis, W. Va., where the property sold was situated. Plaintiffs resided at Petersburg, W. Va. It is not shown that they had any other property located in the town of Davis. It was therefore perfectly easy to fit the contract evidenced by his letter to the subject matter; and this is sufficient to satisfy the statute, which is at most but a rule of evidence and not of substantive law. In the case of White v. Core, 20 W. Va. 272, 274, this court decided that the following memorandum was sufficient to satisfy the statute:

"Received of William White for Samuel White, one hundred dollars, on land purchased of Core; and said Core agrees to divide the said land, and let the said Samuel White have the lower half of said land for nine hundred dollars, this June 13, 1876. W. G. H. Core."

In that case the contract was specifically executed at the suit of White against Core. And in the more recent case of Crotty v. Effier, 60 W. Va. 258, 54 S. E. 345, 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 263, a similar receipt or memorandum was held to be sufficient to satisfy the statute in a suit for specific performance.

It is argued that specific performance is not a matter of right, but lies in the discretion of the court. This is true, but as we have decided lastly at the present term, in the case of Collins v. Thomas, 105 S. E. 897, it is equally true that where the conditions of the contract have been complied with, a court of equity can not arbitrarily refuse to give specific performance any more than a court of law can withhold its judgment for damages for a breach thereof.

Our conclusion, therefore, is to affirm the decree.

WARDEN v. HINES, Director General of Railroads. (No. 4149.)(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Feb. 22, 1921.)(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Railroads \Rightarrow 419(6)—Not liable for killing cow on railroad crossing, where collision inevitable.

The killing of a cow by a motor, hauling a train of loaded cars, where it is shown by positive evidence that the cow came from behind a plank fence, where she was hid from the view of the motorman, and onto the railroad crossing about 30 feet before the rapidly moving train, making it impossible to prevent the killing, although the service brakes were immediately set, will not justify a verdict and judgment against the railroad company for negligence although it appeared from the evidence that the crossing could have been seen by the motorman, by aid of the headlight, for a distance of 150 yards or more.

2. Railroads \Rightarrow 415(5)—Stock law does not relieve railroad from duty of keeping reasonable lookout.

Section 3, c. 59, Acts 1919, making it unlawful for horses, cattle, etc., to run at large on a railroad right of way, and fixing a penalty on the owner if injury to property results therefrom, does not relieve a railroad company from the duty of keeping a reasonable lookout for such animals upon its tracks.

Error to Circuit Court, Mercer County.

Action by W. L. Warden against Walker D. Hines, Director General of Railroads. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed and remanded.

Reynolds & Reynolds, of Princeton, for plaintiff in error.

John Kee, of Bluefield, for defendant in error.

LIVELY, J. This writ of error and superseas brings up for review a judgment of the circuit court of Mercer county, rendered against plaintiff in error on June 4, 1920.

W. L. Warden owned two milch cows and on the evening of October 6, 1919, drove them in his cowpen at Nemours in Mercer county, and next morning, finding the cows had gone out of the gate, some one having carelessly left it open, tracked them down toward the railroad track of the Norfolk & Western Railway Company, a distance of about 500 yards. One of the cows had gone to the railroad crossing, where she had been struck by a west-bound railroad train, and she was found about 100 yards west of the crossing. The other cow had crossed the railroad right of way fence, which had been partially torn down, some distance east of the crossing, walked a short distance toward the crossing, and went upon the track about 30 feet east of the crossing, where she had been struck by a railroad train and dragged about 20 yards beyond the crossing. On each side of the railroad a board fence four or 5 feet high extended from the right of way wire fence and immediately east of the county road to a cattle guard at or near the edge of the public crossing. From the crossing to the eastward the railroad tracks curved to the left, and there is some conflict as to the degree of curve, some of the witnesses saying it was a slight curve, and others saying it was a nine degree curve. There was nothing to obstruct the view from this board fence at the crossing for a distance of about 150 yards eastward. After showing these facts, and the value of the cows killed, which he placed at $125 each, the plaintiff below rested his case.

[1] The engineer or motorman was examined, who testified that he was on a west-bound train as motorman on the night of October 6, 1919, which passed over this crossing at 5:30 in the morning. He was hauling about 25 or 30 loaded cars, was at his post in front of the motor, and was leaning out of the window, watching the track ahead. He said:

"I went around something like a nine degree curve, and I struck this cow on the road crossing, but I didn't see this cow until I got nearly on her, because she come out from the fence and walked on the railroad crossing just as soon as I got about a car length from her, and I drug her about 150 yards west."

In answer to a question propounded by the judge, asking where the cow was when he first saw her, he replied:

"She walked out from the fence; there is a fence on each side of the cattle guard."

His evidence, in substance, was that he was about a car length from the cow when he saw her walk on the track, that he immediately applied the service brake; that it was impossible for him to stop the train in that distance; that he never saw but one cow there; that he did not kill but one cow; that he did not hit a cow east of the crossing; and that he had had 16 years' experience as an engineer.

The motorman was the only one who saw the accident. The fireman was attending to his duties, looking over the machinery of the electric motor, and saw nothing of the cows, and did not know one was killed until the train stopped, and the cow was removed from the pilot.

There was considerable conflict as to the degree of the curve east of the crossing, and as to how far the headlight would lighten the track ahead of the motor. Several witnesses testified that for about 150 yards east of the crossing, from a signal (which they called "the paddle") the headlight would light the track to the crossing. The engineer or motorman at first said the headlight would light the track ahead of his motor about 30 feet, but afterwards, just before the case was submitted to the jury, upon his request, and by permission of the court, he corrected his testimony by saying that the headlight would light up the track from 200 to 250 feet; that he had made a mistake when on the stand, had become confused, and, having stated the distance of 30 feet, he concluded to "stick to it," until, after having time to "think it over," he desired to make the correction.

We do not think it is very material to this case as to whether the curve was slight or great, or whether the headlight shone on the track for a greater or less distance. If it had been bright daylight and on a straight track, it does not appear that the accident could have been avoided. The only cow that was seen was the one which came out from behind the board fence and walked on the track immediately in front of the motor. There is no evidence that this train killed the cow which was struck east of the crossing. If so, it was not known to the train crew, and the engineer testified he was at his post and watching the track ahead. It is to be presumed that other trains passed that way. The only evidence we have is that both cows were in the cow lot that night, and their tracks led to the railroad, but whether they went singly or together does not appear. Whether they were on the track together and killed by the same train is only an inference. They were found dead after daylight, but whether killed at one time or at different times is very uncertain. Besides, it is shown by the plaintiff that he tracked the cow which had wandered through the right of way wire fence east of the crossing, and she was struck where she had come onto the track. There was nothing to show that she had been standing or running on the track. As the record does not disclose whether or not she came suddenly on the track before this train, or what train killed her, can we say that she was negligently killed? The burden of proof is on the plaintiff. Underwood v. Railway Co., 78 W. Va. 409, 89 S. E. 2; Harvey Coal & Coke Co. v. C. & O. Ry. Co., 69 W. Va. 228, 71 S. E. 178; Layne v. Ohio River R. R. Co., 35 W. Va. 438, 14 S. E. 123. There is no material disagreement about the controlling facts concerning the cow which was struck as she came on the crossing. The night was dark, the cow was first seen when about a car length from the motor; she came out from behind a board fence 4 or 5 feet high, and it was impossible to stop the heavily loaded train in that distance. No one disputes this evidence. The physical facts do not contradict it; on the contrary, they corroborate. If the accident did not so occur, as shown by this witness, can we go into the realm of fancy or speculation and say how it occurred? Is there any tangible evidence on which we can say that this engineer was negligent or that he wantonly killed this cow? He was at his post of duty and watching the track ahead. Serious railroad wrecks have occurred and human lives have been lost by such accidents, and we must credit the engineer with some instinct of self-preservation, as well as a consideration for the preservation of the lives of his train crew. But of course this is not controlling on the question of negligence, but it is entitled to some weight. A reckless disregard for human life should not be presumed. In Carper v. Traction Co., 78 W. Va. 282, 88 S. E. 843, this court sustained a demurrer to the evidence under circumstances and facts somewhat similar to those here. The steer in that case either got up from lying on the right of way, or came over the top of the fill, about 50 feet from the car and ran about the same distance, when it attempted to cross the track. Expert witnesses testified that at a point in the curve a distance 350 or 400 feet from where the steer appeared to the motorman he could have seen it if he had been on the lookout. Christian v. Railway Co., 78 W. Va. 379, 89 S. E. 17, is a case in point. The engineer was on the lookout, and the train going around a curve, when he observed something in the bushes near the place where the two horses were killed. He did not see the horses, and did not know he had struck them. Plaintiff's witnesses testified that an object could be seen on that particular curve 570 feet before reaching the point where the horses were killed. This court held that a peremptory instruction should have been given for the defendant. It has been often reiterated by our decisions that it is the duty of trainmen, consistently with their train duties, to keep a lookout for domestic animals upon the track, and avoid killing them, and, if they fail to use ordinary care, the railroad company is liable, though they may not have seen the animals in time to avoid killing them. But the care to be exercised is ordinary, not extraordinary.

We are cited by plaintiff's counsel to Whelan v. B. & O. Ry. Co., 70 W. Va. 442, 74 S. E. 410, Kay v. Director General, 103 S. E. 108, Underwood v. C. & O. Ry. Co., 78 W. Va. 409, 89 S. E. 2, and Gould v. Coal & Coke, 74 W. Va. 8, 81 S. E. 529, as supporting the proposition that the evidence was sufficient to support this verdict. In the Whelan Case the horse was killed in the daytime on a track where it could have been seen 350 to 400 yards, and no effort whatever was made to stop the train, or blow the whistle. On the contrary, the speed of the train was accelerated within this distance, and by ordinary care the train could have been stopped and the accident prevented. In the Kay Case no witness saw the accident; but it occurred on a straight track where the cattle had been for several minutes before they were struck. The defendant did not introduce the trainmen as witnesses. Direct evidence was withheld by the railroad company. This was significant. Judge Poffenbarger said in his opinion:

"The theory of the sudden entry of the cattle on the track, in front of the train, which, if sustained by positive evidence or presumption, would class the case with Harvey O. & C. Co. v. C. & O. Ry. Co., 69 W. Va. 228, 71 S. E. 178; Lovejoy v. C. & O. Ry. Co., 41 W. Va. 693, 24 S. E. 599, and Toudy v. N. & W. Ry. Co., 38 W. Va. 694, 18 S. E. 896, is negatived and excluded by facts tending to prove they had been on the track for several minutes before they were struck."

In the Underwood Case there was no direct evidence of the killing, but the facts tended to show that one cow had been standing on a platform near the track, "had got up to cross the track when the train struck her"; and as to the other cow there was no evidence to show whether she was killed in the daytime or nighttime, or what train killed her. She was found opposite a curve on a steep bank, on a steep hillside, and there was some evidence that she had been feeding near the track. The verdict was set aside. The Gould Case has no application here. The trainmen did not see the horse, were insensible of having struck a horse at the time alleged, and it was not certain whether the horse had been struck by a train or had received his injuries on a nearby trestle. The evidence was insufficient and the judgment of the lower court was reversed for that reason. Wherever it is shown by positive evidence that the animal killed has suddenly appeared and attempted to cross the track, and that the train could not have been stopped in time to prevent the accident, and that the trainmen were on the lookout for dumb animals on the track consistently with their other duties, and, using ordinary care, failed to see the animal, this court has repeatedly said that negligence was not sufficiently shown to sustain a verdict for damages.

The point is made that the motor was not equipped with a proper and sufficient headlight to enable the motorman to see the cow on the track or near the track in time sufficient to avoid killing her. While the motorman was evidently confused as to the distance which the headlight would illumine the track, it was apparent that there was nothing wrong with the light. It was shown that the one on this motor was the usual ordinary one with which the defendant equipped its motors, and a number of the plaintiff's witnesses testified that the headlights on these motors would shine from the paddle to the crossing, a distance of about 150 yards. The motorman afterwards, upon his own request and by consent of the court, corrected his evidence, and gave the reason for his error in his testimony given at an earlier period of the trial. On this point the plaintiff relies on the case of Hanger Bros. v. Railway Co., 70 W. Va. 212, 73 S. E. 713, where the front of the train had no headlight whatever. The train was backing in the dark when the horse was killed. But in the case here it is shown that the cow was behind a board fence, and walked out on the track immediately in front of the train, and it is not perceived how the accident could have been prevented if the headlight was of more or less intensity and brilliancy, or even if the accident had occurred in the bright light of day.

[2] Section 3, c. 59, Acts 1919, which says:

"It shall be unlawful for any such animal [horse, cattle, etc.] to run at large on any public road or highway or railroad right of way in this state and should such stock while running at large destroy or injure the property of another, the owner shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and fined not less than five dollars and not more than ten dollars, and shall pay to the party whose property shall have been injured or destroyed, the amount of damages sustained by him by reason of such destruction or injury"

—is relied on, with the argument that this statute relieves the railroad company from observing the care with respect to such animals when found on the track or right of way, heretofore imposed; that it should be considered as an element in ascertaining negligence, inasmuch as the trainmen may presume that no such animals will be found on the railroad right of way. We do not think this statute can be construed as a relaxation of the rule laid down that the trainmen must keep a lookout for dumb animals upon the track, consistent with their other duties, and avoid the injuring or killing of them by the use of ordinary care. They must use care and diligence to discover such animals, and to prevent injuring or killing them, if by the use of ordinary care and prudence it can be done, after discovering them and, if they do not do so, the railroad company is liable. The fact that plaintiff negligently allowed his cows to get out of his inclosure and stray down to the railroad track does not in itself preclude recovery. It was not the proximate cause of the injury. It is within common knowledge that cattle will often escape from their inclosures, even where more than ordinary means have been taken to prevent them from so doing. We think the controlling facts in this case bring it within the control of principles announced in Carper v. Traction Co., 78 W. Va. 282, 88 S. E. 843, and Christian v. C. & O. Ry. Co., 78 W. Va. 378, 89 S. E. 17, and the cases there cited, and are of the opinion that defendant's peremptory instruction should have been given.

Reversed and remanded for new trial.

STATE v. POWELL. (No. 89.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. March 2, 1921.)

1. Abortion ☞1 — Not necessary that medicine would have desired effect.

C. S. § 4226, making it a felony to prescribe for any pregnant woman, or advise or procure her to take medicine with intent to destroy her child, defines an offense in itself, not an attempt to commit some other offense, and it is not necessary for the state, to establish a violation thereof, to show that the drug, if taken by the woman, would have had the desired effect.

2. Abortion ☞1—Defendant need not procure medicine prescribed, or woman use it.

To sustain a prosecution for advising or procuring a pregnant woman to take medicine, it is not necessary that defendant procured the drug himself, or that the woman actually used it, if defendant prescribed or advised its use with the illegal intent.

3. Criminal law ☞1159(2), 1184 — Supreme Court cannot reverse or modify for weakness of evidence.

Where the state's case was very weak, but the court cannot say that there was actually no evidence, the Supreme Court cannot reverse the verdict or modify the punishment.

Appeal from Superior Court, Harnett County; Devin, Judge.

John Powell was convicted of an offense, and he appeals. No error.

Young & Best, of Dunn, for appellant.

James S. Manning, Atty. Gen., and Frank Nash, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

WALKER, J. The defendant was convicted at September term, 1920, of Harnett county superior court, Hon. W. A. Devin, judge presiding, and from the judgment, upon such conviction, appealed to this court.

The statute upon which the indictment is based is section 4226 of the Consolidated Statutes. So far as material to this appeal it is as follows:

"If any person shall willfully 'prescribe for' any woman, either pregnant or quick with child, * * * or advise or procure any such woman to take any medicine, drug or substance whatever, with intent thereby to destroy such child, unless the same shall have been necessary to preserve the life of such mother, he shall be guilty of a felony," etc.

[1] There was evidence that the defendant advised the prosecutrix to take a certain drug, medicine, or substance, with intent to destroy the child. The essential fact charged, and which was required to be proven in the case, is that the defendant advised the woman to take the drug, or other substance, with intent thereby to destroy the child. State v. Crews, 128 N. C. 581, 38 S. E. 298. This is not an attempt to commit another crime, in which case the overt act must be shown, but the act charged is the offense itself which is denounced by the statute. It is the intent with which the drug is administered, and the purpose to destroy the child, that is made indictable under our statute (Revisal, §§ 3618 and 3619); and it is not necessary for the state to show that administering the drug named would have had the desired effect (State v. Shaft, 166 N. C. 407, 81 S. E. 932, Ann. Cas. 1916C, 627).

[2] It is not necessary to charge or prove that the defendant procured the drug himself or that the woman actually used it. All that is necessary is to prove that he prescribed or advised its use with the illegal intent. State v. Brady, 177 N. C. 587, 99 S. E. 7. Upon these authorities the defendant seems to have been properly convicted.

[3] The jury might very properly have acquitted the defendant, upon the evidence, as the state's case was very weak; but we cannot say that there was actually no evidence. The verdict has very little evidence of a substantial character to rest upon, but we cannot correct or reverse it, or moderate the punishment.

No error.

(181 N. C. 36)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. March 2, 1921.)

1. Removal of causes ☞27—Railroad company held a domestic corporation.

A railroad company, which had accepted the provisions of a private act permitting it to consolidate with foreign corporations on condition that such consolidation should not deprive the state court of jurisdiction over the corporation, is, for the purposes of suit, a domestic corporation, and not entitled to remove an action against it to the federal court on ground of diversity of citizenship.

2. Removal of causes ☞32—Director General of Railroads not entitled to remove for diversity of citizenship.

Director General of Railroads, against whom suit is brought for negligent injury to a passenger, is, for the purpose of that action, the same party as the railroad corporation, and cannot remove the action into the federal court for diversity of citizenship, where the corporation was not entitled to removal, in view of the provision of the Federal Control Act expressly denying the right of removal unless it was vested in the corporation prior to the passage of the act.

3. Constitutional law §106—Accrued cause of action cannot be defeated by statute; "property."

A vested right of action is "property," which cannot be defeated or modified by statute, though a statute may change the remedies therefor.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Property.]

4. Removal of causes §19(1)—Action against domestic corporation under federal control does not "arise under United States laws."

A right of action against the Director General and a railroad company for injuries to a passenger during federal control does not arise under the federal Transportation Act of March 21, 1918 (U. S. Comp. St. 1918, U. S. Comp. St. Ann. Supp. 1919, §§ 3115½a-3115½p), or under the Transportation Act of February 28, 1920, restoring the railroads to private control, and is not removable as a cause arising under the Constitution and laws of the United States.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Arise—Arising.]

5. Removal of causes §3—Act terminating federal control did not authorize removal of causes against Director General.

The act of Congress of February 28, 1920, restoring the railroads to private control, which permitted actions within two years thereafter, but contained no provision relating to removal of causes, did not authorize removal of action against the Director General, though it did repeal the federal Control Act (U. S. Comp. St. 1918, U. S. Comp. St. Ann. Supp. 1919, §§ 3115½a-3115½p), which expressly prohibited such removal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Berlie County; Lynn, Judge.

Action by Janice Mizell, by W. J. Mizell, her next friend, against the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company and John Barton Payne, Director General. From an order denying motion for removal of the cause to the federal court, the defendants appeal. Affirmed.

This is an action to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by the plaintiff while a passenger in alighting from the passenger coach. The injury occurred and the cause of action arose December 19, 1919, during federal control. The action was begun September 28, 1920, after the termination of federal control. The complaint was filed October 5, before the return date of the summons, and on October 23, 1920, the defendants filed their petition for removal to the federal court together with their answer. The cause was transferred by the clerk to the superior court docket, and at the first term the motion to remove to the federal court was denied. Both defendants joined in the motion to remove; John Barton Payne having been substituted for Walker D. Hines as Director General. From the refusal of the petition for removal, both defendants appealed.

P. A. Willcox, of Florence, S. O., Gillam & Davenport, of Windsor, and A. L. Hardee, of Wilmington, for appellants.

Winston & Matthews, of Windsor, for appellee.

CLARK, C. J. The plaintiff, a student in Greenville, N. O., purchased a ticket to Aulander, in Bertie county, N. C. As she was leaving the train at the latter point the injury occurred, as the complaint avers, for the want of a footstool or any assistance to alight; the distance between the lower step and the ground being about 30 inches.

The petition for removal to the federal court avers that the Atlantic Coast Line is a foreign corporation and a nonresident in the state of North Carolina. It also alleges that Director General Hines resides in New York and John Barton Payne, who was substituted as a defendant, is a citizen of Illinois, and both are nonresidents of this state. The defendants appealed from the refusal to remove, which is the only matter presented for review.

[1] The petition to remove is verified by P. A. Willcox, as attorney in fact of the Atlantic Coast Line, but the power of attorney under which he acted empowers him only to "sign bonds and other instruments" required in courts and other legal proceedings. It gives him no authority to verify pleadings and it would seem the petition is insufficiently verified. We need not discuss the allegation that the Atlantic Coast Line is a nonresident. In Cox v. A. C. L. R. R., 166 N. C. 652, 82 S. E. 979, this point was fully considered, and it was held that the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company was not entitled to a removal of its cause from the state court to the United States court on the ground of being a nonresident corporation and that under the provision of its charter on this question of removal it is a domestic corporation. This case has been reaffirmed in Brown v. Jackson, 179 N. C. 365, 375, 102 S. E. 739. It was also held in Staton v. Railroad, 144 N. C. 145, 56 S. E. 794; and Railroad v. Spencer, 166 N. C. 522, 82 S. E. 851.

[2] As to the Director General, the right to remove is also expressly denied in Hill v. Railroad and Director General, 178 N. C. 607, 101 S. E. 376, and we have divers cases since affirming the holding in that case that the Director General and the corporation, for the purpose of an action of this kind, are one and the same, and both are properly joined as parties. Indeed, in this present case we find Mr. Willcox verifying the pleadings for the Director General under the alleged authority of the corporation as its attorney in fact. The statute creating the position of Director General expressly denies the right of removal, except in cases where the right of removal was vested in the corporation prior to the passage of the act. As the Atlantic Coast Line had no such right, the Director General was not entitled to it.

The defendants contend, however, that they have a right to remove upon the ground that the cause of action is one "arising under the Constitution and laws of the United States." This is incidentally mentioned in the petition, but it seems was not argued below.

[3] The injury occurred and the cause of action arose December 19, 1919, before the railroads were discharged from federal control. Action could have been instituted that day. A vested right of action is property. The statute may change the remedies, but cannot defeat or modify a right of action that has already accrued. (Williams v. Railroad, 153 N. C. 380, 69 S. E. 402), and this cause of action arose at the very moment the injury occurred. (Hocutt v. Wilmington, 124 N. C. 214, 32 S. E. 681).

[4] On December 19, 1919, when this cause of action accrued, the railroad company was under the operation of the Transportation Act approved March 21, 1918 (U. S. Comp. St. 1918, U. S. Comp. St. Ann. Supp. 1919, §§ 3115½a-3115½p). But that act did not create or confer this cause of action, nor did it arise under or by virtue of that statute. Both North Carolina and Virginia had prior thereto adopted "Lord Campbell's Act." The plaintiff's cause of action did not arise out of the federal statute, which, moreover, denies the right of removal of actions against railroad companies, except in cases where the right to remove existed prior to that statute. 40 United States Statutes at Large, part 1, p. 457. Prior to that act the Atlantic Coast Line could not have removed this cause to the federal court (Hill v. Railroad, 178 N. C. 607, 101 S. E. 376), because no federal right or immunity was involved, nor diverse citizenship, and the action could not have arisen under the Constitution and laws of the United States.

The plaintiff's cause of action accrued prior to the Act of February 28, 1920, effective March 1, 1920 (41 Stat. 456). Besides, that act is silent as to the removal of causes, while under the act of March 21, 1918, above mentioned, the carrier, and of course the Director General, could not remove any action that had been brought, or might thereafter be instituted, by or against it, and this action has been begun since that date. Congress did not undertake, after federal control had ceased, to regulate causes that had accrued during such control.

The refusal to dismiss the action as to the defendant company, because John Barton Payne, Director General, is a party defendant, is not before the court, as he did not except on that ground; but that proposition has been discussed and denied at this term, citing our decisions in Parker v. Railroad & Director General, 181 N. C. —, 106 S. E. 755. The question before us is one of removal pure and simple. Besides, John Barton Payne has filed an answer in this case on the merits, reserving only his rights under the motion to remove. The act of February 28, 1920 (section 206), provides:

"Such actions, suits, and proceedings may, when within the periods of limitation now prescribed by state or federal statutes, but not later than two years from the date of the passage of this act, be brought in any court which but for federal control would have had jurisdiction of the cause of action had it arisen against such carrier."

This is explicit authority recognizing the jurisdiction of the state courts is exclusive. The question does not arise whether a corporation chartered by an act of Congress would have the right of removal; but the defendant the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company was not made a federal corporation by the statute appointing a manager for domestic railroad companies, as a war expedient. National banks are creatures of national legislation, and a receivership of a national bank occupies the same status; but that is a different proposition from the appointment of the Director General over state corporations, as to which the Director General has the same status, as regards removal, as the corporation itself would occupy. The brief of the defendants admits that the Federal Control Act contains an apparent prohibition against the removal. All the cases cited by defendants, in which removals were allowed on the ground of "a right arising under the Constitution and laws of the United States," are where the corporation was created under a federal charter, which is not the case with the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company.

[5] The defendants claim also that, as the first act establishing federal control contained a prohibition against removal, and the second act, repealing federal control, does not, therefore the right to removal exists. This is a nonsequitur, and there is even a very strong implication against it in the latter act, when it says, as above cited, that—

"Such actions, suits, or proceedings may, . . . not later than two years from passage of this act, be brought in any court which but for federal control would have had jurisdiction of the cause of action."

The superior courts of this state had jurisdiction of this action at the time it accrued, and removal to the federal court was at that time prohibited, and there is no statute since that has authorized it. The mere failure to again prohibit removal in the act abolishing federal control cannot possibly have such effect.

The petition to remove was properly denied.

Affirmed.

KINSEY v. JEFFERSON STANDARD LIFE INS. CO. (No. 173.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. March 9, 1921.)

Insurance \Rightarrow 665(6)—Evidence held to warrant jury in finding suicide.

In an action on a life insurance policy, evidence that insured shortly after he entered a room alone was found dead with a bullet wound in his head, with his pistol lying near at hand, and that he had been drinking heavily and was nervous and irritable, held to warrant the court in submitting to the jury the issue of suicide by insured, and to warrant the jury in finding that he had committed suicide.

Appeal from Superior Court, Jones County; Bond, Judge.

Action by Carrie H. Kinsey, administratrix, against the Jefferson Standard Life Insurance Company. Judgment for the defendant, and plaintiff appeals. No error.

Civil action to recover upon a life insurance policy issued by the defendant to plaintiff's intestate, Guy T. Kinsey. The case turns upon a single question. Defendant admitted the execution of the policy and its liability thereon, unless its plea of suicide within the stipulated period was found to be valid. Only one issue was submitted to the jury and answered by it as follows:

"Did the insured, Guy T. Kinsey, die by his own hand or act with intent to commit suicide? Answer: Yes."

Judgment on the verdict in favor of defendant. Plaintiff appealed.

Rouse & Rouse, of Kinston, for appellant. Brooks, Hines & Kelly, of Greensboro, and T. D. Warren, of New Bern, for appellee.

PER CURIAM. Plaintiff's chief exception is to the court's refusal to instruct the jury that the evidence was not sufficient to warrant a finding in favor of the defendant. Bearing upon this motion, the following is taken from the plaintiff's brief:

"Briefly summarized, the deceased had only a few minutes before finished eating dinner; he had left the table, going into an adjoining room. His wife heard a noise which attracted her attention. She went to the room and found her husband lying on the floor with a (pistol shot) wound which was shown to be in his temple, a little above and a little to the front of his right ear. The witnesses locate his body slightly different, but in the main it is agreed by all that his feet were some distance, variously estimated from two to three feet, from a bookcase, that his head was towards the door, and his body lying alongside of, with his right arm slightly under, a table that stood between the bookcase and the door. The deceased's pistol, which usually stayed upon the bookcase, was found slightly under the bookcase from the deceased's head as it lay upon the floor; the distance to the pistol was in addition to the length of his body two or three feet to the bookcase."

In addition there was evidence tending to show that the intestate was a heavy drinker; that he had been drinking for two days immediately preceding his death; that he was a nervous, irritable, and high-tempered man; that the wound on his head was black and ragged and the hair scorched, indicating that the pistol was held in close proximity to his head at the time it was fired.

Upon this evidence we think his honor very properly submitted the issue to the jury, and that they were warranted in answering it in the affirmative.

We have carefully examined the record and plaintiff's exceptions, and find no error of which plaintiff can justly complain.

No error.

WYNNS v. ATLANTIC COAST LINE R. CO. et al. (No. 107.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. March 2, 1921.)

Appeal and error \Rightarrow 927(3)—Evidence considered most favorable to plaintiff on review of motion for nonsuit.

On appeal by defendant from a judgment for plaintiff, where defendant is relying upon a motion for judgment as of nonsuit, the evidence will be considered in its most favorable light for the plaintiff.

Appeal from Superior Court, Bertie County; Lyon, Judge.

Action by F. M. Wynns against the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. No error.

J. N. Pruden, of Edonton, and Gillam & Davenport, of Windsor, for appellants.

Winston & Matthews, of Windsor, for appellee.

PER CURIAM. Upon the argument of this cause, defendants relied entirely upon their motion for judgment as of nonsuit, assigning as error his honor's refusal to grant the same. Considering the evidence in its most favorable light for the plaintiff, the accepted position on such motion, we think the testimony was sufficient to be submitted to the jury under authority of Ramsbottom v. Railroad, 138 N. C. 38, 50 S. E. 448.

No error.

HOUSE v. PARKER. (No. 105.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. March 2, 1921.)

1. Sales ~~§~~479(14)—Conditional vendor held entitled to sell property on default of purchaser.

Seller of steam logging loading outfit upon a retained title contract, upon failure of purchaser to pay a note at maturity, had the right to sell the property at public auction and apply the proceeds to the payment of the note, although the contract contained no express power of sale, in view of C. S. § 2587.

2. Contracts ~~§~~167—Laws in force enter into contracts.

The general laws of the state are a part of a contract.

Appeal from Superior Court, Halifax County; Lyon, Judge.

Action by A. C. House against Surry Parker. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. New trial.

This was a civil action for damages, tried upon an alleged wrongful conversion of plaintiff's property by the defendant, Surry Parker.

In July, 1916, plaintiff, a resident of Halifax county, purchased from the defendant, who resided at Pinetown, N. C., a steam logging loading outfit upon a retained title contract. The terms of said agreement touching the reservation of title were as follows:

"The condition of the above contract is that the legal title and right in and to the above-described property is to remain and be vested in Surry Parker, Pinetown, N. C., until the said notes and all interest thereon accrued are paid off; and in case the said party of the second part should fail to pay off the amount due by the said notes, or either of them, at maturity, then the entire debt shall become due and payable, and it shall be lawful for the said Surry Parker, Pinetown, N. C., to take possession of the said property at any time thereafter; but in case the said notes are paid off then the title of said property to vest in the said party of the second part."

The machinery was shipped by freight to the plaintiff at Garysburg, N. C.; bill of lading for same being attached to draft and sent to the Bank of Weldon, with instructions to notify plaintiff. Pending negotiations between the parties as to the correctness of said draft and the execution of the purchase-money notes, the shipment was returned by the railroad companies to the point of origin.

Plaintiff then instructed the defendant to hold the machinery at Pinetown until he could arrange to pay for it or until he could sell it. There was evidence tending to show that the plaintiff's mill had been shut down in the meantime, and that he desired to sell said machinery at Pinetown, if he could do so to advantage.

Upon failure of the plaintiff to pay his last note at maturity, defendant sold said property at public auction as security for his claim. The amount received at said sale was insufficient to pay the balance of the debt. With respect to defendant's right to sell the machinery, after due notice, and apply the proceeds to the payment of the purchase money, his honor charged the jury:

"But if you should find that, after this property was shipped back to Pinetown, House ratified the reshipment and agreed to let the property remain there in the hands of Parker, to be disposed of by him, and that he made the best disposition that he could under the circumstances, though he had no right to sell it under the contract of sale, there being no power of sale in the contract, and has brought no suit to foreclose the sale, he could only sell it by the consent and direction of House."

Defendant excepted.

Judgment in favor of the plaintiff on the verdict, and the defendant appealed.

Ashley B. Stainback, of Weldon, and Daniel & Carter, of Washington, N. C., for appellant.

W. E. Daniel, of Weldon, G. E. Midyette, of Jackson, and George C. Green, of Weldon, for appellee.

STACY, J. Section 2587, C. S., relating to the foreclosure of conditional sales, provides as follows:

"In all sales of personal property wherein the title is retained by the seller to secure the purchase money, or any part thereof, and no power of sale is conferred, and default is made in the payment of said obligation by the purchaser, then in all such cases it is lawful for the owner of such debt thereby secured, without an order of court, to sell such property, or so much thereof as may be necessary to pay off said indebtedness, at public auction for cash, after first giving twenty days notice at three or more public places in the county wherein the sale is to be made, and apply the proceeds of such sale to the discharge of said debt, interest on the same, and costs of foreclosure, and pay any surplus to the person legally entitled thereto. Before making any such sale, in addition to the advertisement above required, the owner of said debt shall, at least ten days before the day of sale, mail a copy of the notice of sale to the last known postoffice address of the original purchaser or his assigns."

[1, 2] Under a proper construction of this statute and on the record, we think his honor erred in charging the jury that the defendant could not sell the property in question without the consent and direction of the plaintiff. It is true the contract contains no express power of sale; but the general laws of the state in force at the time of its execution and performance enter into and become as much a part of the contract as if they were expressly referred to or incorporated in its terms. O'Kelly v. Williams, 84 N. C. 281; Graves v. Howard, 159 N. C. 594, 75 S. E. 998, Ann. Cas. 1914C, 585; and Von Hoffman v. Quincy, 4 Wall. 552, 18 L. Ed. 403.

There are other exceptions worthy of consideration; but, as the case goes back for a new trial, and as they may not occur on another hearing, we refrain from further comment.

New trial.

CRAFT & BERGESON v. JOHN L. ROPER LUMBER CO. (No. 62.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. March 2, 1921.)

Waters and water courses § 154(2)—Proprietors under obligation to properly maintain canal.

Where a drainage canal has been established and used as of right by abutting proprietors in the absence of statutory, contract, or prescriptive regulation to the contrary, the obligation is upon each of the proprietors to clear out and properly maintain the portion of the canal running through his own land, and ordinarily he has no right to compel an upper proprietor to do this for him nor to hold such proprietor in damages for not doing it, in view of C. S. §§ 5272-5274, 5280, et seq.

Appeal from Superior Court, Washington County; Calvert, Judge.

Action by Craft & Bergeson against the John L. Roper Lumber Company. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Plaintiffs, lower proprietors, owning land abutting on both sides of a drainage canal used by them in part for draining their lands, sue the defendant, one of a number of upper proprietors also abutting on said canal, and using the same for drainage, for damages to plaintiffs' land and crops, particularly for the year 1919, caused by the negligent and wrongful failure of defendant to clear out and properly maintain the portion of said canal running through the lands of plaintiff and below same. On denial of liability a jury was impaneled, and at close of plaintiffs' evidence, on motion, there was judgment of nonsuit. Plaintiffs excepted and appealed.

Ward & Grimes, of Washington, N. C., for appellants.

Small, MacLean, Bragaw & Rodman, of Washington, N. C., for appellee.

HOKE, J. The evidence offered in support of plaintiffs' cause of action tended to show that the McRae canal was a drainage canal from two to three miles in length, lying in said county, having its outlet into Beaver Dam swamp, some distance below lands of plaintiffs; that it has been established for 60 years and more and used by abutting proprietors for drainage purposes, the lands affected amounting to 2,500 to 3,000 acres; that plaintiffs, lower proprietors, owned a tract of about 70 acres of land on either side of this canal, about 40 acres of which were cleared and in part drained by the use of the McRae canal; that defendant, one of a number of upper proprietors, also using said canal for drainage, owned a large body of land, the second tract above plaintiffs' land, from 400 to 600 acres of which were cleared and drained by ditches leading into the main canal; that the portion of the McRae canal within the bounds of plaintiffs' tract had been allowed to fill up so that it did not afford proper drainage for same, and that on very slight rains the water would pond back into plaintiffs' ditches and sob and injure their lands, and particularly in 1919 caused great damage to the crops of plaintiffs planted and growing thereon; that this was due to the alleged wrongful failure on the part of defendant to clear out the portion of the McRae canal on plaintiffs' tract, which had been filled up 2 to 3 feet above the original bottom and caused in part by defendant's drainage into same. On these, the facts chiefly pertinent to the inquiry, the authoritative decisions here and elsewhere are to the effect that, where a drainage canal has been established and used as of right by abutting proprietors in the absence of statutory contract or prescriptive regulation to the contrary, the obligation is upon each of the proprietors to clear out and properly maintain the portion of the canal running through his own land, and ordinarily he has no right to compel an upper proprietor to do this for him, nor to hold such proprietor in damages for not doing it. The general principle as stated was approved and applied by this court in the recent case of Lamb v. Lamb, reported in 177 N. C. 150, 98 S. E. 307. There Abner Lamb, a grandfather, and owner of a large body of land, having established and maintained a system of drainage for same permanent in character, died leaving his lands to his two sons in separate tracts as upper and lower proprietors along the lead ditches constituting principal features of said drainage system. Plaintiff, successor in title to the proprietor of the lower tract, sued the successor and proprietor of the upper tract for failure to keep open and maintain the lead ditches through plaintiff's land. On the facts suggested, relief was denied to plaintiff, and, speaking to the principal question the court said:

"It is undoubtedly the general rule that, in the absence of contract stipulation or prescriptive right to the contrary, the owner of an easement is liable for costs of maintenance and repairs where it exists and is used and enjoyed for the benefit of the dominant estate alone; that he has a right of entry upon the servient estate for the purpose indicated, and may be held liable for injuries arising from his willful or negligent breach of duty in these matters. The position finds support in Hair v. Downing, one of the North Carolina cases heretofore cited, and is very generally approved in the decisions and text-writers on the subject. Bellevue v. Daly, 14 Idaho, 545; Oney v. West Buena Vista Land Co., 104 Va. 580; Dudgeon v. Bronson, 159 Ind. 652; 9 R. C. L. 794, 795; 14 Cyc. 1209; Jones on Easements, § 821. But in such case the owner of the dominant estate is not required to maintain or repair the easement for the benefit of the servient tenement. He may, ordinarily, abandon it altogether, without infraction of any rights of the servient owner (9 R. C. L. 795, citing Pomfret v. Riccroft, 1 Saund. 321, 10 Eng. Rul. Cases, 18, and Mason v. Shrewsbury, etc., Ry. Co., L. R. 6 Q. B. 578, 10 Eng. Rul. Cas. 22, and note), a general principle recognized and applied in this state in Canal Co. v. Burnett, 147 N. C. 41. But where, as in this case, a system of drainage has been constructed for the benefit of the two properties and is used and enjoyed by the owners of both, the general rule is, or should be, as held by the court below, that each is required to maintain the portion of the system on his own land, unless the conditions and circumstances presented should make such an obligation so unequal and burdensome on one at the expense of the other that a different method of adjustment would be required."

In Lamb's Case it was suggested that as between two proprietors in case of gross inequality a different method of adjustment might be upheld and applied by court decision, but where there are more than two proprietors, and in any case, in the absence of some intelligent and legalized administrative regulations apportioning the respective burdens, the difficulties of making proper adjustment of these claims by ordinary civil action alone would be well-nigh insuperable. Recognizing this our Legislature has wisely enacted, in addition to the statutory provisions for the creation of regular drainage districts, that wherever a drainage canal has been established and used as of right by abutting proprietors in the absence of contract stipulation or statutory or prescriptive provision controlling the matter, the question of proportionate burdens may be determined on petition duly filed before a justice of the peace or clerk of the superior court, who shall by commissioners or jury of view cause the respective obligations and burdens to be ascertained and fixed and apportioned among the respective proprietors, and on this report duly made and confirmed collection may be enforced as the statute provides. 2 Consolidated Statutes, §§ 5272, 5273, 5274, 5280, et seq., section 5280 providing, among other things, that "after a canal has been dug along any * * * depression or waterway and maintained for seven years, it shall be prima facie evidence of its necessity," and proceedings may be had for apportionment and collection of the respective burdens, etc. We were referred by counsel for appellant to the case of Briscoe v. Parker, 145 N. C. 14, 58 S. E. 443, as authority in favor of his present claim, but in that case no canal had been established, and it was held that, when an upper proprietor had gathered his drainage water into ditches and so carried it up against a lower proprietor's land without more, causing said water to "ooze through and sob and injure the same, an action would lie for the injury." But here, as stated, a canal had been established for 60 years and more and used as of right by abutting proprietors, and the question presented is not one of trespass, but of proper apportionment of the respective burdens, and on the facts as now presented the statutory method of relief is the only one open to plaintiffs.

On the record, we find no error in the judgment of nonsuit, and the same is affirmed.

Affirmed.

(181 N. C. 519)

STATE v. CALDWELL et al. (No. 91.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. March 9, 1921.)

1. Criminal law § 859—Defendants held not deprived of their trial by action of lawless mob.

The defendants in a homicide case held not deprived of that fair and impartial trial guaranteed them by the Constitution and laws of the state by reason of the action of a lawless mob who wanted to lynch them, the mob being overcome by the courageous officers and brave citizens of the community at the commencement of the trial and the judge demeaning himself throughout with firmness, wisdom, and impartiality.

2. Criminal law § 858(3)—Jury not permitted to take documentary evidence to jury room.

Unless by consent and in certain restricted instances allowed by statute, the jury in a criminal case must determine the cause on the evidence as it is heard by them or as presented in open court and is not allowed to take to the jury room with them documentary or other evidence for their private inspection, and court did not err in declining to allow jury to take with them to the jury room statements of defendants made before coroner.

Appeal from Superior Court, Wayne County; Devin, Judge.

Harry Caldwell, alias Harry Chaplan, alias Henry Williams; Jesse Foster; Frank Williams; George Bearsall; and Jim Hill were convicted of murder, and they appeal. No error.

The facts in evidence on the part of the state tended to show that in the latter part of November, seemingly Sunday the 21st, defendants were in the car of defendant Foster, and between 4 and 5 o'clock p. m. went to the store of deceased, four miles east of Goldsboro, N. C., and were seen standing about the gas tank buying a small amount of gasoline; that this was paid for by defendant Caldwell, handing to Jones a $20 bill, and that in making the change Jones displayed a large roll of money, which he took from his pocket; that when this gasoline was bought and paid for all of defendants were standing around the gas tank, and could see the money shown by deceased; that on the same night between 7 and 8 o'clock, when Jones and his wife and three of their children, a colored boy who helped about the house, and a white boy who was crippled and had to move with crutches were sitting in a front room of the Jones residence, which was a short distance from the store, these five defendants in the car drove past the house into the back yard, and came up on the back porch; that defendant Foster came into the room where Jones and the family, etc., were, and told deceased that some one out there wished to see him, and Foster then shook hands with the colored boy and engaged him in conversation; that Jones went out and down the hallway towards the back door, there being at the time a lighted lamp in the hall, and when he had gotten near the back door and about opposite or just beyond the dining room door, some one of the party, shown to be defendant Caldwell called to him, "Throw up your hands!" and almost immediately fired the pistol, inflicting a mortal wound, from which he died in about 30 minutes after he was shot. Mrs. Jones, wife of the deceased, said that all she heard was, "Throw up your hands!" The colored boy testified the call was, "Throw up your hands or I will kill you!" When the shot fired, Jesse Foster went out and towards the back door, where the party had entered, and they all ran off. The colored boy, the helper, went out that way in the endeavor to see who they were, and the cripple had also fled from the room, probably going out the front door, the theory of the state being that the flight of defendants was caused by the unexpected appearance of the additional members of the household. Only three of the Jones children were present, the eldest of the three being 8, their oldest child, aged 11, spending the night with his grandparents.

The course and effect of the bullet tended to confirm the state's evidence that the person who did the shooting was standing in the hall at the time, and not very far in the back door.

The defendants were not examined as witnesses in the trial, but without objection their statements, taken at the coroner's inquest, were put in evidence and read to the jury, these statements tending to show that defendants had gone to the house for the purpose of getting whisky, and were in the dining room where Jones had brought the whisky, and while they were in their the defendant Caldwell, who claimed to be a detective, drew his pistol saying, "You are all under arrest;" that all of them threw up their hands except Jones, and, he making some move towards his pocket as if for a weapon, Caldwell fired and killed him. No authority or justification for this claim of being an official on the part of Caldwell was shown in evidence.

Under a clear and comprehensive charge from the court presenting every phase of the case and permissible defenses arising on the testimony the jury rendered a verdict of guilt of murder in the first degree against defendants Caldwell and Foster, and of murder in the second degree against the other three defendants. Judgment in accordance with the verdict, and defendants excepted and appealed.

E. A. Humphrey and Hood & Hood, all of Goldsboro, for appellants Hill and Pearsall.

W. S. O'B. Robinson, of Goldsboro, for appellants Foster and Williams.

N. D. White, of Goldsboro, for appellant Caldwell.

J. S. Manning, Atty. Gen., and Frank Nash, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

HOKE, J. It is chiefly objected to the validity of this conviction that by reason of the action of a lawless mob, and its hostile demonstrations towards them, the defendants were deprived of that fair and impartial trial guaranteed them by the Constitution and laws of the state, but on the record the exception must be overruled. As this is the principal objection insisted on for the defendants, and the occurrence and attendant circumstances at the time and after aroused very great interest and extended comment, we consider it not amiss to incorporate the findings of the trial judge concerning them, which have been duly stated and made a part of the record, in terms as follows:

"The court, deeming it proper that a more extended record than is shown upon the minutes of the court should be made of the happenings in relation to the trial of the case of

Harry Caldwell and others at the November term of Wayne Superior Court, desires to file the following statement:

"Harry Caldwell and four other prisoners were under indictment for murder in the above-entitled case at said court, and were being held for safe-keeping in the state's prison at Raleigh. The sheriff was ordered to bring these prisoners to Goldsboro on the evening of December 1st for trial, which had been set for the following morning. In attempting to carry out this order, and before he could get them to Goldsboro, the sheriff was prevented by a large mob, who sought to lynch the prisoners, and it was only by the courage and skill of the sheriff and his assistants that he succeeded in eluding the mob and returning his prisoners to Raleigh.

"The matter having been brought to the attention of the judge, after consulting with Solicitor W. D. Siler and members of the bar and representative citizens of the county, and being assured that the citizens of Goldsboro and Wayne county would give the court and the officials all the aid in their power to preserve order and would be willing to render personal service to this end if called upon, the court ordered the prisoners to be at once brought to Goldsboro for trial. Fifty citizens were therefore called upon and sworn in as special officers of the court. This number included every member of the Goldsboro bar, except those engaged in the trial of the case, and many of the most prominent business and professional men of the city. These special officers and the sheriff brought the prisoners into court December 2d, and the trial proceeded orderly in the prescribed form and continued until the usual time for adjournment for the evening was reached, when recess was taken until 9:30 a. m., December 3d.

"During the evening recess of the court, the officers being advised that an effort might be made during the night to take the prisoners from them and lynch them, decided they could be better protected in case of attack in the jury retiring rooms on the third floor of the courthouse, than in jail. The jury had been upon adjournment sent to rooms up town two blocks away. Those special officers then repaired with their prisoners to the third floor of the courthouse, and, being fully armed, so disposed themselves as to effectively cover the only approach to their position. Under the leadership of George C. Freeman (lately Lt. Col. 80th Div. A. E. F.) the special officers were divided into squads, and assigned to various duties within and without the courthouse.

"A large crowd surrounded the court square, and much excitement prevailed." This crowd was composed of some lawless elements, but also of many good citizens, there from curiosity and some to help discourage an attack. About 9:15 p. m. a roughly organized mob of several hundred men, armed and masked, declaring their purpose to lynch the prisoners, made an attack upon the west front of the courthouse, accompanied by a number of pistol and gunshots directed at the building and occupants. The glass in the windows and doors was broken, and the woodwork about the doors on that side injured. The lock of the door was unbroken, however, and those of the special force on that floor refusing to open, the firing from the outside continued until one who appeared to be the leader of the mob was severely wounded by a pistol shot and fell. After this person was carried away the remainder of the mob retired. There were no casualties among the defenders, and no member of the mob set foot within the courthouse. Thereafter no determined attack was made upon the building, but a large crowd, some angry and threatening, continued to surround the square, and there were occasional firings of pistols during the night.

"The judge, hearing of the attack on the courthouse and its result and being advised of rumors of other mobs forming and of threats that dynamite might be used, deemed it wise to call upon the Governor for military assistance to relieve the defenders of the prisoners and in order to be prepared for possible emergencies. The Governor thereupon ordered out a company of riflemen from Burlington and a machine gun company from Durham under command of Capt. Towler. These, however, did not arrive until about 7 a. m., December 3d. At this time the disorder had entirely ceased, but the military companies were useful in relieving the special officers in charge of the prisoners and in assisting the sheriff in policing the courthouse grounds.

"At 9:30 a. m., December 3d, the jury was brought back to the courthouse, the prisoners brought in, and in the presence of a large orderly crowd, including many ladies, the trial proceeded regularly to its conclusion. The case was fully argued by counsel for the state and for the prisoners, and the jury, after deliberating for more than three hours, at 9:30 p. m. rendered the verdict which appears on record, two of the prisoners being convicted of murder in the first degree and three of murder in the second degree. The prisoners were sentenced and taken at once to the state's prison by the sheriff, accompanied by the military companies. The behavior of the officers and of the military companies was exemplary and their presence reassuring to the people.

"In conclusion I desire to submit these observations:

"Undeniably the action of the mob constituted an attack upon organized society in the administration of public justice, and was entirely without justification or excuse, and was an attempt to violently interfere with the lawful procedure of the court, but its outcome showed unmistakably that the forces for law and order in Wayne county are stronger than the opposing elements, and that the courts have the power to protect themselves by calling to their aid the influence and active support of good citizens. A forward step has been made by the citizens of Wayne county in controlling the mob spirit which constitutes one of the hindrances to the development of our state.

"The trial of those prisoners would never have been attempted had not the judge felt that he could with confidence rely upon the willingness and the ability of the citizens of Goldsboro and Wayne county to prevent a violation of the integrity of a court, and, the trial once begun, it was determined, with this aid, to carry it to a lawful and orderly conclusion in spite of the efforts of the ignorant and the lawless to the contrary. The event shows this confidence was not misplaced. And while I regret the injury and damage to the courthouse building and the wounding of a citizen, I believe the outcome one of distinct value to the county and to the state in its demonstration of the power of the forces in favor of law and order when properly called into action. For this was a case of Wayne county citizens, unaided by outside force, and prompted only by a sense of public duty, standing manfully against, and at the imminent risk of their lives subduing, attacks delivered by unruly elements of Wayne county citizenship, and doing so under circumstances calling forth courage, endurance, and determination. The unselfish public service rendered by those who served as special officers deserves praise, and is to each one an honorable distinction. They do not ask for compensation, but they have an abundant recompense in the approval of their own consciences and in the gratitude of every law-abiding citizen. The court desires to give public and permanent expression to his personal thanks to each one of them.

"I desire to call attention to the names of those who held the third floor of the courthouse during the whole night and kept the prisoners for the court: George K. Freeman, M. H. Allen, M. T. Dickinson, Lewis and Ross Giddens, John R. Edwards, Kirby Boyette, Doc. Dewey, Lawrence Bradsher, Harvey Holmes, Edward R. Michaux, Hugh Dortch, Charles A. Thompson, Jake P. Shrago, George C. Royall, Jr. These men chose their position well, and strengthened it skillfully. Heavily armed and supplied, they awaited attack with calmness. They were determined to maintain their defense at all hazards, in the performance of a public duty as to which they had no personal interest. They were unconquerable and unafraid. Such spirit should be a source of pride to the citizens of Wayne and to every North Carolinian. With such spirit as this our country is safe from attack either from foes without or lawlessness within.

"The following are the names of the sheriff and his assistants who aided the court in these events: William S. Grant, sheriff, Deputies, Paul Best, J. C. Rhodes, Walter Grant, Lester Hunt, Thad Howell, and J. H. Howell. The court desires to commend the high courage and faithfulness of Sheriff Grant and of these assistants who were not only courageous but wholly devoted to obedience to the orders of the court and to the suppression of lawlessness.

"The court desires to call attention to and commend the action of many influential citizens, including Judge W. R. Allen, Judge O. H. Allen, Messrs. George Royall, B. H. Edwards, J. D. Langston, and others, who were active in counseling and advising against violence.

"To these forces is due the victory. They have contributed notably to strengthening the confidence of the people in the power of the courts, and to the discouraging of mob violence and lynch law in North Carolina.

"W. A. Devin, Judge."

[1] From this statement it fully and satisfactorily appears that while the mob at the commencement and just before the trial showed a determination to lynch the defendants, yet by the instant and courageous action of the officials and law-abiding citizens of the community this mob was suppressed and the influence and effect of its conduct entirely removed and effaced, and the trial proceeded with that calmness and deliberation so essential to the administration of well-ordered justice. And in addition to the commendation deservedly expressed by the presiding judge in reference to the conduct of the good citizens of Goldsboro and Wayne counties we consider it proper that we express like commendation of the upright and able judge who demeaned himself throughout with a firmness, wisdom, and impartiality in every way worthy of the best traditions of his great office.

The other exceptions of the defendants are without merit. On the objection that the judge denied defendants' motion for severance, the court has repeatedly held that the question rests on the sound discretion of the trial judge, and will not be reviewed except in case of patent and gross abuse. State v. Southerland, 178 N. C. 376, 100 S. E. 187. And as to the ruling of his honor in permitting the 11 year old son of the deceased to be sworn and testify, on account of his youth, and incapacity, etc., this, too, is in the discretion of the judge (State v. Finger, 131 N. C. 781, 42 S. E. 820), and the answers of the witness on the voir dire and also the directness and intelligence of his testimony show that in this instance the discretion of the court has been providently exercised.

Another exception was to the refusal of the court to permit the sheriff when examined as a witness to make answer to a series of questions propounded by defendants as to whether deceased had the general reputation of being a whisky seller. There is doubt on the facts of the record if an affirmative answer to the proposed question would be of sufficient significance to disturb the results of the trial, but the exception is clearly untenable, for the reason that it does not appear what answer the witness would have made to the proposed question. The exception therefore must be disallowed.

[2] Defendants except further that the judge on objection declined to allow the jury to take with them to the jury room the statements of defendants, made before the coroner, and which had been introduced in evidence, but this ruling also is in accord with our decisions on the subject that, unless by consent and in certain restricted instances allowed by statute, the jury must determine the cause on the evidence as it is heard by them or as presented in open court, and is not allowed to take with them documentary or other evidence for their private inspection. Nicholson v. Lumber Co., 156 N. C. 59-68, 72 S. E. 86, 36 L. R. A. (N. S.) 162, citing Williams v. Thomas, 78 N. C. 47; Watson v. Davis, 52 N. C. 178-181; Outlaw v. Hurdle, 46 N. C. 150.

On careful examination of the entire record we are of opinion that defendants have had the benefit of a fair and impartial trial, in which their every right has been duly considered and respected, and that no error has been made to appear that gives them any just and legal ground of complaint.

No error.

SMITH v. ALLEN. (No. 106.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. March 9, 1921.)

1. Limitation of actions \S 182(2) — Statute must be pleaded to be available as a defense.

The statute of limitations, to be available as a defense in action for taxes paid, must be pleaded.

2. Limitation of actions \S 46(5) — Statute did not begin to run against agreement to pay for services at death until death.

Where services are rendered under an agreement that compensation is to be made at death, the amount does not become due until death, and the statute of limitations does not begin to run until that time.

3. Appeal and error \S 1050(1) — Admission of testimony harmless, in view of other testimony unobjected to.

The admission of testimony, if erroneous, was harmless, where the same facts were testified to by the same witness without objection.

4. Witnesses \S 176(2) — Plaintiff properly examined as to transaction with deceased, where administrator testified thereto.

Where administrator, being sued for services rendered intestate, testified as to transactions between intestate and plaintiff, it was proper to permit plaintiff to testify as to such transactions as against objection that the testimony involved transactions with the deceased.

Appeal from Superior Court, Warren County; Lyon, Judge.

Action by Dulcedo Smith against Joseph John Allen, administrator. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. No error.

This is an action to recover for personal services rendered by the plaintiff to the intestate of the defendant, and certain taxes paid by the plaintiff.

There was evidence tending to prove that plaintiff, a nephew of defendant's intestate, lived alone with the intestate for about 15 years until intestate's death, July 25, 1919, at the advanced age of 89 years; that for the last 7 years of this time the intestate was bedridden; and for the last 3 years he was totally helpless, having no control of his body, his limbs, his bladder, or his bowels; that plaintiff waited on him, cleaned him, made his fires, sat up with him, changed his bed, brought his meals, and attended to his business. The intestate was in mature life, a man of business, but came back to his farm near Manson when past 70, and told plaintiff that if plaintiff would stay there with him and take care of him and attend to his business as long as he lived he would give plaintiff the place, about 500 acres of land, uncultivated, growing up in pines. Deceased also stated several times that he had made a will, giving plaintiff the place. It was shown that he refused to pay the taxes, saying it was plaintiff's, and plaintiff must pay them, and that plaintiff paid the taxes from 1906 to his uncle's death. When people would ask leave to hunt or to buy trees deceased would say: "See Dulce; it is his;" or words to that effect. After his death no will was found, and this action was brought to recover the value of plaintiff's services. The timber on the land was sold in the spring of 1920 by the heirs for $37,000. The land itself was worth $6,000 or $7,000 more, and deceased had in bank $3,000, which was not diminished during his long illness.

Jarvis Allen, a colored man, born on the place, helped to nurse deceased, and, being refused payment, sued for $2,000, and was paid $1,250 without a trial.

Plaintiff, a dentist, a man of education, demanded $5 per day for his services for the 7 years during which the deceased was helpless, alleging the contract, the performance thereof by him, and the breach thereof by the death of the intestate without payment or provision for plaintiff. Plaintiff also added a cause of action for the taxes paid by him and interest thereon. The defendant denied liability, and pleaded the statute as to all but 3 years of the services, but did not plead the statute against the claim for taxes.

The jury returned the following verdict:

"(1) Did O. G. R. Smith agree with plaintiff that if the plaintiff would remain with him at his home and care for him and look after his business, and that if he, the said plaintiff, would do so, he, the said O. G. R. Smith, would at his death compensate him for his services and attentions? Answer: Yes.

"(2) Did the plaintiff remain with the said O. G. R. Smith at his home and care for him and look after his business as alleged in the complaint? Answer: Yes.

"(3) Did the said O. G. R. Smith at his death compensate the plaintiff for the services and attentions of the said plaintiff to him which were rendered as alleged in the complaint? Answer: No.

"(4) What sum, if any, is the plaintiff entitled to recover for such attention and service? Answer: $12,783.75.

"(5) What sum, if any, is the plaintiff entitled to recover for the taxes paid by the plaintiff for the said O. G. R. Smith? Answer: $574.86."

Judgment was entered upon the verdict in favor of the plaintiff and the defendant appealed, assigning the following errors:

"First. Exception is to the court permitting plaintiff to testify what he did for the intestate.

"Second. Exception is to testimony as to taxes paid for deceased for more than 3 years before his death.

"Third. Exception is to the charge of the court on the fourth issue, refusing to hold that the claim of plaintiff is barred as to all arising more than 3 years before intestate's death.

"Fourth. Exception is to refusal to charge that all taxes paid more than 3 years before intestate's death are barred of recovery by the statute of limitations.

"Fifth and Sixth. Exceptions to the verdict and judgment, respectively."

Tasker Polk, of Warrenton, Wm. H. & Thos. W. Ruffin, of Louisburg, and A. C. & J. P. Zollcoffer, of Henderson, for appellant.

Hicks & Son, of Henderson, Daniel & Daniel, B. B. Williams, of Warrenton, and W. F. Harvey, of Littleton, for appellee.

ALLEN, J. The second, third, and fourth exceptions may be considered together, and the fifth and sixth are purely formal.

[1] The second and fourth are to the refusal to hold that the claim for taxes paid more than 3 years prior to the death of the intestate is barred by the statute of limitations, and it is a complete answer to these exceptions that the claim for taxes was alleged as a separate and distinct cause of action, and that the defendant did not plead the statute of limitations to this claim.

[2] The third exception is answered by the finding of the jury upon the first issue; it being well settled in this state:

"Where services are rendered upon an agreement that compensation is to be made at death, that the amount does not become due until death, and that the statute of limitations does not begin until that time." Helsabeck v. Doub, 167 N. C. 206, 83 S. E. 241, L. R. A. 1917A, 1.

The evidence is ample to sustain this finding, and there is no exception by the defendant to the contrary.

The defendant did not ask the court to hold, nor did he request a prayer for instruction, that there was no evidence to support the finding upon any of the issues.

The first exception is to permitting the plaintiff to testify that he would have to be up with intestate—

"at night, every night anywhere from 2 to 10 times, to move him, lift him, and change his position. He could not move himself after 1916. Nobody stayed with him at night but me. On August, 1912, to July, 1919, I could have easily earned from $8 to $10 per day. I paid taxes on that land from 1906 until the old man died."

This objection to evidence was upon the ground that the plaintiff was a party, and that it involved a transaction with the deceased.

It will be seen, however, that the plaintiff had already testified without objection to all of these facts, and that afterwards on cross-examination the defendant examined him minutely covering every phase of the answer objected to, and, further, that the administrator was examined as a witness, and testified as to these transactions.

[3, 4] If, therefore, the objection could have been sustained, in the first instance, the evidence is harmless, because the same facts were testified to by the same witness without objection, and, the administrator having testified as to the transactions, the plaintiff would be permitted to do so.

We have examined the record carefully, and it appears to us that the verdict is right, and that the claim of the plaintiff is meritorious, and has been established in accordance with law.

No error.

(181 N. C. 46)

PRITCHARD et al. v. WILLIAMS. (No. 16.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. March 9, 1921.)

On Plaintiff's Appeal.

1. Ejectment \S 141—"Permanent improvements" defined.

"Permanent improvements" to land include all improvements of a permanent nature which substantially enhance the value of the property and, property being a farm, includes putting up dwelling house or tenant houses, barns, and stables and other outbuildings, and any substantial improvements which might be made to those buildings, the necessary ditching and necessary or proper fencing, the digging of a well or planting of orchards and cutting of timber in the course of clearing for cultivation, the grubbing of stumps, bushes, and reed patches necessary to clear and break the land for planting and cultivation, provided that they enhance the value of the property, but do not include repairs to buildings which should be made by the owner in the ordinary use of the property.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Permanent Improvement.]

2. Life estates §17—Life tenant held entitled to recover for betterments.

A life tenant, who made permanent improvements under a bona fide belief that he was the owner in fee simple, is entitled to recover for betterments.

3. Ejectment §142(1)—Right to recover for betterments not dependent on wish of owner.

A defendant in ejectment's right to recover for betterments does not depend upon the wish of the actual owner for them or the sufficiency of the buildings already upon the land, the sole question being, the defendant having placed the improvements upon the land under a bona fide belief that he owned the premises in fee simple, whether or not the things which were put thereon as permanent improvements substantially enhanced the value of the premises.

On Defendant's Appeal.

4. Ejectment §148—Whether defendant was entitled to recovery for fertilizing held for jury.

In ejectment, whether fertilization of the soil by defendant in a special way was a permanent improvement, and substantially enhanced the value of the farm, held for the jury.

5. Ejectment §141—No recovery for ordinary fertilizing; "improvement."

In an action involving a farm, defendant could not recover for betterments consisting of mere cultivation of the soil in ordinary use of the land and fertilization thereof for the purpose of raising crops in the ordinary course of tillage, under C. S. § 701, an improvement under such statute not meaning a general enhancement in value from the occupant's operation.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Improvement.]

6. Ejectment §148—"Permanent Improvements" matter of fact for jury.

It is a matter of fact for the jury, rather than one of law, to estimate from evidence whether claimed permanent improvements have added permanent enhanced value to the realty, under C. S. § 701, a "permanent improvement" meaning such betterment as will add to the intrinsic value of the property at the time it is recovered by the plaintiff.

7. Ejectment §141—Not essential that they be useful to plaintiff.

It is not essential that claimed permanent improvements, for which defendant is claiming recovery in ejectment, be useful to the plaintiff, under C. S. § 701.

Walker and Allen, JJ., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Camden County; Calvert, Judge.

Action by J. A. Pritchard and others against D. E. Williams. From the judgment, both parties appeal. In plaintiff's appeal, no error, and, in defendant's appeal, error.

This was an action in ejectment in which the plaintiff recovered. 175 N. C. 319, 95 S. E. 510. A petition was filed for betterments and in the same case (176 N. C. 108, 96 S. E. 733) the court held (by Brown, J., for a unanimous court) that the petitioner (the defendant) was entitled to recover the same. Upon rehearing (178 N. C. 444, 101 S. E. 85) this judgment was reaffirmed. This is an appeal from the verdict and judgment upon the issues submitted, the only points presented being exceptions to the charge on the third issue as to the value of the betterments. Both parties assigned error and appealed.

Meekins & McMullan, of Elizabeth City, and D. H. Tillitt, of Camden, for plaintiffs.

R. C. Dozier and W. I. Halstead, both of South Mills, and Aydlett & Simpson and Ehringhaus & Small, all of Elizabeth City, for defendant.

Plaintiff's Appeal.

CLARK, C. J. [1] The court charged that the term "permanent improvements" includes "all improvements of a permanent nature, and which substantially enhanced the value of the property in controversy." The court charged further (the property being a farm) that:

"Putting up dwelling house, or tenant houses, barns and stables and other outbuildings, and any substantial improvements which might be made to those buildings, the necessary ditching and necessary or proper fencing, the digging of a well or planting of orchards, and cutting the timber in the course of clearing for cultivation, the grubbing of stumps, bushes, and reed patches necessary to clear and break the land for planting and cultivation, were permanent improvements on such property within the meaning of the statute"

—adding, however:

"That it was for the jury to determine whether or not such improvements, if the jury should find that any were made, enhanced the value of the property, and, if so, how much; and, while the jury should consider substantial additions or improvements to the buildings if made, they should not consider repairs to such buildings which should be made by the owner in the ordinary use of such property."

He further charged that ditching (embraced in the plaintiff's first exception), wire fencing (second exception), lightning rods (third exception), dwelling house, tenant houses, barns and stables, the digging of a well, and the planting of orchards and the like were permanent improvements only if they substantially enhanced the value of the property. In these instructions we find no error.

[2] The plaintiff's fourth and fifth exceptions were to the refusal of prayers to instruct the jury, which were based upon the idea that, since under the terms of the trust established in the main cause (175 N. C. 319, 95 S. E. 570), the plaintiff was decreed to be the owner of the life estate, he occupied the position of a life tenant with respect to the improvements made by him. But he was not an ordinary life tenant within the meaning of the principle that life tenants cannot recover for betterments which were placed thereon with the knowledge of that fact. The defendant made the improvements, as the jury find, under a bona fide belief that he was the owner in fee simple, and the court decided that the plaintiff was entitled to have the issue thereon submitted (178 N. C. 108, 96 S. E. 733) by a unanimous court, and this was reaffirmed on rehearing (178 N. C. 444, 101 S. E. 85). The plaintiff's prayers were therefore properly refused.

[3] Exceptions 6 and 7 to the refusal of prayers cannot be sustained. The defendant's right to recover for betterments does not depend upon the wish of plaintiff for them or the sufficiency of the buildings already upon the land. Railroad v. McCaskill, 98 N. C. 526, 4 S. E. 468. The sole question, the defendant having placed these improvements upon the land under a bona fide belief that he owned the premises in fee simple, is whether or not the things which were put thereon as permanent improvements "substantially enhanced the value of the premises." If so, the defendant was entitled to recover to the extent of such enhancement in value of the property caused thereby not exceeding the cost. In the plaintiff's appeal there is no error.

Defendant's Appeal.

[4] The exceptions on the defendant's appeal present but a single question, and that is whether the evidence therein offered, tending to show a large outlay and labor in preparing the soil to put it in condition for cultivation and improving the fertility permanently by the use of a judicious system of tillage and high-grade fertilization over and above the ordinary fertilization of the property from year to year, should be submitted to the jury.

The defendant offered to show as follows:

"That the defendant had also adopted and used a system of tillage with an idea of improving permanently the character of the soil and increasing its fertility, and that he had judiciously applied this system to the cultivation of this land; that he had burned and placed upon the land 8,000 bushels of oyster shells burned into lime; that he had placed 20 loads of manure upon the lands the first year besides that which came from the place; that he had placed upon these reclaimed acres 200 loads of manure a year in addition to the ordinary accumulation on the farm; that he had purchased and placed on it in addition to this an entire barge load of manure; that he had also placed upon the land 1,000 bushels of hard wood ashes each year, for nine years, same having been taken from his mill, which was located in the neighborhood; that he had sowed the land with peas and clover and plowed them in for the purpose of increasing its fertility; that he had in his system of tillage adopted a judicious system in the rotation of crops and deep plowing peculiarly adapted to this soil, for the purpose of increasing its fertility; that in addition to the 8,000 bushels of oyster shells burned into lime the defendant had placed on the land two carloads of agricultural lime of about 100 tons; that this was all in addition to the fertilizers used each year for the tillage of the crops and for which no claim is made; that in following this line of effort to improve the soil the defendant had made a cash outlay in excess of $4,230.18, and that in his opinion such efforts had enhanced the value of the property to this amount."

Whether the above were applied, and whether they substantially enhanced the value of the farm, was fit for the jury to consider, and we think it was error to exclude the testimony offered.

This evidence tends to show an unusual and successful effort by which a run-down farm of about 143 acres, which had lain idle for almost a generation, had been brought into a high state of cultivation and made, as the defendant contends upon the evidence, to "blossom like a rose." The mere cultivation of the soil in the ordinary use of the land and fertilization thereof for the purpose of raising crops in the ordinary course of tillage certainly would not constitute betterments. Only those things which substantially enhance the value of the premises permanently should be estimated by the jury and allowed to the defendant as compensation.

[5] The statute does not permit a recovery except for improvements that are permanent and valuable. The word "permanent" is defined in the Century Dictionary as "lasting or intended to last indefinitely," "fixed or enduring," "abiding," and the like, and it was held in Simpson v. Robinson, 37 Ark. 132, that an improvement does not mean a general enhancement in value from the occupant's operations.

It is elemental justice, as well as public policy, when a man occupies premises "having reason to believe" (C. S. 701) that he is owner thereof in fee simple, that to whatever extent he has increased the value of the property by permanent improvements thereon he should receive compensation from the party who recovers the premises.

The cultivation of the soil in a good and proper manner and the keeping of the buildings in repair and the land in good condition does not entitle the defendant to recover compensation, but permanent improvements by clearing the land, ditching, fencing, and likewise high fertilization of permanent effect (over and above the ordinary fertilization for the purpose of making the crops) causing enhancement in the value of the farm—all these things are properly for the consideration of the jury, who should find what is a fair allowance for the permanent enhancement in value of the property thereby at the time of the recovery of the premises by the plaintiff.

[§, 7] But it is matter of fact for the jury rather than one of law, to estimate upon the evidence whether any of these things have added permanent enhanced value to the realty. If a building is placed upon the premises, it will gradually decay, if ditches, fencing, or other betterments are made they will gradually deteriorate, if not kept up. "Permanent" improvements mean such betterments as will add to the intrinsic value of the property at the time it was recovered by the plaintiff. Whether there has been, in this case, unusually high fertilization of the land or the addition to the soil of vegetable or mineral matter whereby the property has been permanently enhanced in value, when there is evidence offered to that effect, is for the jury to determine in estimating the benefit which the plaintiff derived therefrom. In the course of time, by negligence, the buildings may deteriorate, and the enhanced production of the land may grow less, but the jury is to estimate what is the permanent added value to the premises at the time the plaintiff recovered the property. The difficulty is not in the principles of law applicable, but as to matters of fact arising upon the evidence, and which were for the jury to weigh and determine, and which can never be exactly the same in any two cases. If unsuitable buildings are put upon the premises, no matter what the cost, the jury can find that it was no enhancement to the property thereby, so if the ditching and fencing were unnecessary or injudiciously made, the jury would consider the same. But it is not essential that they be useful to the plaintiff. Railroad v. McCaskill, 98 N. C. 526, 4 S. E. 468.

The sole matter for consideration is embraced in one proposition and that is:

"How much was the value of the property permanently enhanced estimated as of the time of the recovery of the same, by the betterments put thereon by the labor and expenditure of the bona fide holder of the same?"

The matter is fully discussed and clearly set out in Gibson v. Fields, 79 Kan. 38, 98 Pac. 1112, 20 L. R. A. (N. S.) 378, 131 Am. St. Rep. 278, 17 Ann. Cas. 406, in the elaborate notes thereto appended.

Certain acts which amidst certain surroundings and conditions might enhance the property permanently, in other surroundings and conditions would add nothing to its permanent value. These are ordinarily matters for the jury, and no general rule can be laid down more definite than that above stated. In the defendant's appeal there was error.

STACY, J., concurs in result.

WALKER, J., dissenting, and Allen, J., concurring in the dissent. In 1907, defendant, Williams, received a deed for the lands in controversy from Mrs. Mary and Miss Mary Elizabeth Hughes, purporting to convey a fee simple. Defendant thereupon entered into possession of the lands, which he still occupies. In the main action, this court held that the plaintiff was entitled to recover the lands under the parol trust established. Under this trust, it is admitted that the defendant took from the Hugheses a life estate, and the plaintiffs in consequence were not entitled to offset rents for the period running from 1907 to the 15th day of May, 1915 inclusive, as against defendant's claim for betterments. At the time of the execution of the deed from the Hugheses to the defendant, Miss Mary Elizabeth Hughes was 44 years of age, having an expectancy of 25 years. Upon rendition of the judgment in the main action, defendant filed this petition, claiming compensation for alleged permanent improvements made from 1907 to 1918, inclusive; defendant being still in the possession of the land by the order of the court. At the trial it was admitted that the enhanced value of the land should be estimated as of the 15th day of May, 1915, the date of Miss Mary Elizabeth Hughes' death.

Defendant upon the trial offered to show the expense incurred in breaking soil preparatory to putting the land in cultivation, and that it was necessary to put it in cultivation. This testimony was excluded, and defendant excepted. In this connection, it is to be observed that at the time the defendant took possession of this land, it was all open land, which had theretofore been in cultivation, and which had only been permitted to "lie out" for a number of years in accordance with the well known practice of farmers, in order to restore fertility. In no view of the evidence was it wild land or prairie land which had never before been subject to cultivation.

The court permitted the defendant to offer evidence to show the cost of clearing this land—that is to say, the cost of cutting the trees upon the hedgerows, clearing hedges, the grubbing of stumps, and the taking out of reed patches—and further to show the enhanced value resulting from such improvements to the land and that the only testimony rejected was that to show the alleged cost of breaking the land; that is to say, when regarded in connection with the evidence received, the doing of necessary plowing to enable the land to be planted and cultivated.

The law which is, perhaps, applicable to wild or prairie lands, has no relevancy here. These lands had been in cultivation, but their fertility, perhaps had at one time been exhausted, and they had been permitted to "lie out," or remain fallow or uncultivated for one or more years, until they could by proper tillage and fertilization be made to yield a remunerative crop.

The doctrine of permanent improvements in cases of this kind is based upon the theory that one acting under a bona fide belief that he has the true title has done something the main purpose of which is to render the land more valuable, and does not include those things which, while they may have an incidental tendency to increase the value of the freehold, are yet done with the main purpose of increasing the current years revenue by producing a larger crop.

The defendant in this case was a life tenant, and he enriched the land, primarily at least, for his own benefit, that is, for the better enjoyment of the land by himself, and, even if there was a temporary enhancement of its value, it was purely incidental, and was not permanent in any correct sense of that word, as will presently be seen.

In any event, defendant, by the restriction of the statute, could not recover more than the amount actually expended by him in making the improvements, and plaintiffs asked for an instruction to this effect which was refused. Consol. Statutes of 1919, § 701.

The second exception is based upon his honor's exclusion of testimony tending to support the item in defendant's bill of particulars, entitled "Improvement to Soil, 1907 to 1918." In support of this claim, defendant offered to show that by a system of rotating crops and of plowing, and by the use upon this land of large quantities of stable manure, ashes, and lime, he had permanently improved it. The testimony was properly excluded as the law does not consider fertilization of the soil as constituting a permanent improvement. Crummey v. Bentley, 114 Ga. 746, 40 S. E. 765; Effinger v. Kenney, 92 Va. 245, 23 S. E. 742; Wright v. Johnson, 108 Va. 855, 62 S. E. 948. It may be admitted, for sake of argument, that where lands are judiciously cultivated and properly fertilized by a tenant for life or years, they may be more valuable at the end of the tenancy than if they had been subjected to a haphazard or injurious use, but the improvement is not of that lasting character as is contemplated by the betterment statute. It is further true, however, that it is the duty which such a tenant owes, either to his landlord or to the reversioner, to cultivate the lands judiciously, and that the main purpose of such method of cultivation and of proper fertilization also is to increase the present tenant's revenues by the greater crop yield during his term. It may be, and perhaps is, quite true that the effect of manure and lime upon land is more enduring than that of the ordinary commercial fertilizer, the latter being used mainly because the former is not readily obtainable; but the effect of all these is nevertheless temporary, lasting by common knowledge not more than 2 or 3 years, the ordinary commercial fertilizer being supposed to exhaust itself in about 1 year's time. The use of manure and lime is, in a word, fertilization—a better class of fertilization it may be, but nevertheless only fertilization. It is to be remembered also in this connection that at the time this land was fertilized by the defendant he owned a life estate, the expectancy whereof was 25 years, and which in fact endured for 9 years, during all of which the defendant occupied the land rent free, and it would be strange justice if the defendant, who has so occupied the land during this period, could recover for fertilization and judicious tillage during the period of his own life tenancy, when he was holding the lands for his own exclusive benefit.

Another reason why the testimony was properly excluded is that the defendant offered to show such fertilization and such tillage from 1907 to 1918, inclusive, together with the added value thereof to the land. Even assuming that these acts of defendant constituted permanent improvements, the defendant still could not recover for such improvements after the institution of this action in November, 1916, when he acquired full knowledge of the facts. It was the duty of the defendant, therefore, in offering this testimony, to restrict the same to the improvements claimed and the enhanced value of the land therefrom to the period for which defendant was entitled to recover for such enhancement. And, the defendant having failed to do so, and having included in his offered testimony as well the claim for improvements made after suit brought as those made before suit was brought, the testimony was properly rejected.

Reverting to the principal question, as to whether defendant could be allowed anything for cultivation, fertilization, tillage, etc., we find that the authorities are to the effect that he cannot have such remuneration, because these improvements are not of a permanent character. The court said in Crummey v. Bentley, supra:

"Another item consisted of a claim for improvement to the land by reason of fertilization. The court held that the defendants were not entitled to any allowance upon these claims; and we are of the opinion that, even giving to the act in question its widest possible scope and operation, the views entertained by the trial judge were undoubtedly sound."

CROWELL v. CROWELL. (No. 442.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. March 9, 1921.)

Husband and wife \S 205(2)—Wife can recover from husband for infecting her with venereal disease.

Under C. S. \S 2513, allowing a married woman to recover for personal injuries in an action by her alone, and section 454, allowing an action without joinder of her husband when it concerns her separate estate or is between herself and her husband, the wife can recover from her husband in an action of tort for his willful and deliberate act in infecting her with a venereal disease. (Per Stacy, J.)

On petition for rehearing. Petition dismissed.

For former opinion, see 180 N. C. 516, 105 S. E. 206.

T. A. Adams, of Charlotte, for petitioner.

STACY, J. Defendant's petition to rehear, filed in this cause, was referred to the writer, under rule 53 of the court (95 S. E. vii). It is not customary to assign any reasons for denying a petition to rehear; but, on account of the mooted questions involved and the wide difference of opinion among members of the bench and bar, I deem it not amiss to insert this memorandum in the record as an expression of my individual views.

It will be remembered that plaintiff, a married woman, brings this action against her husband, alleging that he wrongfully and recklessly infected her with a loathsome disease. It is conceded that prior to the enactment of chapter 13, Public Laws 1913, now C. S. 2513, this suit was not maintainable, but the act of 1913 provides:

"The earnings of a married woman by virtue of any contract for her personal service, and any damages for personal injuries, or other tort sustained by her, can be recovered by her suing alone, and such earnings or recovery shall be her sole and separate property as fully as if she had remained unmarried."

The burden of petitioner's brief is that this statute creates no substantive right, that it merely changes the rule of procedure, and that it applies only to such causes of action as could be maintained by the husband and wife as coplaintiffs before the law took effect. This position is supported by eminent authorities; but to my mind the reasons are not conclusive.

At common law the defendant's demurrer would have been sustained, because his wife could not maintain such an action suing alone; but his conduct would have been no less hurtful and injurious to her. His only defense now is that he and the plaintiff are one by reason of the marriage tie. Shylock in Shakespeare's Merchant of Venice, as he stood in court, insisting upon the terms of his bond, was in a better position than the defendant in this case. There nothing had been done to increase the burdens and hazards of the party obligated, but not so here. In the case at bar the strenuous demand for what is called the defendant's legal right forces plaintiff's counsel to play the role of Portia. A mere rule of procedure, based upon the unity of husband and wife, ought not to prevail over plaintiff's claim founded on a willful and deliberate wrong, especially in the face of a statute changing such rule. Surely the plaintiff with propriety can say to the defendant:

"If you claim immunity from suit under the common law by reason of our unity as husband and wife, you must not wrongfully and recklessly commit a tort upon my person, for I can now maintain an action for such a tort—our unity no longer being a bar to my suing alone—and your protection in such instance is taken away by the statute."

To hold otherwise would seem to forsake the substance for the shadow. Defendant forgets that his rights in the premises are relative, and not absolute.

Again, C. S. 454, provides that a wife may maintain an action without the joinder of her husband: (1) When the action concerns her separate property; (2) when the action is between herself and her husband. And it has been held with us that a wife may maintain an action against her husband to recover possession of her lands and damages for withholding the same, allowing the husband the right of ingress, egress, and regress only (Manning v. Manning, 79 N. C. 293, 28 Am. Rep. 324), and to enjoin her husband from interfering with her separate property or from collecting her rents (Robinson v. Robinson, 123 N. C. 137, 31 S. E. 371). See, also, Graves v. Howard, 159 N. C. 504, 75 S. E. 998, Ann. Cas. 1914C, 565. These authorities are decisive of the question so far as property rights are concerned.

But defendant contends that the act of 1913 above set out is not sufficiently inclusive in its terms to extend to a personal injury or tort sustained by one spouse from the other. In reply to this it may be observed that the right of a wife to sue her husband, under C. S. 454, is not limited by any provision of the statute to actions involving the rights of property only. Hence, considering the two sections together, I have no difficulty in arriving at the conclusion that the plaintiff's right to maintain this action is an entirely permissible construction.

Furthermore, I hold it to be a sound principle of law, and certainly approved in morals, that, although a man may have a legal right to do a given thing, yet he forfeits that right when he voluntarily and deliberately places himself in a position where it becomes impossible for him to exercise it without hurt or injury to another.

But it is not conceded that the position here taken denies to the defendant any protection which the law affords him. The gravamen of plaintiff's complaint is that the defendant, with knowledge of his diseased condition, willfully, deliberately, and recklessly communicated said vile and loathsome malady to his wife in total disregard for her health and safety. This, he never had a right to do. No such right ever existed. Petitioner apparently is confusing conjugal privileges and immunities, which had been forfeited in the instant case, with the personal rights of another.

The plaintiff having the right to sue alone under the statute, all other questions in the case are collateral to this one issue. Defendant's conduct was a willful and deliberate wrong committed without excuse or justification. The foundation of the plaintiff's cause of action is not a new tort, created by the statute, but an old principle newly applied.

I think the case was correctly decided in the first instance, and that the defendant's petition should be denied.

Petition dismissed.

HUTCHINSON et al. v. LUCAS et al.
(No. 57.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. March 9, 1921.)

Wills ¶602, 603(6)—Defeasible fee held not made indefeasible.

Where testator devised land to named son and directed that on son's death without issue the land should go to testator's other children "or their issue living at his death and to their heirs forever," the execution of quitclaim deed by the other children during named son's lifetime to purchaser of son's interest did not give purchaser an indefeasible fee, since, on death of any of such other children prior to son's death without issue, the issue of such other children would take notwithstanding parent's deed; the issue not being estopped by such deed, they taking under testator and not as heirs of the parents.

Appeal from Superior Court, Wilson County; Cranmer, Judge.

Action by John Hutchinson and others against W. A. Lucas and others. Judgment of dismissal, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Iredell Farmer devised the lands in controversy to his youngest son, Arthur D. Farmer, with the following condition:

"If my said son, Arthur D. Farmer, shall die without leaving issue, on his death it is my will and desire that all the lands devised in this will shall go to and be equally divided among my children or their issue living at his death and to their heirs forever."

It is not alleged that Arthur is dead, and the answer avers that he was in Wilson in 1918. The estate devised to Arthur was conveyed by an order of court, and thereafter in 1900 W. T. Farmer, Joshua L. Farmer, and Mary J. Farmer, the brothers and sister of Arthur, and the only other children of the testator, Iredell Farmer, executed a deed and quitclaim for all their right, title, and interest in the lands in controversy. Joshua L. Farmer, one of the brothers of Arthur, is dead, leaving a widow and five children.

The plaintiffs moved for judgment on the pleadings, but the court refused on the ground that they could not convey an indefeasible title and dismissed this action which was brought to compel the defendants to pay the purchase money upon the tendering of a deed therefor upon a contract of sale. The plaintiffs appealed.

Jas. S. Manning, of Raleigh, for appellants.
J. C. Biggs, of Raleigh, for appellees.

CLARK, C. J. The plaintiffs concede that the estate devised to Arthur is a defeasible fee, but they contend that the quitclaim executed by the brothers and sister of Arthur estopped their issue, and they rely upon Cherry v. Cherry, 179 N. C. 4, 101 S. E. 504. The devise in that case is different from that in this.

In the present case it is provided that upon the death of Arthur Farmer without leaving issue the land shall go to and be equally divided among the testator's children, "or their issue living at Arthur's death" and their heirs forever. If one or more of the children of the testator should not be living at Arthur's death, then "their issue," that is, the children or grandchildren of the testator's deceased children, living at that time, would take the share that otherwise would have gone to their deceased parent; for it cannot be known until the death of Arthur who will be living at his death. It does not appear that he is dead, and the presumption is that he is still living. One of his brothers is already dead, and, if Arthur should die without leaving issue, at his death any children of the deceased brother who may be living at that time would take an interest under the will, and the deed of their father would not estop them because they do not claim under him, but the title passes to his issue directly from the testator to them. Benson v. Benson, 180 N. C. 106, 104 S. E. 68; Burden v. Lipsitz, 166 N. C. 523, 82 S. E. 863; Whitfield v. Garria, 134 N. C. 24, 45 S. E. 904.

Though when the holders of a contingent estate are specified and known they may assign and convey it and can make a deed which will conclude all claiming under them, Hobgood v. Hobgood, 169 N. C. 485, 86 S. E. 189, yet "where the heirs, issue, or children are so designated as to take by purchase, under the terms of the will, there is no estoppel or rebuttal as they do not take from their ancestor by descent, but directly from the deviser as purchasers," Malloy v. Acheson, 179 N. C. 95, 101 S. E. 606. This was fully discussed and is so held in Whitesides v. Cooper, 115 N. C. 570, 20 S. E. 295, which has been repeatedly cited since. See citations in Anno, Ed.

The plaintiffs rely upon Cherry v. Cherry, 179 N. C. 4, 101 S. E. 504, but in that case the provision was that upon failure of the first takers the land should go to the testator's three sons absolutely, and the court held that the additional words in that devise "to be equally divided between them or among their heirs per stirpes and not per capita" did not prevent the estate from vesting absolutely in the sons, and hence they would be estopped, and their heirs also, by any conveyance of their vested contingent interest. In the present case, the words "or their issue living at their death" can be construed only as meaning that the testator intended that upon the death of Arthur, without leaving issue, the land should go to and be equally divided between his other children if living, or, if they were not living, then their issue living at that time should take. The added words at the end, "and their heirs forever," show that the testator intended to give the remainder in fee to his other children, or the issue of any deceased children who might be living at the time of the death of Arthur, if he died without leaving issue. The intent of the testator was that if his other children were living at Arthur's death, he leaving no issue, they should get the remainder, but that, if any of his children were dead at that time, their issue, if living at that time, would get the share of the deceased child.

The plaintiffs rely upon Hobgood v. Hobgood, 169 N. C. 489, 86 S. E. 189, and Bourne v. Farrar, 180 N. C. 135, 104 S. E. 170, which hold that when those who shall take a contingent interest are certain, by uniting with the owners of the preceding estate, they can pass a good title, but when "the owners of the contingent interest cannot be ascertained until the determination of the preceding estate, an indefeasible title cannot be made until then." Wichard v. Craft, 175 N. C. 128, 95 S. E. 94, in which case Allen, J., in a very brief opinion, points out tersely but clearly the distinction between the two classes of cases.

The words in this devise "or to their issue living at his (Arthur's) death" brings this case under the ruling of Burden v. Lipsitz, supra, and that class of cases. In Smith v. Lumber Co., 155 N. C. 389, 71 S. E. 445, which is very much in point, the court held that, where the vesting of the contingent interest is determined by the death of the children named and not upon the death of the testator, each of the children takes a contingent remainder; but, if they die before the death of the owner of the defeasible fee (leaving no issue), then the grandchildren, or issue of the children, take as purchasers under the will and not under the children of the testator, and hence will not be estopped by any conveyance or quitclaim of their ancestor.

The doctrine so clearly stated in Whitesides v. Cooper, 115 N. C. 570, 20 S. E. 295, has been often approved, among other cases by Thompson v. Humphrey, 179 N. C. 52, 101 S. E. 738; Williams v. Biggs, 176 N. C. 50, 96 S. E. 643.

Affirmed.

(191 N. C. 59)

ROBERSON v. STOKES et al. (No. 172.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. March 9, 1921.)

1. Trial \S 203(3)—Charge as to phase of evidence must state contentions of both parties.

Where the trial court undertakes to charge the jury on a particular phase of the evidence, he must state the law as applicable to the respective contentions of each party upon such phase of the evidence.

2. Trial \S 191(7)—Charge on defense of father held erroneous as assuming attack by plaintiff.

In a civil action for assault and battery against a father and son, where the plaintiff testified that the defendant father was the aggressor, an instruction that, if one attacks a father without cause, the son has a right to protect the father from serious bodily harm, was erroneous for assuming the truth of defendant's testimony as to the affray and omitting to state the law applicable to plaintiff's version.

3. Assault and battery \S 14—Defense of father must be necessary, and not excessive.

The right of a son to defend his father against an attack is no broader than the right of the father to defend himself, so that in civil action for assault and battery an instruction that the son had the right to protect his father from serious bodily harm was too broad as not limiting the right to cases of necessity and to the use of only sufficient force for the purpose.

4. Trial \S 191(7)—Hypothetical instructions forbidden.

In civil action for assault and battery, an instruction that, "If I attack one of you without cause, your son has the right to protect you from serious bodily harm," stated the question hypothetically, which is forbidden, because proceeding on an assumption of facts.

5. Trial ⚡86, 255(4)—Special objection must be made to evidence competent for particular purpose or limiting instruction asked.

Where evidence was offered which was competent for one purpose but not for another, the party objecting thereto is required by Supreme Court rule 27 (164 N. C. 548, 81 S. E. xi) to specify the ground of his objection, or to ask the judge to restrict it within proper limits.

6. Assault and battery ⚡26—Burden of justifying admitted assault is on defendant in civil action.

In a civil action for assault and battery, where the defendant admitted making the assault and battery, the burden of proof is on him to prove the justification.

Appeal from Superior Court, Pitt County; Bond, Judge.

Civil action for assault and battery by L. H. Roberson against W. G. Stokes and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. New trial.

Plaintiff alleged that he and W. G. Stokes, father of the other defendant, had some disagreement about a telephone. W. G. Stokes seeming to be very much "wrought up" about it. That they got into a heated controversy. Plaintiff testified:

"I told him to keep his mouth out of my business. He then stepped over to a pile of bricks, and I shoved him on them. About that time I saw his son, W. F. Stokes, coming with a brick in each hand, and I knew they had me foul. The boy threw one brick at me, which went over my head, but the next one hit me, and I spinned around, wrenched my ankle, and fell. Before I could recover and get up, W. G. Stokes jumped astraddle of me and hit me with a brick. I did not know anything else. Some boys took me up. When I recovered I found W. G. Stokes standing over me. As a result of the wound I went to the hospital; Dr. Basnight phoned Dr. Taylor and he took me to the hospital. I think I was in the hospital about 10 days. I was totally unable to do anything for about 30 days."

Plaintiff further testified that afterwards his ability to labor was considerably impaired, and that he suffered pains in his head, whereas before he received the blow he could do any kind of hard work. This testimony is stated: First, to show the serious character of the assault upon him; and, secondly, the wide difference between the parties in their several versions of the facts.

The defendants denied the truth of plaintiff's testimony, and W. G. Stokes stated, on the contrary, that he and plaintiff had an altercation, and plaintiff cursed him. He then said:

"I had nothing to defend myself with, and I knew he was dangerous. I walked to a pile of brick and he jumped on me. It was all so quick I hardly knew what had happened, but I heard my son say, 'Get off of Papa.' I did not touch him a lick. I was as far as from here to Col. James from the brick and had no brick. At the time he jumped on me I was not trying to strike him. He jumped on me and threw me down. I turned him over, but did not hit him. In the trial before I understood that William hit him. * * * The scuffle lasted about one minute and a half. I won't tell the jury whether he was struck in the face while he was standing up or while he was on me. I was able to turn him over. I am sure he was hit while he was on me, because I was able to turn him over. I stood over him until the people came there and took him away. They all came right over there. I was straddle of him, but I did not offer to hit him; I had nothing to hit him with. I never had a fight in my life; have never been in court. He did not hit me with a brick. He would have killed me if William had not come to me in time. My son saved my life. He is a heavy man. I am no fighter myself."

W. F. Stokes testified:

"I noticed Roberson coming toward my father. He was cursing, and I realized that my father was in danger, and I thought it was my duty to protect him. Roberson had my father down, and, running toward him, I picked up a brick and threw it at him as a warning, but he did not get off. By that time Roberson was on the bottom and my father was on top. I had two bricks in my hand, and I threw both of them. Roberson was on my father when I threw the first and second brick. They were about 10 or 15 feet from the pile of brick. I did not see my father have any brick in his hand. There was no brick within his reach. I threw the first brick as a warning, and it went over his head. I knew that the second brick that I threw hit him. It hit him on the head. Then my father turned him over. At the time I threw the second brick, I thought it was necessary to save my father's life. I knew it was a matter of life and death. I have known Mr. Roberson all of his life."

The court gave the jury this instruction, to which the plaintiff excepted:

"If I go out there to-day when one of you has done nothing to cause trouble and knock you down, and your son sees me with you down, the law says your son has a right to protect you from serious bodily harm at my hands."

This instruction was given after his honor had read from Wharton on Homicide (3d Ed.) at bottom of page 775, on the right of a son to defend his father.

The judge also charged that the burden as to both issues was upon the plaintiff, when the defendant W. F. Stokes admitted that he had struck the plaintiff with the brick, or that he had hurled the brick at him, "hitting the mark exactly."

The verdict was against the plaintiff as to all the issues, and from the judgment thereon he appealed.

Julius Brown, of Greenville, for appellant.
F. G. James & Son, of Greenville, for appellees.

WALKER, J. (after stating the facts as above). There are 27 assignments of error, but we need refer to only 2 of them, though there may be others worthy of serious consideration, as strongly contended by the plaintiff's counsel; but we must not be taken as intimating that there was any error except in the respect now indicated by us.

[1] It was erroneous to charge the jury as set forth in the above statement of the case for two reasons: (1) It was based upon the assumption that defendants' version of the assault was the correct one, whereas there was evidence that defendants were in the wrong throughout, and the jury therefore had the law stated to them with only a partial and contracted view of the evidence. This method of charging a jury has been disapproved by us. Where a phase of the evidence is presented to the jury, both contentions in regard to it should be given; otherwise it might cause the jury to give undue weight and significance to the one stated. The very question was discussed in Jarrett v. Trunk Co., 144 N. C. 299, 56 S. E. 937, where it was said that, although it be not error generally to refrain from giving instructions unless asked to do so, yet care must be taken when the judge thinks proper to instruct the jury upon a phase of the evidence and to expound the law in relation thereto, not only to state it correctly, but to state the law as applicable to the respective contentions of each party upon such phase of the evidence. Having undertaken to tell the jury how they should answer that issue if they found such facts according to plaintiff's contention, it was manifestly incumbent upon the court to state the defendant's contentions in respect to such phase of the evidence and to instruct the jury how to answer the issue should they sustain such contention. State v. Austin, 79 N. C. 626; Burton v. Railroad, 84 N. C. 197; Bynum v. Bynum, 33 N. C. 636; State v. Wolf, 122 N. C. 1081, 29 S. E. 841.

[2] The phase mentioned by his honor was flatly denied by the plaintiff, and a very different complexion given to it by him. The judge's illustration, based, as it was, on the assumption that plaintiff was the sole aggressor, and that W. G. Stokes did nothing to bring on the fight, but was illegally assaulted by the plaintiff and knocked down, was not justified by the evidence, as there was plenty of evidence to show that it was not true, but that the defendants were the aggressors, W. G. Stokes having attempted to attack the plaintiff with a brick, and that the latter acted in self-defense, and that the other defendant wrongfully and unlawfully joined in the attack upon him, having no just or legal ground for his intervention, which was simply voluntary and gratuitous on his part. It was therefore required, under the principle stated in Jarrett v. Trunk Co., supra, and the cases therein cited, that the judge should have stated both sides of the evidence bearing on that particular phase. Such an instruction was peculiarly required, under the circumstances of this case, and the incompleteness of the one given, in the respect indicated, may have turned the scales against the plaintiff, and probably did. What the judge did say afterwards was not sufficient to cure the error.

[3] The instruction also was too broad, because it leaves out of consideration the necessity for the interference of the son, which is a question for the jury, and apparently omits any reference to excessive force. It was held in State v. Johnson, 75 N. C. 174:

"The proposition is true that the wife has the right to fight in the necessary defense of the husband, the child in defense of his parent, the servant in defense of the master, and reciprocally; but the act of the assistant must have the same construction in such cases as the act of the assisted party should have had if it had been done by himself; for they are in a mutual relation one to another. Although the law respects the human passions, yet it does not allow this interference as an indulgence of revenge, but merely to prevent injury. The son, therefore, is allowed to fight only in the necessary defense of the father; and to excuse himself he must plead and show that Shipwash would have beaten his father had the son not interfered. 3 Bl. 3, and note; 1 Hale Pl. Cr. 484; Bac. Ab. "Master and Servant," P. There was evidence in the case that the father and Shipwash were engaged in a fight upon equal terms, and, it not appearing which was the aggressor, the law presumes that they were fighting by mutual consent, and were both guilty. The son therefore had no right to make the assault."

This question is fully discussed by Justice Allen, in State v. Greer, 162 N. C. at page 649, 78 S. E. at page 313, and, quoting from Wharton on Homicide, § 521, he says:

"The general rule, as ordinarily stated, is that a brother or other relative assisting another in resisting a wrongful act directed against the latter can use no more force than the person he assists would be entitled to use, and that interference to protect a relative is not justified where the relative was the aggressor in the original difficulty. A person has a right to use violence in defense of another only when the imperiled person would have been justified in using it in his own defense. Both must have been free from fault in bringing on the difficulty."

And further Stanley v. Com., 86 Ky. 443, 6 S. W. 156, 9 Am. St. Rep. 306, is quoted, as follows:

"Not only, however, may he do this, but another may do it for him. This other person, in such a case, steps into the place of the assailed; and there attaches to him not only the rights, but also the responsibilities, of the one whose cause he espouses. If the life of such person be in immediate danger and its protection requires life for life, or if such danger and necessity be reasonably apparent, then the volunteer may defend against it, even to the extent of taking life, provided the party in whose defense he acts was not in fault."

The son could do only what his father could rightfully do, and must be judged by his rights and responsibilities, "because," as Hale said, "they are in a mutual relation one to another." The jury must find the facts, including the necessity of intervention by the son, and whether he kept within his privilege.

[4] This instruction stated the question hypothetically, which is forbidden. There was evidence that the father not only entered into the fight willingly, which made it an affray in the best view for him and the son, but that he started the fight and was the aggressor. It has been said by us that hypothetical instructions should not be indulged in as they proceeded upon the assumption of facts. State v. Collins, 30 N. C. 407; State v. Benton, 19 N. C. 196; Johnson v. Bell, 74 N. C. 355.

[5] As to the defendant W. G. Stokes, we need not discuss any of the other exceptions, but we will briefly refer to one piece of evidence. W. F. Stokes was permitted to testify that he went to assist his father because he heard of threats made by plaintiff, and also knew of them. The testimony was competent to show his motive or reason for going to the place when the affray occurred, but it should have been confined within its proper limits, and to the only purpose for which it was evidently offered, as otherwise it may have prejudiced the plaintiff upon the defendant's pleas of self-defense. Ordinarily, when evidence is competent for one purpose, but not for another, the party objecting should make his objection special, directing it to the incompetent part of the question, or of the answer, as the case may be. It seems here to have been offered only for a competent purpose, and it does not appear that it was otherwise used. We will have to apply rule 27 of this court (164 N. C. 548, 81 S. E. xi) requiring counsel, who objects to evidence which is competent for one purpose, but not for another, to specify the ground of his objection, or to ask the judge to restrict it within its proper limits.

[6] As to the defendant W. F. Stokes, we are of the opinion that the judge erred in stating that the burden of proof was upon the plaintiff, as W. F. Stokes admitted that he assaulted the plaintiff, and this admission shifted the burden to him.

We therefore conclude that there should be a new trial as to both defendants for the errors stated by us, and for that reason the verdict will be set aside, and the case will proceed further in the court below according to law.

New trial.

HAGOOD V. HOLLAND et al. (No. 174.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. March 9, 1921.)

1. Brokers ~~€~~44—Naked power to sell at net price may be revoked.

A naked power given a broker to sell property, with a commission for selling payable out of the proceeds of sale over and above a certain amount, may be revoked by the owner.

2. Brokers ~~€~~11—Amount paid by broker to copartner for interest in broker's contract not recoverable as damages on revocation.

In a broker's action for revocation of a contract with him and a copartner, the amount paid by him to his copartner for his interest in the contract held not a proper item of damages, not being within the contemplation of the parties at time of its execution.

Appeal from Superior Court, Craven County; Bond, Judge.

Action by B. E. Hagood against J. C. Holland and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. New trial.

Civil action brought to recover damages for an alleged breach of contract, the material parts of which were as follows:

"Aug. 26, 1919.

"I have employed Hagood-Grantham Real Estate Company to sell for us our farm situate in the county of Jones, state of North Carolina, to wit (here appeared description of property), at the price of $20,000.00 net on the following terms: One third cash, balance three years, 6% interest, if the same is sold by January 1, 1920. Said Hagood-Grantham Real Estate Company to pay all costs of advertising they may choose to do.

"This 26th day of August, 1919.

"[Signed] Mrs. L. E. Holland.

"[Signed] J. C. Holland.

"Witness: J. C. Singleton, 217 Castle Street, Wilmington, N. C."

On the back of this agreement is the following indorsement:

"Mr. Hagood & Grantham we must have $500.00 by the first of November to confirm the trade, if not, the within agreement is null and void. We have to do this in case you do not sell, so as to give us time to rent out for another year 1920.

"J. O. Holland."

Defendants admitted the execution of said contract; but contended, and offered evidence tending to show, that the same was revoked on October 3, 1919. The defendants tendered an issue upon the question of revocation, which the court declined to submit. Exception duly noted.

On the issue of damages, plaintiff was permitted to testify, over objection, that when the partnership firm of Hagood-Grantham Real Estate Company, composed of B. E.

Hagood and L. T. Grantham, was dissolved, plaintiff paid his copartner $1,000 for his interest in the contract sued on in this action.

Upon issues joined, there was a verdict and judgment in favor of the plaintiff. Defendants appealed.

L. Clayton Grant, of Wilmington, and Ward & Ward, of New Bern, for appellants.
Moore & Dunn, of New Bern, for appellee.

STACY, J. [1] Under authority of Abbott v. Hunt, 129 N. C. 403, 40 S. E. 119, and Real Estate Co. v. Sasser, 179 N. C. 497, 103 S. E. 73, we think his honor should have submitted to the jury an issue on the defendants' alleged revocation of the contract. The Sasser Case is on all fours with the case at bar—the two being identical in principle—and what is said there need not be repeated here. We consider the above cases controlling authorities.

[2] We think the court also erred in permitting the plaintiff to testify to the effect that he had paid his copartner the sum of $1,000 for his interest in the contract. In no event could this be considered as a proper item in assessing the plaintiff's damages. It was not money expended in an effort to secure a purchaser, nor was it any loss of profits within the rule applicable to such loss. Plaintiff purchased the entire contract subject to the defendants' right of revocation, and such a purchase was not within the contemplation of the parties at the time of its execution. This would take the amount, thus expended, out of the category of recoverable damages.

The remaining exceptions need not be considered, as the questions presented by them may not arise upon another hearing.

New trial.

(181 N. C. 516)

STATE v. ROBINSON. (No. 161.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. March 9, 1921.)

1. Criminal law §386—Action of bloodhounds held admissible to connect defendant with crime.

The action of English bloodhounds in following the trail from point of commission of crime to the defendant is properly receivable in evidence where it is shown that they were accustomed to pursue the human track and had been found reliable in such cases theretofore.

2. Assault and battery §95—Evidence held sufficient to justify submission of case to jury.

In a prosecution for secret assault by shooting, evidence including the tracing of tracks to defendant's place by English bloodhounds and the action of the dogs in relation to defendant, the fact that he made no comment as to the dogs or the presence of the crowd at his house, together with other evidence, including that of his procuring a gun and existence of a grudge, held sufficient to justify the submission of the case to the jury.

3. Criminal law §752½—On defendant's motion for nonsuit state's testimony is to be taken as true.

In a prosecution for secret assault, the testimony of defendant and his wife that he was at home on the occasion of the shooting at another place and other evidence in support of such claim cannot be considered as bearing on the legal proposition involved in defendant's motion for nonsuit, which must be decided on the state's testimony and on the supposition that it is true.

4. Criminal law §822(16)—Instruction as to reasonable doubt held harmless in view of instructions as a whole.

In a criminal prosecution an excerpt from the instructions that, "if the state by the greater weight or preponderance of the evidence has shown to you the guilt of the defendant, you should find him guilty beyond a reasonable doubt," is ambiguous, and, if not the mistake of the stenographer, is clearly an inadvertence which could not possibly have misled the jury as to the degree of proof in view of a consideration of the whole charge, which in several places correctly required the jury to find the defendant guilty beyond a reasonable doubt.

Appeal from Superior Court, Pamlico County; Bond, Judge.

C. E. Robinson charged with secret assault, was convicted of an assault with a deadly weapon, and he appeals. No error.

O. L. Abernethy, H. A. Tolson, Jesse Davis, and George Willis, all of New Bern, F. C. Brinson and Z. V. Rawls, both of Bayboro, and Ward & Ward, of New Bern, for appellant.

James S. Manning, Atty. Gen., and Frank Nash, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

HOKE, J. [1] It is chiefly urged for error by appellant that the court refused to enter judgment of nonsuit, but on the record the objection cannot be sustained. Accepting the testimony tending to establish defendant's guilt as true, the established rule on motions of this character, it appears that on the evening of November 14, 1918, at 7:30 p. m., the prosecutor, L. T. Daniels, was sitting at a table in a front room of his house, when he was shot through the window by some person then unknown and unobserved standing in front of the house, the charge being No. 6 and 8 bird shot, 19 of the shot taking effect in his head; that next morning about 6:30 a. m. two English bloodhounds were brought to the place by the owner, W. A. Harmon, and put on the apparent track of the person who did the shooting, and followed the trail down the intervening roads to defendant's house, one of the dogs whinnied up at the cart where defendant was then sitting just about to leave on some business, one witness saying that one of the dogs reared up on the cart and another that they followed same to the gate as defendant drove off, and being then stopped, and after defendant left the house the dogs went through the yard and up to a hog pen where it was shown defendant had been that morning; that defendant made no protest or comment on the presence of the crowd who had come to his house or to the action of the dogs, but, after taking $1.50 paid him by one of the crowd, he drove off without further remark. It was shown that as the dogs pursued the trail they once or twice left the trail to go into a nearby yard, but always returned to it till they carried it to the yard of defendant as stated. There was evidence to the effect that the dogs were English bloodhounds who were trained and accustomed to follow the human track and had been found reliable in their work; that out in the yard or near it and not far from the window at a point or in the direction where one must have stood to shoot into the house the grass appeared to be trodden down, and near it were some gun shells, and just over the fence and in a line towards the window was a wad from a gun discharge. There was also evidence of the state tending to show that the year before defendant had paid plaintiff $500 to be relieved from a land trade in which they had entered, and when prosecutor afterwards sold the land for same price to others, defendant had made demand for a return of the $500 or part of it, and from time to time had persisted in this demand on plaintiff. It was shown further that the gun of defendant when examined on the morning the dogs went to the house showed that one barrel had been recently fired, and that on Saturday before the shooting defendant had endeavored to procure the gun of a neighbor, but failed. It appeared also that the owner of the dogs, who had charge of them on the occasion, was not aware that defendant was in any way suspected or of the existence of any grudge between them. Defendant on the witness stand testified and claimed that the effort to procure the gun of a neighbor was because he desired a gun of smaller barrel to hunt birds with; also that he had been hunting birds the Saturday before and had left two dead birds in his bag which had spoiled, causing an odor when he threw them out; the state contending that this was an effort to weaken the impression caused by the action of the dogs in his yard and was a circumstance in support of its claim of guilt.

In State v. McIver, 176 N. C. 718, 96 S. E. 902, it was stated as the correct summary of our decisions on the admission in evidence of the action of bloodhounds that their action constitutes and is properly receivable in evidence when it is shown that they have been accustomed and trained to pursue the human track, have been found by experience reliable in such cases, and further that in the particular instance they were put on the trail of the guilty party and have pursued and followed it under such circumstances and in such a way as to afford substantial assurance or permit a reasonable inference of identification, citing, among other authorities, State v. Wiggins, 171 N. C. 814, 89 S. E. 58, State v. Norman, 153 N. C. 591, 68 S. E. 917, State v. Freeman, 146 N. C. 615, 60 S. E. 986, State v. Moore, 129 N. C. 501, 39 S. E. 626, 55 L. R. A. 96, and State v. Dickinson, 77 Ohio St. 34, and, as stated, the position has been fully approved in the later case of State v. Yearwood, 178 N. C. 813, 101 S. E. 513.

[2] In the present instance these dogs and their action in the premises seem to meet every requirement embodied and approved in these and other cases on the subject, and, supported as it is by the existence of a grudge between the parties, the condition of defendant's gun the morning after the shooting, and his unusual conduct in leaving his home the morning after with the dogs and crowd there in his yard, without comment or protest, and his evident effort to account for the action of the dogs in whining up at him in his wagon, affords sufficient evidence of guilt and fully upholds the action of the court in submitting the issue to the jury.

[3] True, defendant, a witness in his own behalf, denies absolutely that he shot the prosecutor, and both he and his wife testify that he was at home on the occasion, some distance away, and there is some evidence ultra in support of their statement and claim, but this testimony, coming from defendant, may not be considered, and has no bearing on the legal proposition involved in defendant's motion to nonsuit, and which, as stated, must be decided on the state's testimony and on the supposition that same is true.

[4] Defendant excepts further to a portion of the charge in which his honor said to the jury:

"If the state by the greater weight or preponderance of the evidence has shown to you the guilt of the defendant, you should find him guilty beyond a reasonable doubt."

In reference to the trial of causes before the jury, this court has repeatedly given approval to the position that—

The charge of a trial judge "must be considered as a whole in the same connected way in which it was given, and upon the presumption that the jury did not overlook any portion of it. If, when so construed, it presents the law fairly and correctly, it will afford no ground for reversing the judgment, though some of the expressions, when standing alone, might be regarded as erroneous." State v. Exum, 188 N. C. 599-602 (50 S. E. 288).

While this excerpt, if it stood alone, might be objectionable, it does not stand alone. Immediately before and as a part of the same clause, the court had instructed the jury in definite terms that "the burden is on the state to show beyond a reasonable doubt the guilt of the defendant." And in 12 or 14 other parts of the charge the court in direct terms or by express recognition instructed the jury that "in order to a conviction the guilt of defendant must be established beyond a reasonable doubt." The excerpt objected to is in itself ambiguous, and, if not a mistake of the stenographer, is so clearly an inadvertence on the part of his honor that the jury could not possibly have been misled as to the degree of proof required, and applying the wholesome principle to which we have adverted, and considering the charge as a whole, we are well assured that the guilt of defendant has been established under correct principles of law, and on authority the exception should be disallowed. State v. Baldwin, 178 N. C. 693, 100 S. E. 345.

The remaining exceptions are without merit, and on careful consideration of the entire record we are of opinion that the trial is free from reversible error, and the judgment of the court should be affirmed.

No error.

OXWELD ACETYLENE CO. v. DAVIS.
(No. 10578.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Feb. 28, 1921.)

1. Sales \S 23(3)—Order for goods is a proposal and becomes executory contract upon acceptance and executed upon delivery.

An order for goods is but a proposal, and is not a contract until accepted by the seller, and upon written acceptance it becomes an executory contract, and when the seller delivers the goods it becomes executed.

2. Sales \S 23(2) — Buyer may countermand before seller's acceptance in absence of contrary agreement.

A mere proposal to purchase goods may be countermanded by the buyer without liability at any time before seller's acceptance, unless there be an agreement founded upon a consideration that there shall be no countermand.

3. Sales \S 23(2)—Buyer may not countermand where contract forbids cancellation without written agreement.

After seller's acceptance of buyer's order, the contract becomes executory in the absence of an express contrary stipulation, and the buyer may before delivery stop performance by explicit direction, though he subjects himself to payment of damages, but such right does not exist where the contract provided that it could not be canceled or revoked by either party after acceptance of order except by agreement in writing.

4. Sales \S 340—Seller's remedy for buyer's countermand after delivery of goods is by action for price.

Where an executory sales contract has become executed by delivery of the goods according to the contract's terms, the buyer's right to countermand is gone, and the seller's remedy is an action for the purchase price.

5. Sales \S 161—Delivery to carrier in accordance with contract is delivery to buyer.

Delivery of goods to a carrier according to the contract was delivery to buyer.

6. Sales \S 81(2)—Seller may deliver within reasonable time where contract fixes no date.

Where a written sales contract specified no time for delivery, seller was authorized to ship goods within a reasonable time.

7. Principal and agent \S 103(12)—Provision that verbal agreement shall not affect written conditions estops party from claiming otherwise.

Where buyer signed an order for goods on a paper furnished by seller's agent providing that no verbal statements of the agent or representative of seller should modify the terms of the writing, buyer is estopped to defend an action for his failure to accept the goods on the ground of an oral agreement with the agent for a later delivery.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Laurens County; T. S. Sease, Judge.

Action by the Oxweld Acetylene Company against S. J. Davis. Judgment for plaintiff, and the defendant appeals. Affirmed.

F. P. McGowan, of Laurens, for appellant.
Dial & Todd, of Laurens, for respondent.

COTHRAN, J. Action upon a written contract for the sale of a gas-lighting outfit, to recover the agreed purchase price; the plaintiff alleging delivery in accordance with the contract and nonpayment by the defendant.

On March 26, 1918, the defendant signed a written order for a lighting outfit to be furnished by the plaintiff f. o. b. at its factory, for which he agreed to pay $243.75. The order was obtained by an agent of the plaintiff. He promptly forwarded it to the home office, where it was duly accepted by the plaintiff on March 30th. On April 3d the outfit was delivered to a common carrier at Chicago, consigned open to the defendant at Laurens, S. C. The shipment arrived at Laurens on April 22d. The defendant was promptly notified of its arrival, but declined to accept it. The goods remained in the hands of the terminal carrier for the time required by law, at the expiration of which they were sold by the carrier for charges as unclaimed freight, at what is commonly known as an "old boss" sale, and we assume have become practically a total loss to both parties to this controversy.

On the 8th of April, five days after the goods were delivered by the plaintiff to the common carrier for transportation, the defendant wrote to the plaintiff, asking them to cancel his order for the lighting plant. This letter was received by the plaintiff on April 11th and was answered on the 12th, the plaintiff declining to accede to the request, and stating, "Your contract was accepted by this company on March 30th and is not subject to countermand." The defendant replied to this letter on April 16th, reiterating his countermand, and declaring that he would not take the outfit at any price, as he had learned "they are dangerous."

The defendant interposed several defenses to the action: (1) That the agreement was that the outfit should not be shipped until August 1st; that the shipment on April 3d was therefore premature; (2) that the contract was induced by the fraudulent misrepresentations of plaintiff in reference to the quality and adaptability of the machine to domestic uses; (3) that the order had been countermanded soon after it was given; (4) that the plaintiff by its negligence had brought upon itself the loss occasioned by the defendant's countermand and refusal to accept the outfit. At the conclusion of all of the testimony each party moved for a directed verdict; the issue being dependent upon the efficacy of the foregoing defenses. The circuit judge granted the motion of the plaintiff, and a verdict in its favor was returned for $260.81.

The main question in this case is the right of the defendant to countermand the written order for the lighting outfit signed by him on March 26, 1918.

[1] An order for goods is but a proposal; it is not a contract until it has been accepted by the seller. Upon written acceptance, it becomes a contract executory, although in a sense executed, just as the formal execution of a note or mortgage or other contract by which for a valuable consideration one agrees to do or not to do a particular thing does not alter the executory character of such engagement. When the seller acts upon the accepted order by delivering the goods, the engagement assumes the character of an executed contract.

[2] While the written order for the goods remains unaccepted by the seller, being a mere proposal, it may at any time be countermanded by the buyer, without any legal liability on his part to the seller, unless, as suggested by the court in Moneyweight Scale Co. v. Gordon Mercantile Co., 102 S. C. 419, 86 S. E. 1060, there be an agreement founded upon consideration that there shall be no countermand.

[3] After the order has been accepted by the seller and the proposal thereby becomes an executory contract, in the absence of an express stipulation in the contract to the contrary, the buyer may before delivery recall the order and stop performance on the other side by an explicit direction to that effect, though he thereby subjects himself to the payment of such damages as will compensate the other party for the loss he may have sustained by reason of having his performance of the contract checked. This right, however, does not exist where it is expressly denied by the terms of the contract, as in this case, the contract providing:

"Upon the acceptance of this order the contract so made cannot be canceled or revoked by either party * * * except by agreement in writing."

The defendant's right to countermand the order therefore expired with the acceptance of the order by the plaintiff on March 30th.

[4] There is great contrariety of opinion upon the question of the seller's appropriate remedy where the buyer has repudiated such executory contract or refuses to comply; that is, after acceptance of the order by the seller and before the delivery of the goods. It is not necessary now to decide that question, and we are not to be understood as doing so, but we may say that the latest deliverance of this court on the subject, in the case last cited, indicates very strongly, if it does not decide, that the remedy is an action for damages on account of the breach of the contract, and not an action for the purchase price of the goods. See particularly the concurring opinion of Mr. Justice Hydrick.

But the situation is very different where the executory contract has become an executed contract by the delivery of the goods according to the terms of the contract. Then the right to countermand is gone, and the remedy of the seller is an action for the purchase price. As to this there is absolute unanimity. Seneca Co. v. Crenshaw, 89 S. C. 471, 71 S. E. 1081; Burwell v. Chapman, 59 S. C. 581, 38 S. E. 222; Coates v. Early, 46 S. C. 223, 24 S. E. 305.

[5] This leads naturally to the further inquiry, the turning point in the case: Was delivery of the goods made by the plaintiff according to the terms of the contract prior to the attempted repudiation of the contract by the defendant?

It is not disputed that the plaintiff, in compliance with the terms of the written contract, delivered the outfit to a common carrier at Chicago for transportation to the defendant at Laurens, S. C., on April 3, 1918; that it was duly transported and arrived at destination on April 22d; that the defendant received timely notice of its arrival and refused to take it out of the depot. If this delivery was according to the terms of the contract between the seller and the buyer, the delivery to the carrier was a delivery to the buyer. 24 R. C. L. 40, 45; Burwell v. Chapman, 59 S. C. 581, 38 S. E. 222; Coates v. Early, 46 S. E. 220, 24 S. E. 305.

[6] The defendant, however, contends that there was an oral agreement between himself and the plaintiff's agent at the time the contract was signed that delivery should not be made before August 1st.

The contract is silent so far as a specific time for the delivery is concerned, and possibly under the authority of Chemical Co. v. Moore, 61 S. C. 166, 39 S. E. 346, the parol evidence referred to would be admissible, if the contract itself does not forbid it; and, if admissible, there was error in directing the verdict for the plaintiff, for the premature delivery would be no delivery, and the fact upon which the plaintiff relies to convert the executory contract into an executed contract would fade from his case; the goods remain at his risk. 24 R. C. L. 94.

[7] The contract, while fixing no time for delivery, certainly authorized the plaintiff to ship within a reasonable time. That was a right which the plaintiff had under the written contract. To require the plaintiff to forego that right and delay the shipment until August 1st would certainly modify that existing right, possibly to its prejudice. At any rate the terms of the contract would be changed to that extent. The contract provides:

"This instrument, upon such acceptance, covers all the agreements between the purchaser and the company, and that no agent or representative of the company has made any statements of verbal agreements modifying or adding to the terms and conditions herein set forth."

When that paper, a proposal for a contract, was presented to the plaintiff for its acceptance, this positive statement, over the signature of the defendant, appeared therein, and it must be assumed that the plaintiff acted upon it when its acceptance was affixed to it. The defendant is estopped from disputing the contents of his proposal. It is doubtless true that the form of this order was prepared and printed and furnished by the plaintiff, but that is not more than it had the right to do; and, if the public continues to sign papers without reading them and fails to incorporate in them the terms of their oral agreement, they have only themselves to blame.

Several questions raised by the exceptions have not been considered for the reason that the appellant's attorney has not discussed them in his brief.

The judgment of the court is that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

BUCHANAN v. WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH CO. (No. 10513.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Oct. 12, 1920.)

Telegraphs and telephones §48 — Telegraph company liable for messenger's indecent proposal.

A telegraph company through which plaintiff's husband sent money to plaintiff was liable for the act of its messenger, delivering the money, in making an indecent proposal to plaintiff.

Hydrick, J., and Gary, C. J., dissenting.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Greenwood County; George E. Prince, Judge.

Action by Mrs. Lula Buchanan against the Western Union Telegraph Company. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Tillman & Mays, of Greenwood, and J. Wm. Thurmond, of Edgefield, for appellant.

John Gary Evans, of Spartanburg, and Grier, Park & Nicholson, of Greenwood, for respondent.

FRASER, J. This is an action for damages. The plaintiff lived, at the time set up in the complaint, in Greenwood, in this state. The plaintiff's husband was working in Columbia, and sent to his wife, through the defendant company, $11.50. The agent of the defendant sent a check for the money to the plaintiff by one of its regular messengers. The messenger found the plaintiff at home alone. While the plaintiff was in the act of signing the receipt the messenger is alleged to have made an indecent proposal to her. There is also evidence that the plaintiff offered to strike the messenger, but the messenger at first advanced towards the plaintiff, and then seized the receipt and ran away. The question is the liability of the defendant for the conduct of its messenger.

At the close of the testimony, the defendant moved for a direction of a verdict in its favor. The presiding judge directed the verdict for the defendant, but said, "I am rather disposed to think that it is a step that the law ought to take, but it hasn't taken yet." The majority of this court think that the principle has been settled.

We are unable to differentiate this case, in principle, from the case of Jones v. Railroad Company, 108 S. C. 217, 94 S. E. 490. The fact that the defendant undertook to transact its business in the home of the plaintiff, instead of in its own office, makes no difference. Certainly none in favor of the defendant. It is more in keeping with the spirit of the law to protect the homes of the people than railway, express, and telegraph offices. A consignee may send another to get his freight as Jones did. The communication of the telegraph company is with the person to whom the message is sent. The appearance of their messenger to most people is startling. It indicated an urgent necessity for immediate action; otherwise, the mail will do. The appearance of their messenger throws caution to the winds and opens almost every door. May it admit, with impunity, a thief, a murderer, a rapist? It seems to us that it is going to the extreme limit to say that if the messenger is sent to the house of A., and he turns aside and enters the house of B., then the telegraph company is not responsible, because the transaction with B. was not within the scope of his employment. The transaction with A. is certainly within the scope of his employment, or there is no ground for responsibility for any delict. The servant in Jones' Case was writing a card to his wife, which was purely private matter. The interruption of that private matter caused the difficulty. It was not within a scope of the servant's employment to write to his wife or to abuse and threaten those who came for their freight, and yet the employer was held responsible. Here the injury was inflicted while the business for which the messenger was sent was being transacted. The injury was committed in the home of the plaintiff, to which the servant of the defendant had gained admission, by reason of this very business, and inflicted in its performance.

The judgment appealed from is reversed.

WATTS and GAGE, JJ., concur.

HYDRICK, J. (dissenting). We think the ruling was right. The law is well settled that the master is liable for the wrongful acts of his servant within the scope of his employment. The converse of the proposition is equally well settled—that the master is not liable for the conduct of his servant which is not within the scope of his employment; that is, for his servant's acts which are not done about or in furtherance of the master's business.

The conduct here complained of was entirely foreign to the master's business, or the purpose for which the boy was employed. It had no connection with or relation to the master's business, but was the boy's own personal escapade, wholly unconnected with the duty for which he was employed; and therefore as to that act he was not defendant's servant. McClenaghan v. Brock, 5 Rich. 17; Simmons v. Okeetee Club, 86 S. C. 73, 68 S. E. 131; Knight v. Laurens Motor Car Co., 108 S. C. 179, 93 S. E. 869, L. R. A. 1918B, 151; Thompson on Negligence, § 525; Savannah Electric Co. v. Hodges, 6 Ga. App. 470, 65 S. E. 322, and authorities cited by the court in a clear and well-reasoned opinion.

The fact that the boy was admitted to plaintiff's house because he was defendant's servant, and the fact that at that place and time he was about his master's business in delivering the money and getting a receipt for it are not determinative of the question whether his wrongful conduct was within the scope of his employment. In some circumstances, time and place may be elements to be considered in determining that question, but here they are mere incidents, and the nature of the wrong complained of is the prime factor to be considered in solving the question.

BROWN-RANDOLPH CO. v. GUDE et al.
(No. 2032.)(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 18, 1921.
Judgment Adhered to on Rehearing
March 5, 1921.)(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Contracts \Leftrightarrow 9(1)—Building contract must be certain; may be made certain by reference to documents, or plans and specifications, but reference must identify documents.

A building contract, to be valid, must have the necessary element of certainty, just as other contracts. Such a contract may be made sufficiently certain by reference to other documents, or to plans and specifications. But each reference must be sufficient to identify the documents or plans to which reference is made.

2. Contracts \Leftrightarrow 164—Letter containing estimate of cost, not made part of contract or referred to, could not be considered in determining whether contractor was overpaid.

Where a building contract provided for the construction of a building upon a consideration of "actual cost plus a commission of 10 per cent.," and "the estimates of the contractors, made in writing from completed drawings and specifications and full information, will be correct to the extent that the cost will not exceed the estimate more than 5 per cent.," and where, before the above contract was executed, a letter was written by a contractor to an architect, in which the contractor gave an estimate of the cost of the building, much lower than it was built for, but the letter was not made a part of the executed contract, nor was it expressly referred to therein, such letter cannot serve as a basis in determining the rights of the owner of the building, in a suit seeking recovery against the contractor, who, it is alleged, was overpaid on the basis of the estimate contained in the letter. The contract did not identify the letter, so as to make it a basis of recovery.

3. Contracts \Leftrightarrow 99(1), 245(2)—Evidence \Leftrightarrow 441(7)—Pleading \Leftrightarrow 8(7), 214(2)—Reformation of Instruments \Leftrightarrow 21—Allegation that letter was part of contract held conclusion, or effort to vary contract; negotiations prior to contract are merged or eliminated; demurrer admits only facts well pleaded; parties supposed to know what contract contains; petition insufficient to justify reformation of building contract.

The petition did not set forth a cause of action, and the court did not err in dismissing it on demurrer.

Fish, C. J., and Beck, P. J., dissenting.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County;
Geo. L. Bell, Judge.

Suit by the Brown-Randolph Company against A. V. Gude, Jr., survivor, and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Brown-Randolph Company brought its petition in Fulton superior court against A. V. Gude, Sr., A. V. Gude, Jr., Trust Company of Georgia, and A. Ten Eyck Brown, alleging in substance as follows:

On July 30, 1917, petitioner determined to erect an eight-story building on its property at the southwest corner of Marietta and Forsyth streets in the city of Atlanta, Ga., employing Brown as architect and the Gudes (then partners under the name of Gude & Co.) as contractor. The contractor, in a letter to the architect on June 28, 1917, stated that the building would cost $375,000, including the commissions of Gude & Co. Following said estimate, on July 30, 1917, petitioner entered into a written contract with the contractor relative to the construction of said building. Under the terms of the contract the building was to be erected complete in every detail and delivered to petitioner, free of all liens, at and for the sum of not to exceed $375,000, to which sum was to be added the 10 per cent. profit to the contractor called for by said contract, and the commissions of the architect, and to be completed in 10 months after the contractor was furnished with the possession of the property and the completed plans and specifications. Possession of the property was given immediately to the contractor, who, prior to the execution of the contract, had been in possession of the completed plans and specifications. The work of constructing the building was begun, but was not completed within the 10 months stipulated, and was not finally completed until March, 1919. After the building had been partially constructed, petitioner determined to increase its height by two additional stories, and on or about July 17, 1918, procured an estimate of $161,601.88 from the same contractor, for the construction of the two additional stories, the estimate being adopted and covered by written agreement on May 9, 1918.

During the construction of the building petitioner paid to the contractor the sum of $358,624.51. It also gave to the contractor notes aggregating $285,047.23, making a total of over $643,000, paid either in cash or represented by negotiable instruments delivered to the contractor. These payments were made by different officers of the petitioner company independently of each other, one of whom was absent in another city most of the time during the construction of the building, and they were made without exact knowledge of the total amount of cash and notes paid to the contractor, and with the belief that the work of erecting the building was being competently, skillfully, and intelligently done by the contractor, and that the cost of erection would not exceed the estimate and the contract price mentioned. Petitioner was not aware that the payments exceeded the sums actually specified in the contracts; the contracting partners positively stating to the contrary, and petitioner having confidence in them at that time. In addition to the total maximum contract price of $486,000, petitioner was to pay to the contractor 10 per cent. thereof, and to the architect an additional per cent. as commission. At that time petitioner believed that Brown was competent, that as supervising architect he was discharging faithfully and competently his duties, and that the contractor was exercising due diligence in the erection of the building, in the purchase of materials therefor, in the employment of labor, and in other matters essential to the construction of the building; but petitioner alleges that neither the architect nor the contractor was competent, that neither of them discharged the duties imposed upon them by the contract for the construction and the supervision of the building, and that as a result the building was extravagantly and wastefully erected, at a cost claimed by the contractor and the architect far greater than the total aggregate maximum contractual price for said work.

On July 3, 1919, after the commencement of the present suit, A. V. Gude, Jr., as surviving partner of Gude & Co., the contractor, filed a claim of lien against the property of petitioner, aggregating the total sum of $403,225.30. Had the contract been faithfully, diligently, and competently carried out, petitioner would have owed the contractor, for the erection of the building complete, a sum less than $486,000, plus the 10 per cent. upon the cost stipulated under the contract, and an additional 10 per cent. to Brown as supervising architect. The total payments heretofore made, cash and notes, aggregate $643,000. The contractor is now asserting, through the claim of lien, an indebtedness of the additional sum of $403,000. In fact petitioner, in the payments made, has overpaid the contractor by more than $157,000. Petitioner is informed and believes that either all or the greater part of its notes so given have been transferred to banks and others; but just how many of said notes are still in the possession of Gude, petitioner, is not definitely informed. Had the contractor complied with the contract, and skillfully and faithfully erected the building, the total amount which would have been due thereunder would have aggregated less than $534,000, and it has in fact been overpaid to the extent of $157,000. The claim of lien so filed is in willful and flagrant violation of the contract. Petitioner is not so indebted; but the contractor is indebted to petitioner in the excess sum of more than $157,000, in the event the negotiable instruments issued by petitioner have been so transferred as to be binding obligations upon it. If said notes have not been transferred, and are still in the possession of either the Trust Company of Georgia, as executor of the estate of A. V. Gude, Sr., deceased, or in the possession of A. V. Gude, Jr., surviving partner, then petitioner is entitled to have said notes surrendered, delivered up, and canceled.

Said claim of lien was filed for the purpose of embarrassing petitioner and attempting to force further payments of moneys which it does not owe, and of creating a cloud upon the title of the property and preventing petitioner from dealing therewith as it was legally entitled to do. Brown, the architect, has been actively assisting and co-operating with the contractor and its surviving partner in the erection of said building and in the gross violation of the contracts with reference to the completed cost thereof. He has asserted a claim for a large amount against petitioner; he has threatened to enter and take possession of the building, and to control the renting thereof; and he has asserted the right to collect the moneys due by the tenants of the building. Petitioner has entered into no contract giving him any of said rights, nor does the law confer upon him any such rights; and to permit him to carry these threats into execution may involve petitioner in a hopeless wrangle with its tenants, and may cause it great and irreparable loss in dealing with its tenants, and in conducting and operating the building. The building is completely occupied with a high class of tenants. Brown has recently, with one of these, undertaken to enter into a long-time lease, contrary to the express directions of petitioner and without its consent. No authority whatever has been granted by petitioner to Brown to take possession of the building, to conduct it, or otherwise to interfere with it.

Petitioner is not informed as to the nature or value of the estate left by A. V. Gude, Sr., but is informed and believes that A. V. Gude, Jr., is of doubtful financial responsibility, is in great financial straits, and has recently mortgaged all or practically all of the real estate owned by him or in which he has an interest; and it is necessary, under the circumstances, that the executor and surviving partner of the contractor firm be enjoined from selling, transferring, or disposing of any of the notes so given. Petitioner is entitled to have the notes in excess of the contract price delivered up and canceled, and to have the claim of lien canceled and removed as void and a cloud upon the title. Petitioner is ready and willing to pay any sum that may be still due upon the contract, upon having it ascertained who are the present owners and holders of the notes. Upon this ascertainment, and upon the discharge by petitioner of such notes so outstanding, aggregating with the cash payments the total maximum contract price for the building, petitioner is entitled to be discharged from any and all claims in behalf of the contractor. The building was to be completed within 10 months from the date of the contract; in fact it was not completed until March, 1919, delivery being delayed 10 months beyond the contract period. It had been fully rented before it was ever completed, except certain of the stores, and such rental, during the period of time of incompletion, aggregated for the 10 months about $60,000; and for this sum, in addition to the excess payments and notes, the estate of A. V. Gude, Sr., and A. V. Gude, Jr., the survivor, are liable. Petitioner is remediless at law. It is necessary for an accounting to be had, showing the real and true cost of said building; what, with proper exercise of due skill and diligence, would have been the cost of the building, and how much less than the maximum contract price this would have been; the amount of loss which petitioner sustained by a failure to deliver the building when the contract called for delivery; and the total amounts of cash paid and of notes given by petitioner; who now hold the notes, and how and when and for what consideration any of these notes were transferred.

The prayers were for such accounting; for judgment canceling the claim of lien and all notes given by petitioner and in the hands of any of the defendants, and which represent any sum in excess of the sum which may be found to be due upon an accounting; that the Trust Company of Georgia, as executor, and A. V. Gude, Jr., be enjoined from assigning, transferring, or pledging as security any of the notes given by petitioner and now in their possession, custody, or control; that Brown, be enjoined from directly or indirectly interfering with the possession of the property, or with any tenant in the building, or with its operation, and from asserting any claim against petitioner in any proceeding other than in this cause; and for general relief.

The material parts of the contract referred to in the petition are as follows:

"Article I. The contractors, for the consideration of actual cost plus a commission of ten per cent. (10%), will furnish all labor and material and all necessary estimates of cost, and will construct the owner's proposed building at the southwest corner of Marietta and Forsyth streets in the city of Atlanta, Ga. It is agreed and understood that 'actual cost' includes all expenses incurred by the construction of the building, except the expenses of the contractor's office and except architect's fees.

"Article II. It is agreed and understood that the building will be constructed and completed according to the plans and specifications and under the directions of A. Ten Eyck Brown, architect. In all cases of doubt or dispute as to the meaning of the plans and specifications, the architect's decision shall be final.

"Article III. It is agreed and understood that the estimates of the contractors made in writing from completed drawings and specifications and full information will be correct to the extent that the cost will not exceed the estimate more than five per cent. (5%)."

"Article VIII. It is mutually agreed and understood that the contractors will complete the building within ten (10) months after they are given possession of the property and are furnished with complete plans and specifications and all other necessary information. However, should the contractors be delayed in the prosecution or completion of the work by the act or neglect or default of the owners, or the architect, or any other contractors employed by the owners upon the work, or by any damage caused by fire, or delays in transportation, or due to the existence of war, or other casualty or calamity for which the contractors are not responsible, or by combined action of workmen in no wise caused by or resulting from default or collusion on the part of the contractors, then the time herein fixed for the completion of the work shall be extended for a period equivalent to the time lost by reason of any or all the causes aforesaid, which extended period shall be determined by the usual form of arbitration, provided the contractors and owners cannot agree."

General and special demurrers to the petition were filed. Petitioner filed an amendment, amplifying the original petition and adding the following:

Since the filing of the original petition A. V. Gude, as surviving partner of Gude & Co., has filed in the city court of Atlanta a petition to foreclose its alleged claim of lien. The city court of Atlanta possesses common-law jurisdiction alone, has no equitable jurisdiction, and cannot grant equitable relief. In the city court suit Gude has added to his alleged claim of lien certain notes which were discounted by Gude & Co., aggregating $85,625.45, some of which have been paid. Gude has no interest in these notes, and this suit is an attempt to pay the alleged claim of lien to that extent. After the institution of the city court suit Gude filed a cross-petition in the present cause, in which he asserts the right to recover of this plaintiff the same alleged indebtedness covered by the city court suit, and to enforce the same alleged claim of lien which is asserted in the city court suit. Thus within this jurisdiction Gude has asserted two separate and distinct suits in two separate and distinct courts, for the same alleged cause of action. The controversy cannot be disposed of by the city court, either in whole or in part, for want of jurisdiction to grant the affirmative equitable relief to which plaintiff is entitled. It is entitled, not only to the accounting before mentioned, but to have the contract with reference to the construction of the two additional stories of the building reformed, for fraud of Gude in illegally inserting two items in the contract for the two additional stories.

The prayers are that Gude be enjoined from prosecuting or taking any other steps in the city court suit, and be required to assert in the present cause, as he has done, the matters covered by said suit; that the contract representing the cost of the two additional stories be so reformed as to strike therefrom the two items so inserted; that it be decreed that the contract price for the two additional stories is the sum of $123,596.88; and for accounting, and for all the relief prayed for in the original petition. By further amendment it is alleged that the contract of July 30, 1917, was based upon the estimate of June 28, 1917, of $375,000, and but for this estimate petitioner would never have entered into said contract; that said estimate was based upon drawings and specifications furnished by the architect to the contractor, and Gude had in his possession all of the information from the architect which said Gude & Co. thought would be needed; that the plans and specifications were altered from time to time by the architect, without the knowledge or consent of petitioner; that Gude & Co. knew of these alterations and that they were made without authority; and that these alterations and changes materially increased the cost of the building.

The petition as amended was demurred to on general and special grounds. The judge sustained the general demurrer and dismissed the suit, on the ground that the petition as amended set forth no equitable cause of action, and that the plaintiff was not entitled to the relief prayed for. Other material facts are stated in the opinion.

Chas. T. & John L. Hopkins, of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error.

Smith, Hammond & Smith and Rosser, Slaton, Phillips & Hopkins, all of Atlanta, for defendants in error.

HILL, J. (after stating the facts as above). Brown-Randolph Company owned a city lot on the southwest corner of Marietta and Forsyth streets in the city of Atlanta, on which it decided to construct a building. Before the written contract for the construction was entered into, Gude & Co. addressed the following letter:

"Atlanta, Ga., June 28, 1917. Mr. A. Ten Eyck Brown, Architect, Forsyth Building, City—Dear Sir: In regard to the building you propose to have erected on the southwest corner of Forsyth and Marietta streets, this city. We have made a careful estimate of the cost from your plans and outlined specifications, and we find that the building will cost completed, including all mechanical equipment, elevators, electric fixtures, etc., $375,000 including our commission, but not including the architect's commission. Very truly yours, Gude & Company."

On July 30, 1917, a contract was entered into between Gude & Co. and Brown-Randolph Company, the material portions of which are given in the foregoing statement of facts. In this contract no express reference is made to the letter from Gude & Co. to A. Ten Eyck Brown, just set out. The present equitable petition was filed by Brown-Randolph Company against A. V. Gude, as surviving partner of Gude & Co., the Trust Company of Georgia, as executor of A. V. Gude, Sr., and A. Ten Eyck Brown, praying for an accounting, for cancellation of the alleged claim of lien and all notes in the hands of the defendants, given by the plaintiff, which represented any sum in excess of the amount that might be found to be due by plaintiff to Gude & Co., and for injunction against assigning or transferring as security any of the notes given by plaintiff, in the possession, custody or control of defendants, and against interfering with the plaintiff's possession of the property, or asserting against plaintiff any claim in any proceeding other than the present cause. The petition was demurred to on general and special grounds. The court sustained the general demurrer and dismissed the petition, and the plaintiff excepted. The court held that the plaintiff had a complete remedy at law, and that a court of equity had no jurisdiction of a case like the present.

In the view we take of this case, regardless of whether a court of equity or a court of law has jurisdiction, the controlling question is whether the petition sets out a cause of action against the defendant. It will be observed that the letter written by Gude & Co. to A. Ten Eyck Brown was not addressed to the plaintiff in this case, and it nowhere expressly appears that A. Ten Eyck Brown was the agent of the plaintiff. In order for the plaintiff to recover on the basis of the letter being made a part of the contract, it must appear that A. Ten Eyck Brown was the duly constituted agent of the plaintiff, and the letter was a part of the contract. As stated above, the letter is not referred to in the contract expressly or by necessary implication, and therefore the letter cannot be said to be a part of the written contract of July 30, 1917. It will be seen from the terms of the written contract itself that the contractors, "for the consideration of actual cost plus a commission of 10 per cent., will furnish all labor and material and all necessary estimates of cost, and will construct the owner's proposed building," etc. It was also agreed and understood that "the building will be constructed and completed according to the plans and specifications and under the directions of A. Ten Eyck Brown, architect; in all cases of doubt or dispute as to the meaning of the plans and specifications, the architect's decision shall be final"; also "that the estimates of the contractors made in writing from completed drawings and specifications and full information will be correct to the extent that the cost will not exceed the estimate more than 5 per cent."

It is contended by the plaintiff that the contractor, Gude & Co., guaranteed to construct the building at a total cost of $375,000, as stated in the letter of June 28, 1917. But it will be observed that when this letter was written there was no written contract between Brown-Randolph Company and Gude & Co., and, so far as appears in the record, there were at that time no "completed drawings and specifications and full information." It is true that in the amendment to the petition it is alleged that the letter of June 28 was a part of the contract of July 30; but such allegation must be construed as a mere conclusion of the pleader, or as an effort to vary the terms of the written contract, as there is nothing in the contract itself to justify this allegation and conclusion. The contract itself shows that the letter was not made a part of the contract, nor is there in the petition or either amendment any allegation that, when the estimate was made by Gude & Co. on June 28, they had in their possession completed plans and specifications and full information. It is alleged that Gude "had in his hands and possession all the information from the architect which said Gude & Co. thought would be needed"; but no such plans and specifications are attached to the petition, nor is their substance therein set out. The estimates that were to be binding were those made after completed plans and specifications and full information had been given to Gude & Co. The question, therefore, is whether the completed plans and specifications and full information as contemplated by the contract were in the hands of the contractor on the date that the contract of July 30 was entered into and executed. Even if the letter of June 28 could be construed as a part of the written contract, it does not show on its face that it was made from "completed plans and specifications and full information," but that it was simply from "outlined specifications."

We think that the facts alleged in the petition do not show that the letter of June 28 was a part of the contract (except as a conclusion of the pleader), and that the estimate of $375,000 made on that date was not the estimate provided for in the subsequently executed written contract of July 30, which is plain and unambiguous. If any previous negotiations between Gude & Co. and the plaintiff were had, and they were consistent with the written contract, they will be construed as being merged into the contract; and if, on the other hand, any preliminary negotiations were had between the parties which were inconsistent with the written contract, they would be eliminated by the contract itself. But surely no preliminary estimates between Gude & Co. and A. Ten Eyck Brown, before the execution of the written contract, could bind Gude & Co. relatively to the plaintiff, in the absence of an allegation to the effect that the architect was the agent and acted for the plaintiff, and there is no such allegation in the petition. We cannot, therefore, look to the letter from Gude & Co. to the architect as a basis for the suit, but must look to the words of the contract itself; and those words provide that—"It is mutually agreed and understood that the contractors will complete the building within ten (10) months after they are given possession of the property and are furnished with complete plans and specifications and all other necessary information."

And under the contract of July 30 with Gude & Co. the plaintiff was to pay actual cost of the construction of the building, plus a commission to the contractors of 10 per cent. It cannot be said that the contract of July 30 confirms the estimate made in the letter of June 28 from the contractors to the architect. That was a tentative estimate, not made upon completed plans and specifications and full information, but only upon outlined plans and specifications, and, as already said, the contract of July 30 made no reference to the letter of June 28, but, on the contrary, an entirely new and different estimate was provided. The contract of July 30 provides for a totally different plan for estimating the cost of the building from the estimate of June 28, viz. "actual cost plus a commission of 10 per cent."

It is insisted, however, that the original petition alleged that the estimated cost of the building of eight stories, as first contemplated, was $375,000. It is true that there is a general allegation to that effect; but, if the contract of July 30 is examined, this conclusion will be seen to be without foundation. It is only facts which are well pleaded that can be taken as true on demurrer. The petition and its amendments, therefore, taken as a whole, show that there was no estimated guaranteed offer of $375,000 on the part of the contractors for the construction of the first eight stories of the building. Under the express terms of the contract the building was to be built for actual cost plus 10 per cent.

[1] A building contract, to be valid, must have the necessary element of certainty, the same as other contracts. Such a contract may be made sufficiently certain by reference to other documents, or to plans and specifications. But such reference must be sufficient to identify the documents or plans referred to. 4 Elliott on Contracts, § 3637, and cases cited; 6 R. C. L. 867, § 253. In Cruthers v. Donahue, 85 Conn. 629, 84 Atl. 322, Ann. Cas. 1913C, 221, 226, note, it was held:

"Where there is a conflict between a building contract and the specifications, the former prevails."

In Willamette Steam Mills Co. v. Los Angeles College Co., 94 Cal. 229, 29 Pac. 629, it was held:

"Code Civ. Proc. § 1183, provides, inter alia, that where the amount to be paid for any building exceeds $1,000 the contract shall be in writing, signed by the parties, and 'shall, before the work is commenced, be filed in the office of the county recorder.' Held that, where a contract provided for the erection of a building 'conformable to drawings and specifications * * * hereto annexed,' but the drawings and specifications were not filed with the contract, the contract was void, and cannot serve as a basis in determining the rights of those claiming mechanics' liens on the building."

See, also, division 2 of the opinion.

In Donnelly v. Adams, 115 Cal. 129, 46 Pac. 916, it was held:

"Where a building contract refers, for a description of the buildings to be erected, to certain plans and specifications of the architect, 'which are signed by the parties hereto,' such plans are an essential part of the contract, without which it is incomplete, and cannot form the basis of a recovery; and where there are no plans 'signed by the parties' the contract cannot be completed by parol evidence to identify others as the ones referred to."

[2] The contract of July 30 does not refer specifically to the letter and estimate of June 28, and, as previously stated, the contract is unambiguous. Consequently it cannot be varied by parol evidence, so as to include in it the estimate of June 28. Standing alone, the contract provides a complete working basis for the cost of the building, which is cost plus 10 per cent. commission. Besides, it will be observed that the language of section 3 of the contract provides that the estimates of the contractors made in writing from "completed drawings and specifications and full information will be correct," etc., thus showing that the completed drawings and specifications contemplated did not refer to the past, but to the future, and that language also applies with equal force with reference to the "estimate," not that which had been made, but that which was to be made in the future. If completed plans and estimates had already been made, in all probability they would have been attached to the contract, or would have been referred to by express and definite reference.

As to the second contract for the two additional stories, it is insisted by the plaintiff that the petition alleges that the defendants fraudulently incorporated in the estimate of cost that they submitted to the plaintiff two items which were covered by the original contract, and that the plaintiff discovered this fact after the institution of the present litigation; also that the petition alleges that the two officers of the plaintiff were attorneys, neither of whom was familiar with the construction of buildings, and they did not know, at the time the contract for the additional two stories was entered into, that the defendants had fraudulently padded the second estimate with these two items, amounting to nearly $40,000; and that these allegations are to be taken as true on demurrer, and if this is done the plaintiffs are entitled to have the second contract reformed and these two items stricken. It is true that fraud upon one side and mistake upon the other in the execution of a contract is the legal equivalent of a mutual mistake, and that where these two things occur, equity has jurisdiction to reform such written instrument. Venable v. Burton, 129 Ga. 537, 59 S. E. 253; Gabbett v. Hinman, 137 Ga. 143, 72 S. E. 924.

But by reference to the petition itself it is found that the plaintiffs, by way of amendment to their petition, allege that Gude & Co. took advantage of the then situation, and in preparing the estimate of cost for these two additional stories—

"deliberately, illegally, and in defiance of the contractual right of this plaintiff, attempted to so word said estimate for the additional two stories as to include two items which constituted part of the contract for the original eight stories. Said estimates will be exhibited to the court, and it will be observed that it is headed 'Two Additional Stories and Advance in Labor and Material, Transportation Building, Atlanta, Georgia'; the words 'Two Additional Stories and' being in red ink, and the words 'Advance in Labor and Material' being in blue ink. The first item of this estimate is advance in labor and material, $36,205.00; the fourth item is sidewalk lift, $1,800.00."

So it is contended that when the second contract was signed for the construction of the two additional stories it contained two items which are now objected to as being fraudulently inserted by the defendants, and that such alleged fraud on the part of the defendants and the mistake of the plaintiffs in overlooking the same amounted to a mutual mistake, and that such mutual mistake should be relieved by a court of equity reforming the contract to meet the facts as they are alleged to be by the plaintiffs. We cannot agree to this contention. The additional estimate was not only in writing, but it was signed by the plaintiffs; it is plain and unambiguous, a portion of it was written in red ink and a portion in blue ink, so as to attract the attention of both parties to the contract. Parties to a contract who are competent to execute and make it are supposed to know what such contract contains, and the legal effect of it. From the allegations of the petition as indicated we do not think that such a case of fraud is alleged on the one side and mistake on the other as would justify a court of equity in reforming the contract.

[3] From what has been said, and the authorities cited, we reach the conclusion that the petition does not allege facts sufficient for a recovery against Gude & Co., on the basis of $375,000 guaranteed cost of the first eight stories of the building, as insisted by the plaintiff. The petition therefore does not set out a cause of action, and it is immaterial whether the suit sounded in equity or at law. The judge did not err in sustaining the general demurrer and in dismissing the case.

Judgment affirmed.

All the Justices concur, except FISH, C. J., and BECK, P. J., dissenting, and GILBERT, J., disqualified.

GEORGE, J. I concur specially in the judgment, on the ground that the allegations of the petition do not entitle the plaintiffs to the equitable relief prayed.

COONEY v. WALTON et al. (No. 1889.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 21, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Remainders ¶16—Court might decree sale for reinvestment, binding on unborn contingent remaindermen.

A testator devised certain realty to his wife "to have and to hold, for and during the term of her natural life, and, at her death, to vest in and belong in fee simple to my issue then living, said issue taking per stirpes and not per capita; but if there be no such issue living at the death of my said wife, I devise the real estate above mentioned, together with all the remainder of my property," to named persons. Included in the realty was a city lot on which there were buildings that were in need of repair and could not be rented advantageously. While the life tenant was yet in life and while the only issue of the testator was an adult son who was childless, the widow instituted an equitable suit against the son and the other contingent remaindermen specified in the will. The object of the suit was to have a decree for sale of the property, including every possible interest of contingent remaindermen in esse or any possible future issue of the testator's son, for reinvestment under the same limitations as provided in the will. Held, that the court had jurisdiction of the parties and subject-matter, and the decree was binding upon all parties to the suit and upon any unborn issue of the son of the testator who might be in life at the death of the life tenant.

Error from Superior Court, Richmond County; H. C. Hammond, Judge.

Suit by Julia Scales Walton and others against William J. Cooney. Judgment for plaintiffs on demurrer, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Maurice Walton died in Augusta, Ga., on March 6, 1913, leaving a will which was duly probated. The second item of the will was:

"All the real estate, situate in the present corporate limits of the city of Augusta, Georgia, with the store buildings, dwellings, and other improvements that may be thereon, of or to which at my death I may be seized and possessed or entitled, or have the power to dispose of by will, I give and devise to my wife, Julia Scales Walton, to have and to hold for and during the term of her natural life, and, at her death, to vest in and belong in fee simple to my issue then living, said issue taking per stirpes and not per capita; but if there be no such issue living at the death of my said wife, I devise the real estate above mentioned, together with all the remainder of my property to Alexander R. Walton, John Moore, Noel M. Moore, and Lula S. Jackson."

Lula S. Jackson was the mother of Julia Scales Walton, and died on May 12, 1912, leaving as her only heirs at law her two children, Julia Scales Walton and Thomas M. Jackson. Thomas M. Jackson died intestate on June 1, 1913, leaving Julia Scales Walton as his sole heir at law. John Moore Walton was a son of the testator, Maurice Walton, and his only issue in life at the time of the negotiations and proceedings herein-after mentioned. Included in the real estate situated in the city of Augusta left by the testator was a city lot fronting about 53 feet on Broad street and extending back in uniform width about 180 feet to property of other persons, there being located on the lot certain storehouses and other improvements. Julia Scales Walton entered into a contract to sell this lot above mentioned to William J. Cooney at the price of $32,000, provided that the vendor "could obtain the necessary authority to make a valid conveyance" of the property to the purchaser in fee simple. After making the contract Julia Scales Walton instituted a suit in the superior court, returnable to the September term, 1919, against John Moore Walton, son of the testator, and Alexander R. Walton, John Moore, and Noel M. Moore, thus embracing all existing contingent remaindermen under item 2 of the will. Service was acknowledged; and a consent was entered into by which the case should be decided at the first term, and that the judge should pass on all questions of law and fact without a jury. The purpose of the suit was to obtain authority to sell the property to William J. Cooney, in compliance with the contract, for the purpose of reinvestment in United States bonds, state bonds, or municipal bonds, as might be directed by the court. The grounds upon which it was sought to sell the realty were:

"The property is in need of repair, and such repairs will materially curtail the immediate income derived by your petitioner, and the investment which is proposed of the proceeds of the sale will produce a larger income for your petitioner. The property is not likely to enhance in value unless it is remodeled and extensively repaired, and this your petitioner does not care to undertake; so that it will be to the interest of the remaindermen to have said property sold for the price named and the funds invested as proposed. * * * The sale of the said property will be to the advantage not only of the life tenant, Julia Scales Walton, but also of all of the remaindermen, provided that the proceeds of such sales be invested upon the same terms and in the bonds above suggested. * * * The defendant John Moore Walton is the only issue of Maurice Walton now in life, and that he is the 'virtual representative' of any child or children that may be born to him and who would come in the description of 'issue of Maurice Walton,' and that his interest and that of any other issue of Maurice Walton should not be allowed to suffer and his and their property rights be impaired by either the real or alleged lack of power to effect said sales, especially as his interest is identical with that of any other issue of Maurice Walton that may come into being."

At the hearing the judge rendered a decree authorizing the sale of the property in fee and reinvestment of the purchase price, and relieved the purchaser from responsibility for the reinvestment. Afterward a deed was executed by the life tenant and several remaindermen, as provided in the decree, and was tendered to the proposed purchaser. He declined to accept the deed and pay the price, solely on the ground that the decree was invalid because the court was without jurisdiction to order a conveyance of the realty in fee simple. The life tenant and contingent remaindermen named in the decree then instituted an equitable suit against the purchaser, William J. Cooney, for specific performance of the contract. The petition alleged all that is stated above. The defendant filed a general demurrer to the petition, which was overruled, and he excepted.

Alexander & Lee and Cumming & Harper, all of Augusta, for plaintiff in error.

Barrett & Hull, of Augusta, for defendants in error.

ATKINSON, J. There is no question as to the right of the life tenant, Julia Scales Walton, to convey her interest in the land. The sole question is as to the jurisdiction of the court of equity to order a sale of the fee, before termination of the life estate, that would be binding upon the contingent remaindermen, including persons now in life and possible unborn children of one of those now in life. No trust is involved, and the title under consideration that is sought to be divested is the plain legal title of contingent remaindermen. In Wilson v. Sullivan, 81 Ga. 238, 245, 7 S. E. 274, 277, it was said:

"The test of jurisdiction to entertain a bill for injunction is not whether good cause for granting the injunction is set forth in the bill, but whether the court or its organ, the judge, could grant it for any cause. If the tribunal applied to can grant the injunction for any cause, then any question about cause is not a question of jurisdiction, but of the proper exercise of jurisdiction."

For reasons stated the life tenant desired to sell for reinvestment which would be beneficial to her. Other persons who could be affected by the sale were contingent remaindermen, included among whom were the son of the testator and any possible future issue of the son that might be in life at the death of the life tenant. The son being a party to the suit, the decree would bind him. His issue in case of his death before the death of the life tenant would be in the same class that he now occupies. The question is: Will the decree bind such unborn children as members of the same class as the son? In Phinizy v. Wallace, 136 Ga. 520, 529, 71 S. E. 896, 900, it is recognized that in a proper case a decree of sale for reinvestment would be binding upon contingent remaindermen who were parties to the decree ordering the sale. While it was not decided in that case that such a decree would be binding upon unborn persons, it was said on that subject:

"In regard to the ability to render a valid decree of sale binding upon parties who may not now be in existence, there is some difficulty of determination. But the general trend of modern authority is not favorable to tying up property and preventing sales, especially where necessary for the protection and preservation of the corpus, if they can be legitimately made"—citing cases.

The case of Mayer v. Hover, 81 Ga. 308, 7 S. E. 562, was one in which the parents of a child as next friend instituted an action of ejectment, claiming title under the will of John Hover. The defendant set up title under a decree in equity, rendered before the child was born, directing the sale of the property. There was a question raised as to whether the equitable proceedings were brought to a regular term of the court, and therefore whether there was jurisdiction. Jurisdiction was held to exist over the subject-matter; and, after so holding this, it was said:

"The court in this case having jurisdiction of the persons and of the subject-matter contained in the bill, the decree rendered by it in 1864 was not void, and the plaintiff is bound by the decree, although he was not born until after the decree."

In a recent case, Coquillard v. Coquillard, 62 Ind. App. 426, 113 N. E. 474, it was held:

"Where a testator devised a life estate in an undivided one-half of certain lands to each of two sons, with the remainder in fee to the children, if any be born, of such sons, and by another item of the will a qualified fee in such lands was created in the widow and two sons as tenants in common, such qualified fee being subject to be divested by the contingent estate, it was not erroneous for the trial court to make a decree, in an action for partition wherein the widow and the two sons were properly made parties, no children having been born to such sons, that the lands should be sold free of all life estates and remainders, and that a title in fee simple pass to the purchasers free from all claims of the parties to the proceedings, their heirs and descendants. * * *

In the case at bar, unless a court exercising equitable powers may otherwise decree, the real estate involved cannot be sold and conveyed by perfect title until the expiration of the life estates created by the third item of the will. This is apparent from the nature and quantity of the various estates created by the will. As measured by the Carlisle Tables of Mortality, the life expectancies of testator's sons at his decease were approximately 50 and 51 years, respectively. At the commencement of this action in 1914 such expectancies were approximately 33 and 34 years, respectively. At the former time the real estate involved was situated a distance from South Bend, then a city of 21,000 inhabitants; at the latter time a part of such real estate was within the city limits and the balance contiguous thereto, and the city had increased in population to about 65,000 inhabitants. The proximity of the real estate to the city naturally increases its value, if such value may be rendered available, but does not necessarily augment its capacity to produce revenue. From an increase in value there inevitably results an increase in taxation expenses. Proximity to and absorption into the territorial limits of the city subject the real estate to assessments for public improvements in the ordinary course of events. The court finds that the period has arrived when the expenses of maintaining the real estate greatly exceed the income derived therefrom, and also that the value of such real estate consists mainly in the fact of its fitness for subdivision and sale as urban real estate. The tendency of taxation and special assessment charges is upward rather than downward. If the present status of this real estate must be maintained until the termination of the life estates created therein, it is at least possible that no owner of a limited estate therein will feel justified in discharging such land from taxation and special assessment charges as they arise. Moreover, it is apparent from the finding that such real estate, in the present condition of its title, stands as a partial barrier to the proper growth and development of the city of South Bend, and consequently to the development of the state. These considerations are sufficiently potent to arouse the powers of the court to the point of diligent inquiry whether there may not be a way within the equitable jurisdiction of the court by which the lands may be sold and the interest of all persons, including contingent owners not in being, safe guarded by the proper administration of the fund derived.

"We are thus brought face to face with the question whether the court, under the circumstances, was authorized to direct the sale of the real estate as against testator's sons' children not in being. In approaching this question, it should be remembered that in an action for partition, conceding that this proceeding must be regarded only as such, resulting in a division rather than in a sale of the lands, the owners are not divested of any title or given any new title. Their respective shares are merely ascertained and set off to them in severalty. Avery v. Akins (1881) 74 Ind. 283. If such a proceeding results in a sale of the land as indivisible, the various estates and interests therein are merely transferred to the fund. Section 1261, Burns' 1914; section 1204, R. S. 1881. In cases where titles are complicated by limitations and contingencies, both private and public interests may, under some circumstances, require the sale of the involved real estate, even as against persons not in being. In such a situation, courts are sometimes impelled to act by expediency and practical necessity, binding the interests of persons not in being by recourse to the principle of representation. The Court of Appeals of South Carolina, in holding that a tribunal of competent jurisdiction may by its decree bind the contingent titles of remaindermen not in being, where all interested persons who could be made parties are brought before the court, uses this language: "To say that the court could not, under circumstances like these, convey away the fee, would be to assert a doctrine that would render conditional limitations and contingent remainders an intolerable evil to a growing and prosperous community. Thus to shackle estates without the power of relief, unless every person having a contingent and possible interest could be brought before the court as a party complainant or defendant, according to the usual forms and ordinary practice of the court, would be to sacrifice rights and interests of the present generation to those of posterity. * * * If the whole property of the country were thus situated, it is obvious that all improvement and advance would be completely checked; and this check upon progress and improvement would be in direct proportion to the extent to which this state of things exists. The case before the court is an apt illustration. Here are valuable unimproved lots, in a thriving and prosperous town, which the life tenant cannot with a due regard to his interest improve, and the remaindermen cannot, because their rights are contingent and may never vest." Bosfil v. Fisher (1850) 3 Rich. Eq. (S. C.) 1, 55 Am. Dec. 627.

"The following language is used at page 51 of a valuable editorial note to Downey v. Seib (1906) 8 L. R. A. (N. S.) 49: 'The complication of human affairs has become such that it is impossible for courts to act strictly on the general rule not to bind the interest or declare the right of any man in his absence. Cases arise in which, if you hold it necessary to bring before the court every person having an interest in the question, the suit could never be brought to a conclusion. The consequence would be that, if the court adhered to the strict rule, there would in many cases be a denial of justice. This has induced the courts to sanction a relaxation of the rule. And accordingly they have said: If we can be satisfied that we have before the court persons whose interests are the same as the interests of those who are absent, we will be content to hear the cause upon the argument of such persons; and, if we are then satisfied that the case has been fairly and honestly presented, we will order the distribution of the fund on the representation of the persons present. Powell v. Wright, 7 Beav. 444.

"In a case involving the contingent title of persons not in being, the Court of Appeals of New York said: 'Where an estate is vested in persons living, subject only to the contingency that persons may be born who will have an interest therein, the living owners of the estate, for all purposes of any litigation in reference thereto and affecting the jurisdiction of the courts to deal with the same, represent the whole estate, and stand not only for themselves, but also for the persons unborn. This is a rule of convenience, and almost of necessity. The rights of persons unborn are sufficiently cared for if, when the estate shall be sold under a regular and valid judgment, its proceeds take its place and are secured in some way for such persons.' Kent v. Church of St. Michael (1892) 136 N. Y. 10, 32 N. E. 704, 18 L. R. A. 331, 32 Am. St. Rep. 693. In a like case the Court of Errors and Appeals of New Jersey says: 'The established rule of equity practice is that estates limited over to persons not in esse are represented by the living owner of the first estate of inheritance.' Dunham v. Doremus (1897) 55 N. J. Eq. 511, 37 Atl. 62.

"In discussing the doctrine of representation and its application, Judge Story says: 'And as it is sufficient to bring the first tenant in tail before the court, if in being, whether he be plaintiff or defendant in the suit; so, if there be no such tenant in tail in being, the first person in being, entitled to the inheritance, should be made a party, and, if there be no such person in being, then the tenant for life; and in such a case the decree made will bind the other persons not in being. Thus, if there be a tenant for life of an undivided share of an estate, with remainder to his unborn sons in tail, the tenant for life may maintain a bill for partition, and the decree will be binding upon the sons, when they come in esse. So if there be a tenant for life, remainder to his first son in tail, remainder over, and the tenant for life is brought before the court before he has issue, it is settled in equity that the contingent remaindermen are barred, and (as has been said) from necessity. So, where there are contingent limitations and executory devises to persons not in being, they may in like manner be barred by a decree against a person claiming a vested estate of inheritance.' Story, Eq. Pleading, § 145. The same author says that, while there are exceptions to the rule, 'the cases within the exception must, however, stand upon peculiar equities and interests not affected by the same circumstances which attach to the prior parties.' Id. § 146.

"On the subject of exceptions, Mr. Freeman says: 'An English case recognizes an exception to this principle of virtual representation by denying its applicability in cases where the person seized in fee is liable to have his seizin defeated by a conditional limitation or an executory devise, because, in that event, the estate is insufficiently represented by the person holding the first vested estate of inheritance. This exception is repudiated so far as it seems to be noticed in the United States.' Freeman, Coten. and Part. (2d Ed.) § 482. In a leading New York case the court, in applying the doctrine of representation, says: 'It is not a question of entirely divesting and destroying such contingent interests, but simply a question whether the property upon which they are attached may be changed in form; whether land may be converted into personal securities under the direction of the court, preserving such interests intact upon the property in its new form. * * * A decree against the person having the first estate of inheritance would bind those in remainder or reversion, although the estate might afterwards vest in possession. * * * It would therefore follow, as a matter of course, from this rule, that contingent limitations and executory devises to persons not in being would in like manner be bound by a decree against the virtual representative of these remote and contingent interests, the person having the first vested estate of inheritance.' Mead v. Mitchell (1858) 17 N. Y. 210, 72 Am. Dec. 455.

"In the case at bar testator's sons, as the owners of the life estates created by the third item of the will, are parties. The widow also is a party. As we have said, the qualified fee that arises under the seventeenth item of the will is vested in the widow and sons as tenants in common. Such qualified fee, although liable to be defeated by the contingent estates created by the third item of the will, is, as we have said, an estate of inheritance. The contingent owners of such contingent estates are not ip being. It follows that all possible parties are before the court. By way of illustration, if one of such contingent owners were in being and a party to the proceeding, his interests would not be broader than the question of the amount of the land that should be set off to his father as life tenant, on a division of the land, or the question of the amount of the selling price, if the land should be ordered sold. The interests of such contingent owners would be so measured, because the land so set off, or that part of the purchase price or its equivalent representing it, would eventually come into his possession or the possession of his heirs, possibly, however, in common with brothers and sisters subsequently born. His interest would not be broader than as indicated. The father as life tenant has a like interest neither narrower nor broader. If the real estate should be divided, he would be interested in the amount of the same identified as his share. If the lands should be sold, he would be interested in the distributive amount representing his estate in the land. The larger the selling price, the larger such amount. On the sale of the lands, the parties to the proceeding as tenants in common to such qualified fee will likewise be interested in the amount of the selling price. We fail to see that the interests of such contingent owners are not fully represented in this proceeding."

A companion case to the foregoing is Coquillard v. Coquillard, 62 Ind. App. 489, 113 N. E. 481. In this case it was held:

"The trial court, in the exercise of its chancery powers, is clothed with jurisdiction to direct the sale and conversion of lands in fee held by a life tenant, with conditional estates over to unascertained persons, where emergencies arise rendering action by the court imperative in order that the persons interested may be protected in their legal rights, and the body of the estate preserved for them; but such extraordinary powers should be used with caution. * * * And, when the exigencies of the situation require such action, * * * the trial court may by proper decree order that the lands be sold free of all life estates and remainders, and that title in fee simple shall pass to the purchaser; and such a decree is binding on the unborn grandchildren of a testator who devised to them, subject to intervening life estates, the fee in the lands involved."

In the opinion it was said:

"It cannot be doubted that the power is lodged in chancery in a proper case, where all persons interested and likely to be affected by the decree are before the court, to convert realty into personalty, and to direct and supervise reinvestment. Thus Ridley v. Halliday (1900) 106 Tenn. 607, 61 S. W. 1025, 53 L. R. A. 477, 82 Am. St. Rep. 902, involved lands held under a grant for the use of a life tenant, with remainder over to successive classes, some of whom were not in being. It was made to appear there that the interests of all concerned plainly required the sale of the lands and the reinvestment of the proceeds. In approving a decree to that end, the Court of Chancery Appeals of Tennessee held that, under the circumstances presented, a court of chancery has inherent power to order a sale, the interested persons in esse being before the court, and that a decree so entered is binding on contingent owners not in being. The facts there were very similar to those here, differing principally in that the lands there had been conveyed and were held in trust for the life tenant and remaindermen. In Curtiss v. Brown (1862) 29 Ill. 201, 230, likewise the lands involved were held in trust for the use of a life tenant, with contingent interests over to unascertained persons; and in a situation similar in effect to those presented here the court, in holding that chancery is clothed with power to grant relief by a sale, uses this language: 'Can it be said that the beneficiary of an estate which would bring in the market $100,000 should perish in the street from want, or be sent to the poorhouse for support, or that the estate should be totally lost, because there is no power in the courts to relieve against the provisions of the instrument creating this trust? Exigencies often arise not contemplated by the party creating the trust, and which, had they been anticipated, would undoubtedly have been provided for, where the aid of the court of chancery must be invoked to grant relief imperatively required; and in such cases the court must, as far as may be, occupy the place of the party creating the trust, and do with the fund what he would have dictated had he anticipated the emergency.' A like conclusion was reached in Hale v. Hale (1893) 146 Ill. 227, 33 N. E. 858, 20 L. R. A. 247, wherein the court affirmed a decree directing the sale of lands, thereby affecting the titles of certain infants and the contingent interests of unborn persons. It was made to appear there that the lands were unproductive and subject to heavy charges by reason of their proximity to Chicago, but that they might be sold for a substantial sum, which upon being invested or loaned would yield to the persons interested a considerable income. The decision is justified on the ground that, where it is for the benefit of infants, courts of equity have the power, by virtue of their general jurisdiction over the estates of minors and others under disabilities, to authorize a conversion of real estate into personalty and of personalty into realty.

"Each of the cases above cited and discussed involved an estate held in trust for the use of life tenants and contingent remaindermen, including persons not in being. While the fact that an expressed trust is involved may clothe a court of chancery with jurisdiction to direct its administration in order that its subject-matter may be preserved and its beneficiaries protected in their rights, yet some other equitable consideration must exist in order that the court may properly exercise its power, by directing the conversion of trust property into some other form where such conversion is not specifically authorized by the instrument of trust. In each of such cases such other consideration consisted in that it was made to appear that the trust property was likely to be lost, or that it was subject to great depreciation, unless such conversion was directed and consummated. A like consideration exists here; and we do not believe that the mere fact that no express trust is involved stands as a bulwark against action by the court. To this effect is Gavin v. Curtin (1898) 171 Ill. 640, 49 N. E. 523, 40 L. R. A. 776, where no express trust was involved. The lands there were held under a devise to testator's daughter for life, with contingent interests over to others, including persons not in being. A decree directing the sale, on a showing that the lands were comparatively unproductive, and that the charges and expenses very much exceeded the income, was approved; the court saying in substance that, independent of the existence of a trust, a court of equity has jurisdiction to intervene where it is made to appear that otherwise a substantial right would be lost, and that, in the presence of some exigency which makes the action of the court practically indispensable, it properly exercises its power. To the same effect is Baldrige v. Coffey (1900) 184 Ill. 78, 56 N. E. 411, following and approving Gavin v. Curtin, supra. See, also, Ruggles v. Tyson (1899) 104 Wis. 500, 79 N. W. 766, 81 N. W. 867, 48 L. R. A. 809; Clyburn v. Reynolds (1888) 31 S. C. 91, 9 S. E. 973; Spring v. Scott (1903) 132 N. C. 548, 44 S. E. 116; Mayall v. Mayall (1896) 63 Minn. 511, 516, 65 N. "Respecting the first two questions suggested as presented for consideration, we conclude that the trial court in the exercise of its chancery powers is clothed with jurisdiction to direct the sale and conversion of lands in fee held by a life tenant, with conditional estates over to unascertained persons, where emergencies arise rendering action by the court imperative in order that the persons interested may be protected in their legal rights, and the body of the estate preserved for them, and that, while such extraordinary powers should be used with caution, in the case at bar the court properly exercised such powers to the end indicated.

"Directing our attention more particularly to the third question above suggested, all parsons interested in the subject-matter of this proceeding, and who are in being, are before the court. The life tenants and owners of such qualified fee, which, as we have said, is an estate of inheritance, are parties. The owners of the contingent interests cannot be made parties, as they are not in being. If in being, they would be necessary parties. The persons before the court are interested in urging upon the attention of the court every consideration that such unborn persons would be interested in presenting, if in being and parties to the proceeding. Under such circumstances, and where the exigencies of the situation require action on the part of courts, impelled by practical necessity, they assume jurisdiction. Decrees entered under such circumstances are binding on persons not in being. We conclude that a proper decree entered in this proceeding is binding on the unborn children of testator's sons, and that the fifth conclusion of law is correct. In addition to authorities above cited, see the following: Bofil v. Fisher (1850) 3 Rich. Eq. 1, 55 Am. Dec. 627; Downey v. Seib (1906) 8 L. R. A. (N. S.) 49, note; Powell v. Wright (1844) 7 Beav. 444; Kent v. Church of St. Michael (1892) 138 N. Y. 10, 32 N. E. 704, 18 L. R. A. 631, 32 Am. St. Rep. 693; Dunham v. Doremus (1897) 55 N. J. Coquillard*, supra. * * *

"A proceeding such as this is maintainable only on the theory that, by reason of some exigency growing out of changed conditions, it becomes necessary to convert lands into personalty in order that the body of the estate may be preserved. The courts are in accord that in order to the validity of the proceedings the funds must be substituted for the lands, all interests and estates in the latter transferred to the former, and that the fund must be ordered administered as nearly as possible as the lands would have been handled had there been no conversion. *Noble v. In the case under consideration, the court had jurisdiction of the subject-matter, and all persons in esse to be affected by the decree were before the court. One of them was John Moore Walton, the only child of the testator. The only possible issue of the testator, within the meaning of the will, not in esse, would be issue of John Moore Walton. They would be in the same class with him, and would be bound by the decree, as it was binding upon him. Under the circumstances the court had jurisdiction to render the decree; and, this being the controlling question, there was no error in overruling the demurrer.

SEIDELL v. SEIDELL et al. (No. 1989.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. March 3, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Executors and administrators \Rightarrow 138(4)—Construed to give life estate with remainder subject to be divested upon death without children but to become fee in case of sale.

One of the items of the will under construction reads as follows: "I desire that all my property both real and personal, with the exception of the place received from my mother (the Roebuck place in Hart county, Georgia), go to my husband, Charles W. Seidell, and my two sons, Stafford and Atherton Seidell; but No. 32 Carnegie place not to be sold if possible during the lifetime of my husband, except by the united consent of my executors hereinafter named, and then only when in their judgment such sale shall be necessary, the rents thereof to be applied to paying off the mortgage now held by Francisco & Co., paying for vault if necessary, paying the insurance premiums as they fall due on the life of my husband, with the exception of premium in Equitable Company of N. Y., and the support of my husband during his lifetime, at his death the rents to be equally divided between my children Stafford and Atherton Seidell. If my children Stafford and Atherton should die without children, then the part going to them be theirs only during their lifetime, but at their death go to my sister Zedora F. Norman her lifetime, and at her death be equally divided between her children. Provided, however, should the property 32 Carnegie place and the Fuller place have been sold and Stafford and Atherton receive their one-half each in cash and in trust (as hereafter named), in that case it is to remain absolutely theirs, and does not revert as before mentioned to my sister Zedora F. Norman and her heirs." The court construed this item of the will to mean that the estate devised in 32 Carnegie place was an estate for life to the husband of the testatrix, subject to certain charges, and that "after his death the property vested in the two sons named, subject to be divested if they should both die without children; then remainder over to the testatrix's sister during her lifetime, and at her death to be equally divided between the children of the latter;" and further that the provision in the will as to the proceeds of the property above referred to in case it should be sold, under which provision it would become the absolute property of the sons, could only be effective in the event of a sale, before the death of the sons, under a proper order of the court, for the purpose of paying some lawful charge which might arise and be within the contemplation of the will, and not in conflict therewith; and further that the executor is not entitled to an order or decree authorizing him to sell the property for the purpose only of division or distribution between the two brothers. Held, that this was a proper construction of that item of the will; the intention of the testatrix as deducible from all the provisions of the will being considered.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; J. T. Pendleton, Judge.

Suit by Atherton Seidell, executor, and others, against Stafford Seidell. Judgment construing a will, and Stafford Seidell brings error. Affirmed.

Moore & Pomeroy, W. W. Hood, and Hewlett & Dennis, all of Atlanta, for defendants in error.

PER CURIAM. Atherton Seidell as the surviving executor of the last will and testament of his mother, Mrs. Emma A. Seidell, filed his equitable petition, praying that the will be construed as to certain parts thereof set forth in the petition and that he be directed as to the proper administration of the estate. Among the provisions of the will set forth in the petition, and of which the executor desired the court's construction, was that contained in item 2, which reads as follows:

"I desire that all my property both real and personal, with the exception of the place received from my mother (the Roebuck place in Hart county, Georgia), go to my husband, Charles W. Seidell, and my two sons, Stafford and Atherton Seidell; but No. 32 Carnegie place not to be sold if possible during the lifetime of my husband, except by the united consent of my executors hereinafter named, and then only when in their judgment such sale shall be necessary, the rents thereof to be applied to paying off the mortgage now held by Francisco & Co., paying for vault if necessary, paying for the insurance premiums as they fall due on the life of my husband, with the exception of premium in Equitable Company of N. Y., and the support of my husband during his lifetime, at his death the rents to be equally divided between my children Stafford and Atherton Seidell. If my children Stafford and Atherton should die without children, then the part going to them be theirs only during their lifetime, but at their death go to my sister Zedora F. Norman her lifetime, and at her death be equally divided between her children. Provided, however, should the property 32 Carnegie place and the Fuller place have been sold and Stafford and Atherton receive their one-half each in cash and in trust (as hereafter named), in that case it is to remain absolutely theirs, and does not revert as before mentioned to my sister Zedora F. Norman and her heirs."

The language of item 4 is as follows:

"The Fuller Place in Hart county, Georgia, containing — acres, to be sold whenever in the judgment of my executors it be deemed advisable to do so, and the proceeds towards paying the balance of vault in cemetery if necessary—other debts that may arise; the balance, or all of it if no debts, to be divided between my husband and Stafford Seidell (in trust as hereafter named) and Atherton Seidell, my children."

The court construed these items and other portions of the will; but the assignments of error contained in the bill of exceptions, which was sued out by the petitioner, relate only to that part of the decree construing item 2 of the will.

Under the court's construction of item 2 of the will under consideration, an estate for life in the property designated and referred to as 32 Carnegie place was devised to the husband of the testatrix, Charles W. Seidell, subject to certain charges which the court held not to be subject-matter of inquiry in this suit, and after his death the property was vested in two named sons, Stafford and Atherton Seidell, subject to be divested if they should die without children with remainder over to the sister of the testatrix, Mrs. Norman, during her lifetime, and at her death to be equally divided between the latter's children. In this connection the court construed the provision that "should the property 32 Carnegie place and the Fuller place have been sold and Stafford and Atherton receive their one-half each in cash and in trust (as hereafter named) in that case it is to remain absolutely theirs, and does not revert as before mentioned to my sister Zedora F. Norman and her heirs," and held that the same would be effective only in the event a sale of the property be made before the death of Stafford and Atherton Seidell, under proper order of the court, for the purpose of paying some lawful charge which might hereafter arise and be within the contemplation of the will or authorized by law, and not in conflict with the will;

and the court held further that the executor is not entitled to an order or decree authorizing him to sell the property for the sole purpose of division or distribution between himself and his brother Stafford.

We are of the opinion that the construction given to item 2 of the will by the court is more nearly in consonance with the intention of the testatrix, deducible from a consideration of all of the provisions of the will, than the constructions insisted upon in the briefs and arguments submitted by the counsel for plaintiff in error and by counsel for a third person having an interest in the estate of Charles W. Seidell, and gives effect to the intention of the testatrix as nearly as that intention can be ascertained from the language employed by the testatrix in expressing her wishes and intention as to the disposition of her property. If we consider merely the language expressing the desire and intention that the property "go to my husband, Charles W. Seidell, and my two sons, Stafford and Atherton Seidell," we would unhesitatingly reach the conclusion that a fee-simple estate had been devised to the three named persons. But the language indicating this desire and intention does not stand by itself. It is not even in a sentence complete in itself. In immediate connection with the language employed in this first part of the sentence are the provisions that No. 32 Carnegie place should not be sold, if possible, during the lifetime of the husband, except by the united consent of her executors, and then only when in their judgment "such sale shall be necessary"; and this is followed by the provision that the rents thereof (that is, 32 Carnegie place) should be applied to paying off the mortgage on it, and "paying for vault if necessary, paying the insurance premiums as they fall due on the life of my husband, with the exception of premium in Equitable Company of N. Y., and the support of my husband during his lifetime, at his death the rents to be equally divided between my children Stafford and Atherton Seidell." When the complete sentence is considered, it would seem that the testatrix intended that the rents of 32 Carnegie place should be applied for the purposes just recited, and it was in her mind that these rents might be sufficient for all purposes there stated. But the possibility was also contemplated that to meet these charges it might be necessary to sell the lot on Carnegie place because of the inadequacy of the rents to meet the charges contemplated as possible; that it might be necessary to make a substantial encroachment upon the corpus of this property, and then, if the rents were insufficient to meet the charges, and encroachments upon the corpus were necessary, thereby diminishing its productivity, the proceeds of the sale should become the absolute property of the two sons, without limitation. It was not the intent nor the desire of the testatrix that the property should be sold in the lifetime of her husband, unless absolutely necessary to meet charges which she intended should be met by the rents, the possible insufficiency of which she foresaw, and therefore made in that case provision for encroachment upon the corpus, and then the further provision that, if the property should be sold, the proceeds should become the property absolutely of the two sons. Clearly the testatrix thought it probable that the rents would be sufficient to pay all charges not met by the proceeds of the sale of another piece of property, the "Fuller place," disposed of in item 4 of the will.

It must be admitted that the construction of this will is attended with great difficulties, but that given it by the trial judge seems to be most reasonable; and it is the only construction that is reconcilable with the evident intention that, if her sons should die without children," then the part going to them be theirs only during their lifetime, but at their death to go to my sister." If the two sons, the surviving executor consenting thereto, could have the property sold merely for distribution, independently of any necessity of selling it to meet the charges, then the provision that after their death, in case they died childless, the property should go to the sister of the testatrix, made the devise to the sister of the remainder interest dependent merely upon the generosity of the two sons in refraining from bringing the place to sale; and we do not think that it was the intention of the testatrix to make the rights of her sister and the latter's children dependent upon any such contingency, but it was her intention that the rights of the sister and the sister's children should be contingent upon the sufficiency of the rents of the place to pay the charges in case the proceeds of the sale of the Fuller place were not sufficient, and the consequent necessity of a sale of the property at 32 Carnegie place.

It follows from what we have said, showing our concurrence in the views of the court below as to the proper construction of item 2 of the will, that the judgment should be affirmed.

UPSON v. SMITH, County Treasurer.
(No. 1971.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. March 3, 1921.)

*(Syllabus by the Court.)Mandamus  109—Solicitor of city court held not entitled to mandamus to require payment of insolvent costs.

In view of Pen. Code 1910, § 1128, and the provisions of the act creating the city court of Athens (Acts 1878-79, p. 291; Acts 1894, p. 212) and of the amendments thereto (Acts 1911, p. 235), relating to the fines and forfeitures arising in that court, which are required to be paid into the treasury of Clarke county, a former solicitor of that court, with orders granted by the judge for insolvent costs, is not entitled by mandamus to require the treasurer to pay such orders, or any part thereof, although there may be in the treasury, as part of the general fund of the county, money arising from fines and forfeitures in the city court.

Error from Superior Court, Clarke County: A. J. Cobb, Judge.

Mandamus proceeding by S. C. Upson against E. I. Smith, Treasurer of Clarke County. Judgment dismissing the petition, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

This is a proceeding for mandamus, brought on February 21, 1920, by Stephen C. Upson against the treasurer of Clarke county, E. I. Smith. The substance of the petition, as far as necessary to be stated, is to the following effect:

Petitioner was solicitor of the city court of Athens for three consecutive terms, from September 12, 1907, to September 11, 1919. During his first term, from September 12, 1907, to August 19, 1911, the date of the act placing the solicitor upon a salary, instead of fees, the judge of the court duly allowed orders for the petitioner's insolvent costs as solicitor, amounting to $2,586.01, which were duly entered upon the minutes of the court. Petitioner, on August 29, 1911, was the owner as transferee of all the insolvent cost orders allowed former solicitors, and former clerks and sheriffs, of the aggregate amount of $5,159.03. Between September, 1911, and September, 1919, the clerk of the court collected the sum of $4,452.90, as fines and forfeitures in criminal cases disposed of in the court, which he paid to E. I. Smith, who has since and prior to January 1, 1911, been treasurer of Clarke county, which sums represented the share of the solicitor of the city court of such fines and forfeitures, and the dates on which the various items constituting this sum were paid to the treasurer are stated. On February 21, 1920, petitioner made a written demand upon the defendant, as treasurer, for the payment of all the aforementioned insolvent cost orders out of said fund paid by the clerk to defendant from fines and forfeitures as stated, which demand was refused by the defendant.

The petition was demurred to on the ground that it set forth no cause of action, and that it appeared therefrom that the plaintiff's orders or judgments were barred under the dormant judgment act. The petition was dismissed under a general order sustaining the demurrers, and he excepted.

Wolver M. Smith and Horace M. Holden, both of Athens, for plaintiff in error.

Tate Wright and Lamar C. Rucker, both of Athens, for defendant in error.

FISH, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). The act of 1879 (Acts 1878-79, p. 291), establishing the city court of Clarke county (name changed by the act of 1894 [Acts 1894, p. 212] to the city court of Athens), provided (section 36) that all moneys arising from fines and forfeitures in the court should be subject to the payment of the fees of its officers, that for their insolvent costs they should have a lien upon the fines and forfeitures raised in the court, and that those in' office at the time any money should be brought in, subject to insolvent costs, should be paid therefrom all their insolvent costs, before any predecessor in their respective offices should have a claim on such money for insolvent costs. In section 37 the act declared that, should any balance remain of the fines and forfeitures raised in the city court, after full payment in accordance with the priority stated, of all solvent costs due the officers of the city court and those of the superior court upon the cases transmitted from that court to the city court, such balance should be paid into the treasury of Clarke county.

On August 19, 1911, an act was passed (Acts 1911, p. 235), the purpose of which, among other things, was:

"To provide for the payment of a salary to the solicitor of said [city] court in lieu of the fees now received by him; to provide that all the fees now allowed * * * to the solicitor of said court should be collected and paid into the treasury of Clarke county; to provide that Clarke county should take the place of the solicitor of said court in all future insolvent costs and shall share as such in all fines, forfeitures, and for other purposes."

The fourth section of that act declared:

"That after paying the insolvent costs of the solicitor of said court due at the time of the passage of this act the share of all moneys arising from jury fines, fines imposed for violation of penal laws, and other fines, and collected from forfeited recognizances in said city court, which under the provisions of section 37 of said act approved September 9, 1879, are subject to the payment of the fees of the solicitor of said court shall be paid into the treasury of Clarke county."

As will be seen, all moneys arising from fines and forfeitures in the city court of Athens, required by the acts of 1879 and 1911 to be paid into the treasury of Clarke county, manifestly became, when so paid, a part of the general fund belonging to the county in its treasury, and not a special and separate fund, distinct from the county funds arising from other sources, of which the treasurer should keep a separate account, and to be paid out only on orders or warrants on the county treasury granted by the judge for insolvent costs. The provisions of Penal Code 1910, § 1118 et seq., as to the payment of fines and forfeitures arising in the superior courts into the county treasury, to be there kept as a special fund separate from all other moneys of the county, and subject to be paid out only upon orders and warrants of the judge allowed for insolvent costs, do not apply to fines and forfeitures arising in the city court of Athens. This is true because, as already stated, the acts of the Legislature creating that court make no such provision; and, moreover, Penal Code, § 1123, declares that—

"The foregoing sections [relating to the disposition of fines and forfeitures, etc.] do not apply to a city court; * * * nor do they affect any local law."

It follows that, notwithstanding the fact that the petitioner had orders for insolvent costs, granted to him by the judge of the city court, and was the owner as transferee of other orders of similar character to other officers of the court, he was not entitled to require the county treasurer by mandamus to pay such orders from the general county fund, although in part made up from fines and forfeitures arising in the city court. Entertaining this view, it is not necessary to discuss or rule upon any other point in the case. The court did not err in dismissing the petition on general demurrer.

Judgment affirmed.

GORDON v. RANSOM & LOMAX LUMBER CO. et al. (No. 2086.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 19, 1921.)

1. Adverse possession §85(2)—Good faith is question of fact, and party may testify as to ignorance of irregularities in tax sale.

The court did not err in permitting a witness for the defendants, Jasper S. Bleckley, to answer the question, "If there was any irregularity, did you know anything about any irregularity in the conduct before the sale, or afterwards?" the answer being, "No, sir; I had good faith it was being sold legally and all right;" the witness having reference to the sale of the land in controversy by the sheriff at a tax sale. Good faith here was a question of fact and material in this as to one defense—that is, title by prescription—made by the defendants to the suit.

2. Evidence §83(4), 341—Copy of wild land digest certified by clerk of court of ordinary held admissible, though not showing who made list.

Nor did the court err in admitting in evidence a certified copy of an extract from the wild land digest of Rabun county for the year 1883, in which was listed, among other lots, the lot of land sued for, over the objection that "the certified copy does not show that either the tax collector or the tax receiver signed it, or that any officer charged with issuing executions or collecting taxes or receiving tax returns made the list and put it on the wild land digest, or on any digest required by law, no name appearing about the entries and nothing to indicate the law was complied with in regard to such cases." The presumption is, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, that the digest had been properly made and kept, and the certified copy was made by the clerk of the court of ordinary, where the digest was deposited in accordance with the law.

3. Evidence §178(5)—Sheriff's deed admissible on proof of loss of tax f. fa.

Upon proof of the loss of a tax f. fa. recited in a sheriff's deed, the deed itself containing the usual recitals of seizure and sale under the f. fa., the court did not err in admitting the sheriff's deed in evidence as muniment of title.

4. Taxation §772—Failure of tax deed to show month of execution held clerical mistake.

The recital in the deed that it was made "on the sixth day of the year 1884," is evidently a mere clerical mistake or failure on the part of the scrivener to insert the word "May" after the word "day," as the sale took place on the first Tuesday in May, 1884.

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

5. Names §19—That witness did not give collector's initial as in tax deed held not to raise question for jury.

Where the execution under which a tax sale was made was lost and its contents were proved by witnesses, the fact that one of the witnesses did not state the tax collector's middle initial as given in the deed did not make a material conflict requiring the question to be submitted to the jury.

Atkinson, J., dissenting in part.

Error from Superior Court, Rabun County; J. B. Jones, Judge.

Ejectment by H. H. Gordon, Jr., administrator, against the Ransom & Lomax Lumber Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Gordon, administrator, brought ejectment against Ransom & Lomax Lumber Company and L. S. Bleckley, to recover a tract of land described as lot of land No. 36 in the Third land district of Rabun county. At the conclusion of the evidence the court directed a verdict in favor of the defendants. The plaintiff made a motion for a new trial, which was overruled, and he excepted.

Thad L. Bynum, of Clayton, for plaintiff in error.

A. M. Tillman, of Nashville, Tenn., J. M. Bleckley, of Cochran, and Hall, Grice & Bloch, of Macon, for defendant in error.

BECK, P. J. [1, 2, 4] 1, 2, 4. The rulings in headnotes 1, 2, and 4 require no elaboration.

[3] 3. The defendants in this case, after showing that the property was listed as unreturned wild land, introduced proof of the issuance and existence of the tax fi. fa. recited in the deed from the sheriff to the defendants' predecessors in title. The sheriff's deed introduced was as follows:

"Georgia, Rabun County. Whereas lot of land No. 36 in the Third land district of said county, being wild and unimproved land subject to taxation, and not having been returned for taxation nor the tax thereon paid for the year 1883, L. L. Page, tax collector of said county, did lawfully issue execution against said lot of wild land for state and county taxes due and payable thereon for said year, and Andrew B. Wall, sheriff of said county, did by virtue of said execution lawfully seize and levy upon said lot, and, after duly advertising the same for sale, did on the first Tuesday in May, the sixth day of the year 1884, lawfully expose the same for sale, in the manner of conducting tax sales, at public outcry before the courthouse door, within the legal hours of sale, when Jasper S. Bleckley of said county, being the highest and best bidder, the same was knocked off to him at the price of thirty dollars, in hand paid: Now, therefore, the said Andrew B. Wall, sheriff as aforesaid, hereby conveys, according to law, the said lot of land to him, the said Jasper S. Bleckley, to have and to hold the same as fully and completely as the law authorizes. In witness whereof the said sheriff has hereunto set his hand and affixed his seal. This ninth day of May, 1884."

The deed showed proper execution by Andrew B. Wall, sheriff of Rabun county; and the certified copy showed by entry on the back that the deed was recorded on December 31, 1898.

[5] The failure to produce the execution itself in connection with the deed was explained by the testimony of witnesses who testified positively that they had seen the execution, had read it; and who gave the substance of its contents, which were in accordance with the recitals in the deed. It is true that one of the witnesses gave the initial of the tax collector as L. B. Page instead of L. L. Page; but this did not make such a conflict in the testimony as required the question to be submitted to the jury. Other witnesses gave the correct name of the tax collector and the testimony of one witness who was mistaken as to the middle initial merely, in the name of the tax collector made no material conflict. When the deed was introduced in evidence and proof of the execution under which the sale took place was made by uncontroverted testimony, the deed accompanied by the execution was not merely color of title, but was muniment of title. A sheriff's deed must be accompanied by the execution under which the land was sold, or the judgment upon which it issued. Watson v. Tindal, 24 Ga. 494, 71 Am. Dec. 142. And in the case of Ellis v. Smith, 10 Ga. 253, it was held that—

"The recitals in a deed of the fi. fa. and seizure and sale of the property under them is prima facie proof at least of the facts contained in the deed."

Further elaboration of the principle ruled here is unnecessary in view of the discussion in the case of Sweeney v. Sweeney, 119 Ga. 76, 46 S. E. 76, 100 Am. St. Rep. 159.

As to the sufficiency of the advertisement introduced in evidence, see the case of Saunders v. Register, 149 Ga. 286, 99 S. E. 857, where it was said:

"Where wild lands unreturned for taxation are sold under a valid tax fi. fa., a defect in the advertisement of the sale of the property levied upon is a mere irregularity and does not affect the validity of the sheriff's sale made to an innocent purchaser."

As to the sufficiency of the tax execution, see Vickers v. Hawkins, 128 Ga. 794, 58 S. E. 44.

Upon the introduction of the deed in evidence and proof of the prior existence and of the loss of the fi. fa., title to the property in dispute was shown by uncontroverted testimony to be in the defendants; and the court did not err in directing a verdict accordingly.

Judgment affirmed.

All the Justices concur, except ATKINSON, J., who dissents from the ruling in the third division of the opinion.

MAYOR AND ALDERMEN OF CITY OF SAVANNAH v. STANDARD FUEL SUPPLY CO. (No. 1903.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 18, 1921.)

*(Syllabus by the Court.)1. Fixtures §15—Permanent pavement not removable by tenant as trade fixture.

Where a tenant of a tract or strip of land during a term of years laid down blocks of stone, so as to compose or make a pavement rendering access to the premises by vehicles conveying loads more easy and convenient, the pavement was not removable as a trade fixture.

2. Vendor and purchaser §232(9)—Tenant's possession not notice of right under oral agreement to remove permanent pavement.

Even though occupancy by a tenant holding under a lease for a term of years is notice to one purchasing from the landlord the leased premises, it is not notice of the right on the part of the tenant to remove permanent fixtures placed upon the premises by the tenant before the sale by the landlord; there being no reference in the written lease, afterwards assigned to the purchaser, of the agreement between the landlord and the tenant, giving the latter the right to remove the fixtures.

Error from Superior Court, Chatham County; P. W. Meldrim, Judge.

Suit by the Mayor and Aldermen of the City of Savannah against the Standard Fuel Supply Company. Judgment refusing an interlocutory injunction, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

The mayor and aldermen of the city of Savannah filed its petition against Standard Fuel Supply Company, wherein it is alleged that the municipality is the owner in fee of a certain described tract or lot of land; and that the defendant, tenant in possession, is threatening and proposing to remove from said property certain pavement belonging to the plaintiff, consisting of paving blocks described, covering a strip of land 304 by 25 feet, to the injury and damage of petitioner in an amount equal to the value of the paving stone, some $2,000. The petitioner prayed for injunction to prevent the defendant from removing or interfering with the pavement. The defendant admitted that it was in possession as tenant under a lease from the predecessor in title of petitioner, the grantor in the deed under which the city held title; and that that lease was executed in 1909. It claimed that the pavement was a trade fixture, and that it had the right to remove the same; that the area over which the stones were laid for the pavement was the necessary approach to the wharf on which it unloaded and stored sand, and that it was necessary for its purpose that it should be able to run its teams over the hard surface rather than on the ground, and that for this reason the stone blocks were laid as a pavement; that the pavement was put down in the year 1914, and upon express agreement between the defendant and its landlord, the predecessor in title of the petitioner, the defendant could, at the expiration of the lease, remove the pavement. At the hearing evidence was submitted by both plaintiff and defendant.

The court rendered its judgment refusing the interlocutory injunction, and the plaintiff excepted.

Shelby Myrick and Edwin A. Cohen, both of Savannah, for plaintiff in error.

Osborne, Lawrence & Abrahams, of Savannah, for defendant in error.

BECK, P. J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] Under the pleadings and the facts in the record, the city was entitled to an injunction restraining the defendant from removing the pavement or paving blocks. The written lease under which the defendant held the premises in dispute expired January 1, 1919. There was an agreement between the agent of the owners of the property at that time and the tenant, that the latter should continue in possession for another year. On August 13, 1919, the owners of the property sold it to the city and executed a deed of conveyance. During the existence of the original lease and in the year 1914 the tenant had laid down the pavement in question under an express agreement with the landlord that when the lease expired the tenant should have the right to remove the blocks constituting the pavement; and the defendant now insists that both on the ground that such a pavement, under the facts stated, was a trade fixture, and under the terms of the express agreement as to the removal of the pavement, it should have the right to remove the same. The pavement which the defendant proposes to remove cannot be regarded as a trade fixture; and it is unnecessary to enter here upon a discussion of trade fixtures, or attempt a definition of the same, for the purpose of showing that the pavement falls in none of the recognized definitions. Questions similar to this have been discussed in several Georgia cases. See Wright v. Du Bignon, 114 Ga. 765, 40 S. E. 747, 57 L. R. A. 669, and the cases there cited; Brigham v. Overstreet, 128 Ga. 447, 57 S. E. 484, 10 L. R. A. (N. S.) 452, 11 Ann. Cas. 75. Under the provisions of the Civil Code, § 3621, it is declared that—

"Anything intended to remain permanently in its place, though not actually attached to the land, such as a rail fence, is a part of the realty and passes with it."

Section 3695 of the Civil Code declares:

"The tenant cannot cut or destroy growing trees, remove permanent fixtures, or otherwise injure the property."

And in section 3617 it is declared that realty includes all lands and the buildings thereon, and all things permanently attached to either. Taking into consideration these sections and the discussions in the above cases and authorities there cited, it is clear that a fixture permanently attached to the land, such as a pavement, is not removable under the right to remove trade fixtures.

[2] Nor could the tenant in this case remove the pavement because of an express agreement with the owners of the property from whom the tenant leased it, after the sale of the property to the city, without showing that the city had notice before or at the time of the purchase of the claim of right on the part of the tenant to remove the pavement. The agreement between the owner of the property and the tenant, the defendant, was not included in the written lease which was assigned to the city, but was entered into after the execution of the lease, through a correspondence between the tenant and the agents of the owner; the city had no knowledge of the agreement contained in this correspondence before its purchase of the property. It is urged by defendant in error, however, that possession by the tenant of the premises and knowledge on the part of the city of the possession of the tenant was notice of the rights of the tenant under the agreement with the owner to remove the pavement, and in support of this contention reference is made to section 4528 of the Civil Code, which reads as follows:

"Possession of land is notice of whatever right or title the occupant has. Possession by the husband with the wife is presumptively his possession, but it may be rebutted."

The case of Garbutt v. Mayo, 128 Ga. 269, 57 S. E. 495, 13 L. R. A. (N. S.) 58, construing this Code section, is also cited. In that case the court said:

"Possession of land is notice to the world of every right that the possessor has therein, legal or equitable."

And it is urged that there is no reason why the statute cited should not cover the case of a lessee; that he is the occupant of the premises and has a right in them. To most of this we agree, but not to the proposition that the statute quoted is applicable to the issue made in this case. Where a tenant is in possession under a lease for a term of years and the landlord conveys to a third party, the statute makes the tenant's possession of the land notice to the purchaser of the length and duration of the term of tenancy; but it does not follow that that possession is notice of the tenant's claim of right in regard to every separate appurtenance or incident to the property. The possession of land is notice of "whatever right or title the occupant has," to which should be added "in the land." But it is not notice of exceptional rights claimed in particular parts of the land that differs from his general right. Suppose, for instance, that a tenant for a term of years should enter into an agreement with his landlord, under the terms of which the tenant would set out in various parts of the land rented a large number of trees, consisting of shade trees, and fruit trees, and under the terms of this agreement the tenant should have the right at the expiration of the lease, upon his removal from the premises, to take and remove all of the shade trees on a designated part of the land, and one-third of the fruit trees. This would be an agreement enforceable as against the landlord; and, though these became a part of the realty, the landlord could not prevent the removal of them. But could it be insisted that if the landlord sold the property to a third person during the continuance of the lease, the tenant, as against the third person, would have the right to remove those trees, although the purchaser had no notice of this exceptional privilege which was reserved? If so, a purchaser of land in possession of a tenant would be compelled to make inquiries of varied and extensive scope, or otherwise be concluded as to an agreement between the tenant and the landlord concerning the right of the tenant to remove fixtures. We do not think that mere knowledge upon the part of the city of the occupancy of the premises in controversy by the defendant under a lease put the city upon notice of the agreement between the landlord and the tenant as to the removal of permanent fixtures.

It follows from what we have said that the court should have granted the interlocutory injunction.

Judgment reversed.

NATIONAL SURETY CO. v. CITY OF ATLANTA. (No. 1946.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 17, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Contracts \S 10(4)—Contract for delivery in installments lacks mutuality, when authorizing buyer to terminate.

Where, in response to an advertisement by a municipality for bids for the furnishing and delivery of coal for a period of 12 months, a bid is made to furnish a specified number of tons, and a contract is afterwards entered into for the delivery of so many tons per month at a given price and at a stated place, but it is expressly stipulated in the contract that the purchaser shall be at liberty at any time by a written notice to order a suspension of deliveries of the coal and to refuse to accept further deliveries, the element of mutuality is wanting in the contract.

2. Contracts ¶10(4)—Contract lacking mutuality not rendered binding by orders for part of quantity of coal sold.

Orders subsequently given by the purchaser for deliveries of a portion of the quantity included in the bid will not render the contract binding upon the bidder, even for the delivery of the portion thus ordered. This is not an acceptance of the bid as made.

3. Principal and surety ¶7—Bond to secure performance of invalid contract not enforceable.

There being no contract binding upon the principal, the bond for performance was not enforceable against the surety.

Certiorari from Court of Appeals.

Action by the City of Atlanta against the National Surety Company. A judgment overruling a demurrer was affirmed by the Court of Appeals (24 Ga. App. 732, 102 S. E. 175), and defendant brings certiorari. Reversed.

The city of Atlanta brought suit against the National Surety Company, alleging a breach, on the part of the defendant as guarantor, of a bond guaranteeing to the plaintiff the performance of certain obligations assumed by the Tennessee & Southeastern Coal Company under an alleged contract between the coal company and the city of Atlanta, whereby the coal company promised to furnish and deliver to the city coal in certain carload quantities at certain intervals during a period of 12 months. The alleged contract provided that the coal company would furnish the coal upon orders of a designated officer of the city, and contained a provision for the suspension of deliveries of the coal under the contract upon written notice from the city. The petition set out the bond and the alleged contract between the coal company and the city, which was executed by both parties, and alleged a failure upon the part of the coal company to carry out its promises and undertakings therein contained, and that by reason of such failure the defendant breached the bond sued on, to the damage of the plaintiff. The petition contained two counts. The first count alleged the existence of a contract between the coal company and the city, by the terms of which the coal company was obligated to furnish coal to the city as above stated, and alleged a breach of the same by reason of the failure on the part of the coal company to perform, to the damage of the city, thereby constituting a breach of the bond. The second count alleged written communication from the city to the coal company from time to time throughout the year, ordering coal in small quantities, in accordance with the promises and obligations of the coal company as contained in the alleged contract, and the refusal and failure on the part of the coal company to furnish coal in compliance with such orders, to the damage of the city, thereby constituting a breach of the bond. The defendant demurred to the petition, upon the grounds that the alleged contract attached thereto was void for want of consideration; that it was lacking in mutuality, and fixed no binding obligation upon the city, and, there being no contract to be performed, there appeared no breach of the bond, which had been given to secure the performance of a contract which did not exist; and that the petition failed generally to set out a cause of action. The demurrer was overruled by the trial court, and this ruling was affirmed by the Court of Appeals (24 Ga. App. 732, 102 S. E. 175). The case was then brought by writ of certiorari to this court.

Little, Powell, Smith & Goldstein, of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error.

J. L. Mayson and J. M. Wood, both of Atlanta, for defendant in error.

BECK, P. J. (after stating the facts as above). The statement of facts appearing above is substantially that made by the Court of Appeals in its official report. The demurrer setting forth the contention that the contract was unilateral, and fixed no binding obligation upon the city, and was therefore lacking in mutuality, raised the question upon the determination of which depended the right of the plaintiff to a verdict in the case.

[1] We agree with the Court of Appeals that the contract in the case was unilateral. The insertion in the contract of the stipulation contained in the ninth paragraph of the contract destroyed any quality of mutuality which might have existed in the contract had that paragraph been omitted. That paragraph reads in part as follows:

"It is further agreed that the deliveries are to be made at the rate of five (5) cars per week to each station, or in quantities more or less as may be ordered by the general manager of the department of waterworks of the city of Atlanta. All coal must be delivered in hopper bottom cars. After verbal or written notice has been given to deliver coal under this contract, a further notice may be served in writing upon the contractor to make delivery of the coal so ordered within twenty-four (24) hours after receipt of said second notice. Should the contractor, for any reason, fail to comply with the second notice, the city will be at liberty to buy coal in the open market and to charge against the contractor any excess in price of coal so purchased, over the adjusted price. After a verbal or written notice to suspend deliveries under this contract, a further notice may be served in writing to suspend deliveries of coal, and the city will be at liberty to refuse to accept any coal delivered after forty-eight (48) hours from date of such written notice."

If, independently of the part of the contract quoted, the city agreed to take the coal which the contractor by its bid offered to supply in response to the city's advertisement for bids, that portion of the contract just quoted left it entirely optional with the city to take or refuse to take the coal. A contract for the purchase of goods to be delivered in lots throughout a period of 12 months, which gives the purchaser the right at any time to serve notice upon the party contracting to deliver the goods to suspend deliveries, and stipulates that upon giving this notice to suspend deliveries the purchaser will be "at liberty to refuse to accept" any further deliveries after 48 hours from the date of such written notice, is not a contract binding upon the purchaser. If the purchaser can at pleasure cancel an agreement to purchase, he has incurred no obligation; and to render a contract mutual, the obligation must be upon both parties.

[2] Thus far we agree with the Court of Appeals. But we cannot agree that where subsequently the city from time to time ordered the delivery of the coal which the contractor offered to supply at the stipulated rates, it thereby converted the contract into an obligation binding upon both parties. If before the offer to deliver the coal was withdrawn the city had closed with the offer of the contractor, accepting its proposal for the supply of coal, the mutuality in the contract, lacking as it stood, might have been supplied. But the mere ordering or the delivery of a part of the coal from time to time was not an acceptance of the bid of the contractor. This case differs in material particulars from the case of Buick Motor Co. v. Thompson, 138 Ga. 282, 75 S. E. 354. The contract relied on in that case, headed "Memorandum," was in the form of a letter from the motor company to a retail dealer, who afterwards sued the company for a breach of the contract, and was in the following language:

"D. V. Thompson, Pelham, Ga. Until further advised, but not later than July 31, 1909, provided the handling of your business is not in conflict with policy of our company, the Buick Motor Company will, the conditions permitting, supply you with goods of its manufacture, herein described by letter and number (and more particularly described in its 1909 catalogue), at the following prices and terms."

Then followed an itemized list of the cars, their model, price, and the quantity. It was said in that case:

"It was urged that the contract was unilateral, and that it did not bind the plaintiff to buy, and accordingly did not bind the defendant to sell. Where mutual promises are relied on as the consideration to support a contract, the obligations of the contract must be mutually binding upon the respective parties. Morrow v. Southern Express Co., 101 Ga. 810, 28 S. E. 998. This does not exclude the fact that one may, for a valuable consideration other than such mutual promises, bind himself by an option or offer to sell on certain terms during a specified time. In such a case he is bound to keep the offer open during the specified time, for the other party to accept or decline to buy. If acceptance is made within the time prescribed, the transaction then ceases to be a mere option or offer, and becomes a contract to sell and buy."

And in conclusion it was held that the demurrer of the defendant in the case was properly overruled. If in the present case the contractor had, in response to an advertisement calling for bids of such a character, offered to supply the city with coal of a certain character at a specified price per ton, or had offered to furnish, say, 10 tons per month, at a specified price per ton, and before the offer was withdrawn the city had ordered monthly so many tons, the acceptance of this offer would have made a binding contract upon the coal company, and it would have been bound to deliver. But in this case, where there was an offer to furnish 12 months' supply, some 18,000 tons, at a price stated, a specified number of tons to be delivered monthly, with the right reserved in the contract by the city to stop deliveries at any time, the subsequent orders for installment deliveries of coal did not impose an obligation on the bidder to deliver the installments thus ordered. The ruling in the case of McCaw Mfg. Co. v. Felder, 115 Ga. 408, 41 S. E. 664, is based upon facts essentially different from the present case.

[3] We have therefore reached the conclusion that because of lack of mutuality in the contract it was not binding upon the coal company. And it then necessarily follows that as there is no valid contract binding upon the principal, the surety upon the bond given by the principal for the compliance with the contract would not be liable.

A decision of the constitutional question raised in the application for certiorari is unnecessary, in view of the foregoing, and, moreover, it was not made in the trial court.

Judgment reversed.

REYNOLDS v. REYNOLDS. (No. 1907.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 21, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. New trial \S 21—Remark of court, in denying nonsuit, as to necessity of strengthening case, held not to require new trial.

The court announced, in response to a motion for nonsuit, that he would overrule the motion, but added, continuing his remarks to counsel, that the testimony for plaintiff would have to be strengthened, or he would reconsider his denial of the nonsuit later in the case. Other evidence was introduced to strengthen the plaintiff's case, and the motion for the grant of a nonsuit was not sustained. Held that, though the jury were present in the courtroom at the time the remarks were made, a new trial will not be granted, as the court was addressing himself, not to the jury, but to counsel, in regard to the motion for a nonsuit.

2. New trial \S 53—That jury had been in courtroom during other similar cases held not ground, when no objection made.

The fact that the jury trying this case remained in the courtroom while other divorce cases were being tried, and that this was known to counsel at the time, will not be a valid ground of a motion for a new trial; no objection having been made to proceeding with the trial.

3. New trial \S 140(3)—Motion on ground that jurors read newspaper article must be supported by proof; affidavit held insufficient as showing affiant's knowledge was hearsay.

The ground of the motion for a new trial alleging that two named jurors read an article in a daily newspaper published in the city where the trial was had, commenting upon the trial and ridiculing the ground of the divorce in the plaintiff's petition, cannot avail the plaintiff here, in the absence of proof that the article referred to was actually read by one or both of the jurors named. The statement in the affidavit of counsel that he learned of the alleged fact after the verdict is not sufficient, and indicates that counsel had merely hearsay evidence of the fact upon which this ground of the motion for new trial is based.

4. Divorce \S 184(12)—Judgment not reversed for inaccurate instruction, which was not hurtful.

The charge of the court as to the necessity of corroborating evidence or circumstances to authorize the finding by the jury in favor of plaintiff on the ground of adultery, where confession of the defendant is relied on to establish the alleged act of adultery, while containing an inaccurate statement of the law, was not hurtful to the plaintiff.

5. Divorce \S 148—Instruction as to corroboration of confession held not to exclude letters from consideration.

Instructions to the jury to the effect that, unless the evidence of confession was corroborated, the jury could not find in favor of the plaintiff upon the charge of adultery, did not have the effect of excluding from the consideration of the jury certain letters introduced by the plaintiff, which were alleged to be a corroboration.

6. Verdict for plaintiff not required by evidence.

The evidence in the case did not authorize a verdict granting a divorce on the ground of cruel treatment, the evidence upon the charge of habitual intoxication was conflicting, and a verdict for the defendant on this ground was authorized.

Simon N. Gazan, of Savannah, for defendant in error.

BECK, P. J. Mrs. Gertrude Reynolds brought a libel for divorce against her husband, Edgar Reynolds, on the three grounds of cruel treatment, habitual intoxication, and adultery. The husband denied the alleged acts of cruel treatment, habitual intoxication, and adultery. The jury returned a verdict refusing a divorce; and the plaintiff made a motion for a new trial, which was overruled.

[1, 2, 4-6] The rulings made in headnotes 1, 2, 4, 5, and 6 require no elaboration.

[3] The remaining ground of the motion for a new trial is based upon the alleged fact that one of the jurors, after having been impaneled, and after having heard a part of the evidence in the case, read an article in a daily newspaper published in the city where the trial took place, which contained comments upon the case on trial, and which, it is contended, ridiculed the plaintiff's grounds for divorce, intimating that the same were frivolous, etc. The alleged fact of the juror's having read this article is not proved by competent evidence. In reference to this ground, the plaintiff made an affidavit deposing that the knowledge of the occurrence came to her after the rendition of the verdict; but she does not state affirmatively that the juror did read the article. One of the counsel for plaintiff also made an affidavit deposing that—

"he learned subsequently to the rendition of the verdict that the juror had read the article in the Savannah Press of December 3d, which is attached to the amended motion, and that another juror had heard the same talked about; that he did not have the means or opportunity of learning these facts until after the rendition of the verdict."

This affidavit does not contain affirmative proof that the two jurors read the article or heard the same talked about, the source of the attorney's information is not given, and apparently he based his conclusion that the article had been read, as charged, upon purely hearsay evidence.

Judgment affirmed.

All the Justices concur, except

ATKINSON, J. (dissenting). In the case of Styles v. State, 129 Ga. 425, 59 S. E. 249, 12 Ann. Cas. 176, the judgment was reversed solely on the ground of newly discovered evidence as to misconduct of certain jurors in reading an article in a newspaper prejudicial to the accused, after they had been selected to serve in the case. The defense submitted an affidavit of a juror tending to show the alleged misconduct; but, as a juror cannot be heard to impeach his verdict (Civil Code, § 5933), the affidavit of the juror was considered of no value by this court, and it was held:

"Where a motion for new trial, predicated upon the improper conduct of certain of the jurors charged with the trial of the case, recites that 'the jurors, after they had been impaneled and before all the evidence had been submitted, read copies' of a certain 'newspaper containing a certain editorial,' which was 'calculated to mislead the jurors, prejudice their verdict,' etc., and there is no denial by the state, and the recitals of the motion are certified by the judge to be true, the motion and certificate will be construed to mean that the jurors actually read the editorial to which the objection related."

The decision thus rendered was decisive of the exact question involved in the ruling made in the third division of the opinion. The case was decided by all the Justices, and has never been reviewed and modified, and is controlling.

NEW YORK LIFE INS. CO. v. PATTEN.*
(No. 2108.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 19, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Insurance §376(1)—Agreement in application held to prevent agent's knowledge of falsity of representation being imputable to insurer.

An applicant for a policy of life insurance, "in his written and signed application for the policy," made a false representation as to a matter material to the risk. The application contained the following: "I agree * * * that only the president, a vice president, a second vice president, a secretary or the treasurer of the company can make, modify, or discharge contracts or waive any of the company's rights or requirements, and that none of these acts can be done by the agent taking this application." The insurance agent who solicited and delivered the policy knew, at the time of soliciting the writing and the delivery thereof, of this false representation made by the insured. Held that, in view of the express limitations upon the power of the soliciting agent who received the application and who made manual delivery of the policy, the knowledge of such agent is not imputable to the insurer.

Certified Question from Court of Appeals.

Action by E. E. Patten against the New York Life Insurance Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brought error to the Court of Appeals, which certified a question to the Supreme Court. Question answered in the negative.

Bryan & Middlebrooks, of Atlanta, and Franklin & Langdale, of Valdosta, for plaintiff in error.

E. K. Wilcox, of Valdosta, for defendant in error.

GEORGE, J. The question certified by the Court of Appeals is based upon the following state of facts:

"This was a suit upon a policy of life insurance issued by the New York Life Insurance Company. A verdict was returned in favor of the plaintiff, and a new trial was subsequently denied. The undisputed evidence showed the insured, in his written and signed application for the policy sued upon, made a false representation as to a matter material to the risk, to wit, that no application for insurance upon his life had ever been declined or was then pending. It also appears that in that application the insured stipulated as follows: 'I agree * * * that only the president, a vice president, a second vice president, a secretary, or the treasurer of the company can make, modify, or discharge contracts, or waive any of the company's rights or requirements, and that none of these acts can be done by the agent taking the application.' There was evidence showing that the defendant company's agent who solicited and delivered the policy knew, at the time of the solicitation, the writing and the delivery thereof, of this false representation made by the insured."

The question is whether, in view of the express limitations contained in the application upon the authority of the agent who received the application and who made the manual delivery of the policy, the knowledge of such agent is imputable to the insurer. The question excludes that class of cases where the application contains no express limitations upon the power of the agent. It also excludes that class of cases where the application contains express limitations upon the power of the agent, but where the applicant has no notice or knowledge of such limitations, or where the agent has himself inserted false statements without authority from the applicant and without his knowledge or assent. While much may be said to the contrary, and there are many cases in other jurisdictions apparently to the contrary, nevertheless, in view of our own cases, the question propounded must be answered in the negative. In the recent case of Reliance Life Insurance Co. v. Hightower, 148 Ga. 843, 845, 98 S. E. 469, 470, this court ruled:

"An insurance company may limit the power of its agent; and when notice that the agent's power is limited is brought home to the insured in such manner as would put a prudent man on his guard, the insured relies at his peril on any act of the agent in excess of his power. The insured is bound by plain and unambiguous limitations upon the power of the agent contained in his policy."

In addition to the cases there cited see Home Friendly Society v. Berry, 94 Ga. 606, 21 S. E. 583. See, also, Keasler v. Mutual Life Insurance Co. of New York, 177 N. C. 394, 99 S. E. 97, a case dealing with a Georgia contract of life insurance; Ætna Life Insurance Co. v. Moore, 231 U. S. 543, 34 Sup. Ct. 186, 58 L. Ed. 356; Prudential Life Insurance Co. v. Moore, 231 U. S. 560, 34 Sup. Ct. 191, 58 L. Ed. 367; Mutual Life Insurance Co. v. Hilton-Green, 241 U. S. 613, 36 Sup. Ct. 676, 60 L. Ed. 1202. Attention is again directed to the distinction between the powers of agents of fire and life companies. Generally the agent of a fire insurance company has power to fill up and issue the policies, and the acts and knowledge of such agent are the acts and knowledge of the company. There is therefore manifest propriety in holding that the knowledge of such agent is imputable to the company. This is true even though the policy undertakes to limit expressly the power of the agent. In other words, where the agent is charged by the company with the duty of acquiring knowledge for the company, or is clothed by the company with the actual or apparent authority to act for the company in the issuance of the policy, express limitations upon the power of such agent will not prevent the application of the general rule that knowledge of the agent as to matters within the general scope of his authority is the knowledge of the principal. Johnson v. Ætna Insurance Co., 123 Ga. 404, 51 S. E. 339, 107 Am. St. Rep. 92. The applicant in the instant case expressly agreed that "the agent taking the application" could not "waive any of the company's rights or requirements." Manifestly, a life insurance company may define and limit the power of a mere soliciting agent; and one dealing with such agent cannot set up a waiver which he knew the agent had no power to make. The fact that such agent is intrusted with the policy merely for the purpose of making manual delivery thereof to the applicant does not alter the case.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Knowledge of agent not imputable to insurer.

Where the written application, signed by the applicant, for a policy of life insurance contains a stipulation "that only the president, a vice president, a second vice president, a secretary or the treasurer of the company can make, modify, or discharge contracts or waive any of the company's rights or requirements, and that none of these acts can be done by the agent taking this application," and where the applicant makes in his application a false representation as to a matter material to the risk, to wit, that no application for insurance upon his life had ever been declined or was then pending, and where the agent who solicited and delivered the policy to the applicant knew of this false representation at the time of the soliciting and delivery thereof, the knowledge of the agent was not imputable to the company, and, the company itself having no such knowledge, the policy was void, and no recovery could be had thereon.

Error from City Court of Valdosta; J. G. Cranford, Judge.

Action by E. E. Patten against the New York Life Insurance Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed in conformity to answer of Supreme Court to certified question (151 Ga. —, 106 S. E. 183).

Bryan & Middlebrooks, of Atlanta, and Franklin & Langdale, of Valdosta, for plaintiff in error.

E. K. Wilcox, of Valdosta, for defendant in error.

LUKE, J. This was a suit upon a policy of life insurance issued by the New York Life Insurance Company. A verdict was returned in favor of the plaintiff, and a new trial was subsequently denied. The undisputed evidence showed that the insured, in his written and signed application for the policy sued upon, made a false representation as to a matter material to the risk, to wit, that no application for insurance upon his life had ever been declined or was then pending. It also appears that in that application the insured stipulated as follows:

"I agree * * * that only the president, a vice president, a second vice president, a secretary, or the treasurer of the company can make, modify, or discharge contracts, or waive any of the company's rights or requirements, and that none of these acts can be done by the agent taking this application."

There was evidence showing that the defendant company's agent, who solicited and delivered the policy, knew, at the time of the solicitation, the writing, and the delivery thereof, of this false representation made by the insured. It is conceded by counsel for the insured that the plaintiff could not legally recover except for the last-stated fact. He insists, however, that as the soliciting agent knew of the false representation made by the insured in his application, the knowledge of the agent was the knowledge of the company, and it therefore waived its right to set up this false representation as a defense to the action.

This court certified to the Supreme Court the question whether, under the above-stated facts, the knowledge of the company's agent who solicited and delivered the policy was the knowledge of the company, and the answer of the Supreme Court is substantially set forth in the headnote to this case. See 151 Ga. —, 106 S. E. 183, rendered February 19, 1921.

It follows from what has been said that the verdict in favor of the plaintiff was contrary to law and the evidence, and that the court erred in overruling the motion for a new trial.

WESTCHESTER FIRE INS. CO. v. BELL.
(No. 1825.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 21, 1921.
Rehearing Denied Feb. 28, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Insurance §421—Damage from blowing up neighboring building to prevent spread of fire within exception as to explosion; statutory provision may be avoided by express stipulation; exception not contrary to public policy.

A policy issued to the owner of a described building insured him in a stated amount against all direct loss or damage by fire, except as provided in the policy, which might be sustained by the assured upon the building; it being further provided therein that the insurer should not be liable for loss caused directly or indirectly by explosion of any kind, unless fire ensues, and in that event for damage by fire only. Held, that a loss by the breaking of glass in the doors and windows, and by the destruction of plastering in the insured building, caused from concussion alone produced by explosion of dynamite employed by the fire department of a city in blowing up a neighboring building to prevent a further spread of a conflagration which threatened to burn the injured building, fell within the exception stated in the policy, and the company was not liable therefor; and this is true notwithstanding the declaration in the Civ. Code 1910, § 2476, that "a loss or injury may occur from fire without the actual burning of the articles or property; as, a house blown up to stop a conflagration."

King & Spalding, of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error.

McElreath & Scott, of Atlanta, for defendant in error.

FISH, C. J. Bell brought suit against the Westchester Fire Insurance Company in the municipal court of Atlanta, upon a policy of insurance issued by the defendant. The case was tried by the court without a jury, upon an agreed statement of facts; and judgment was rendered against the defendant; it was taken by certiorari to the superior court, where the judgment of the trial court was affirmed. Upon writ of error to the Court of Appeals there was an affirmance of the ruling of the superior court 24 Ga. App. 528, 101 S. E. 590. The case is here on certiorari to the Court of Appeals.

The policy was on the building known as 670 North Boulevard in the city of Atlanta. While it was in force a conflagration occurred in the city, which became so great that the fire department, in order to prevent its farther progress, resorted to the use of dynamite to blow up the buildings in the path of the fire, the purpose being to thus stop the progress of the conflagration, and to prevent its extending beyond the buildings thus dynamited. A building approximately 150 feet distant from No. 670 was for such purpose dynamited, but no part thereof was burned, but the concussion of the air resulting from the explosion caused by the dynamite broke many glasses in the doors and windows and destroyed plastering in No. 670, the insured building, which was not ignited by fire. Due proof of such loss was made by the plaintiff. The question whether the insurance company would have been liable under the policy, in view of the general law of insurance, or under the Civil Code 1910, § 2476, providing that:

"A loss or injury may occur from fire without the actual burning of the article or property; as, a house blown up to stop a conflagration"

—had there been no excepting clause in the policy, is of course not here for decision. The only question presented for determination is whether or not the loss claimed is covered by the policy in suit, or excepted therefrom.

It is clear to us that the loss was not covered by the policy, but fell squarely within the exception set out therein. The policy insured "against all direct loss or damage by fire, except as provided in the policy, which might be sustained by the assured upon" the building known as No. 670, etc. The exception is that the company "shall not be liable for loss caused directly or indirectly by invasion, insurrection, riot, civil war or commotion, or military or usurped power, or by order of any civil authority; or by theft; or by neglect of the insured to use all reasonable means to save and preserve the property at and after a fire or when the property is endangered by fire in neighboring premises; or (unless fire ensues, and, in that event, for damage by fire only) by explosion of any kind, or lightning, but liability for direct damage by lightning may be assumed by specific agreement hereon." The exception expressly states that the company shall not be liable for loss caused directly or indirectly by explosion of any kind, unless fire ensues, and, in that event, for damage by fire only. This language is explicit and unequivocal. The use of the expression "explosion of any kind" indicates that explosions of more than one kind were contemplated; and the obvious meaning of the exception is that the company shall not be liable for loss caused directly or indirectly by any kind of an explosion whatsoever, unless fire ensues from the explosion, and in that event the company shall be liable for damages caused by the fire only, and not by the explosion. The provision of our Civil Code, § 2476, which, in effect, declares that a house blown up to stop a conflagration may be considered a loss by fire, if applicable to the facts of this case, cannot be considered a part of the contract of insurance under the policy here involved, for the conclusive reason that the language embodied in the exception in the policy necessarily excludes the provisions of the Code section from the contract made by the policy. The exception was doubtless inserted in the policy with the specific intention of preventing such Code section, and similar statutes of other states, as well as the general law of insurance as pronounced by some courts from becoming a part of the policy. The Code section not requiring expressly, or even impliedly, that its provisions shall become and constitute a part of every policy of fire insurance executed in this state, the parties to such a contract of insurance had a right to avoid its application by an express stipulation in the policy which necessarily excluded it. Nor do we see how the contract of insurance entered into voluntarily and knowingly by the parties thereto, and which necessarily eliminates therefrom a provision of the Code that the blowing up of a house to prevent a conflagration may be a fire loss, contravenes public policy.

The question whether a loss of the character of that in this case falls within an exception in a policy similar to the one here involved has been before many courts of last resort; and the overwhelming weight of authority is to the effect that such a loss falls within the exception, and that the company is not liable. See United States Life, etc., Co. v. Foote, 22 Ohio St. 340, 10 Am. Rep. 735; Transatlantic Fire Ins. Co. v. Dorsey, 58 Md. 70, 40 Am. Rep. 403; Briggs v. Ins. Co., 53 N. Y. 446, 449; Mitchell v. Potomac Ins. Co., 183 U. S. 42, 22 Sup. Ct. 22, 46 L. Ed. 74; Washburn v. Western Ins. Co., Fed. Cas. Judgment reversed.

All the Justices concur, except

BECK, P. J., and ATKINSON, J. (dissenting). The statute (Civil Code, § 2476) referred to in the opinion of the majority, defines "loss by fire," and makes it include loss by explosion of dynamite when done to stop a conflagration. Under this definition, a loss is "by fire," whether caused by actual flames or from explosion of dynamite made to stop a conflagration. The contract of insurance must be construed in connection with the statute, which becomes a part of the contract. The explosion of dynamite to stop the conflagration was intentional, and was done for the benefit of both the insurer and insured. That is not the kind of explosion contemplated by the exception in the policy of insurance. It had reference to accidental explosions or explosion from other causes, such as might result from negligence or wrongdoing, or other cause than voluntary act where necessary and done to stop a conflagration. Applying the contract as embodying the statute, if dynamite is exploded to prevent a conflagration, and a window in a neighboring building be broken by the concussion, the loss would be as much a direct loss by fire, within the meaning of the contract, as if a burning coal blowing from a conflagration should touch the window and cause it to break from the heat. If the contract, as embodied in the policy of insurance, should be literally or strictly construed without reference to the statute, a different result would be required; but the statute is by operation of law written into the contract, and its provisions are not excluded expressly or by necessary implication by the language of the policy. The decisions cited by the majority did not involve cases in which statutes similar to the Code provision, supra, entered into the contract.

Where it is provided in the application, which by the terms of the certificate is made a part of the contract, that knowledge by or information to the officers of the subordinate lodge of the society shall not be notice to the society or binding upon it, but that the society shall be bound only by knowledge or information in writing to the officers of the bureau of endowment of the society, any knowledge or information had by the officers of the subordinate lodge, either at the time of the issuance of the certificate or afterwards, that the beneficiaries named therein were not such as were entitled to be named as beneficiaries and receive benefits under the laws of the society, is not notice to the society. *Union Fraternal League v. 3. Insurance ⇐777—Verdict for plaintiff unauthorized, where beneficiaries were not within classes specified and society was not charged with notice.

In a suit on the policy by the beneficiaries named therein, where it appeared that none of them sustained the relation of husband or wife to the insured, or were dependent upon him for support and maintenance, and where it appeared that no notice of these facts, either at the time the policy was issued or afterwards, was ever possessed by the officers of the bureau of endowment of the society, but was possessed only by certain officers of the subordinate lodge, a verdict for the plaintiff was unauthorized.

CALLAWAY v. JANKO. (No. 11381.)(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2.
Feb. 24, 1921.)*(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)1. Malicious prosecution §16—Probable cause sufficient defense, notwithstanding malice.

Probable cause alone, without any proof of the absence of malice, is a defense to a suit for malicious prosecution, or malicious use of legal process.

2. Process §171—In action for malicious use, instruction for defendant, if suit instituted with probable cause and without malice, held misleading.

In an action for malicious use of legal process in a bail trover suit, in which plaintiff was arrested, an instruction that, if the suit was instituted with probable cause, with good faith, and without malice, plaintiff could not recover, was erroneous, as giving the impression that it was necessary to show both probable cause and the absence of malice, though the law was stated correctly in another portion of the charge.

T. B. Higdon, of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error.

C. D. Maddox and S. M. Castleton, both of Atlanta, for defendant in error.

STEPHENS, J. [1,2] 1. Probable cause alone, without any proof of the absence of malice, is a defense to a suit for a malicious prosecution or a malicious use of legal process. Upon the trial of an action for malicious use of legal process, it was therefore error to charge that if the prosecution, which was a trover suit to recover a piano, instituted against the plaintiff by the defendant, and which caused the plaintiff's arrest, was instituted by the defendant with probable cause, with good faith, and without malice, the plaintiff could not recover. Such charge was error, even though the judge elsewhere in his charge correctly stated the law. Such erroneous statement, standing untruncated, was calculated to influence the jury and give them the impression that it was necessary to a successful defense against a suit for a malicious use of legal process, where probable cause appeared, to show the absence of malice. The language in the charge excepted to reads as follows:

"If the proceedings were instituted in good faith, with probable cause, and without malice, the defendant had the right to institute these proceedings for his property, and the plaintiff could not recover. In this case, gentlemen, I charge you that under the undisputed evidence Mr. Callaway would have a right to institute bail trover proceedings in the name of and for his principal, the Commercial Security Company, provided he had probable cause and it was not carried on with malice."

2. Since the judgment denying the defendant's motion for a new trial is reversed, it is not necessary to pass upon the assignment of error to the effect that the verdict for the plaintiff is excessive.

3. No other error of law appears, and the judgment is reversed, upon the ground that the court erred in overruling the defendant's motion for a new trial upon the ground of the above error in the charge.

Judgment reversed.

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2.
Feb. 15, 1921.)*(Syllabus by the Court.)1. Master and servant §234(1)—Injury by known or discoverable defect not actionable.

While the master is bound to exercise ordinary care in furnishing machinery reasonably safe for his servant to operate with ordinary care and diligence, yet the servant assumes the ordinary risk of his employment and is bound to exercise his own skill and diligence to protect himself, and where he is injured by reason of a defect in the machinery caused by the failure of the master to comply with the above duty, the servant cannot recover if he knew of the defect and the danger incident thereto, or could by the exercise of due care have discovered the danger and avoided the injury. Civil Code 1910, §§ 3130, 3131.

2. Master and servant §234(4), 236(6)—Injury to machine operator from known or discoverable defect held not actionable; danger from defective machine held obvious.

Where a servant in the discharge of his duty in feeding cotton to a machine which receives the cotton on steel teeth revolving on a cylinder is, by too great an intake of the cotton caused by a too large and defective construction of the mouth of the machine, injured by his hand becoming caught in the revolving teeth, he cannot recover from the master for an injury caused by the master's failure to comply with the duty mentioned in the presiding paragraph, even though the master knew of the defective condition of the machine and the danger incident to operating it, when it appears that the servant also knew of such defect and danger, or by due care could have discovered such danger. Where a bar or guard, belonging over the mouth of the machine for the purpose of regulating and retarding the inflow of the cotton, is displaced, and the mouth of the machine thereby rendered too large, thus causing the machine to become dangerous to one feeding cotton into it with the hand, such danger is perfectly obvious to a servant who actually knows of the defect.

3. Master and servant §245(4)—Injury to servant knowing obvious danger from compliance with order not actionable.

A servant cannot recover for an injury upon the ground of having complied with a negligent order of the master if the servant knew of the obvious danger incident to a compliance with the order. Southern Railway Co. v. Taylor, 137 Ga. 704, 73 S. E. 1055, and cases there cited.

4. Master and servant §260(3) — Petition showing servant knew of defect and that danger was obvious states no cause of action.

In a suit by a servant against the master to recover damages for a personal injury alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the master in failing to furnish machinery reasonably safe for the servant to operate, where the plaintiff declares upon the above-stated facts, no cause of action is alleged, and it is error to overrule a general demurrer to the petition.

RAKESTRAW v. LUBBOCK. (No. 11581.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2. Feb. 24, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Landlord and tenant §25(2)—Lease executed by tenant under seal and by landlord not under seal valid as simple contract.

A lease contract executed by the tenant under seal and by the landlord not under seal, while not a contract under seal, is nevertheless a valid simple contract in writing. See, in this connection, Allen v. Montgomery, 25 Ga. App. 817, 105 S. E. 33.

2. Landlord and tenant §296(1)—Tenant cannot be summarily dispossessed because of subletting contrary to agreement.

Except in cases of a tenant at will or sufferance, a tenant may be dispossessed by summary proceedings only when he fails to pay the rent when due or when holding over and beyond the term for which the premises have been rented to him. It follows that the violation by a tenant of his written contract "not to sublet the premises or any part thereof without the written consent of" the landlord does not authorize the landlord to summarily dispossess the tenant. Civil Code 1910, § 5385.

3. Landlord and tenant \S 89½, 309—Lease may be renewed by paying rent to landlord's agents; inference of renewal authorized when tenant continues to pay rent; inference against renewal not demanded when evidence conflicting.

A lease may be renewed by the tenant for an additional term by a payment of the rent under the terms of the lease to the duly authorized agent of the landlord, and where the tenant after the termination of the lease contract continues to pay rent to the agent of the landlord who receives the rent, the inference is authorized that the lease was renewed under its terms. There appearing a conflict in the evidence as to whether or not the agent had authority to act for the landlord in receiving the rent and renewing the lease, the inference is not demanded that the lease had not been renewed, and that the tenant was holding over beyond his term, or that he had not paid the rent.

4. Landlord and tenant \S 308(3)—Verdict for tenant in proceeding to dispossess held authorized by evidence.

This being a proceeding by a landlord to dispossess his tenant under Civil Code, 1910, § 5385, and the evidence authorizing the inference that the tenant had paid the rent, and that he was not holding over beyond his term, a verdict for the defendant was authorized, and the judge did not err in overruling the certiorari.

SMITH v. HARRISON et al. (No. 11273.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2.
Feb. 24, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Sales \S 62, 409—Contract held entire; on failure to deliver agreed installment right of action for breach of entire contract accrues.

In a bilateral contract of sale an obligation by the seller to deliver to the buyer by a certain date a gross quantity of a certain commodity for a certain estimated price, as "1,000 gross of round quart bottles at the rate of $1.80 per gross," but which must be delivered in certain stipulated quantities periodically at certain designated periods, is entire, and a failure by him to make any one of the deliveries at the time agreed upon amounts to a breach of the entire obligation and gives to the buyer the right to elect to bring suit before maturity for such damages as he may have sustained by reason of such breach. Civ. Code 1910, §§ 3588, 4121, 4223, 4228, 4389; Henderson Elevator Co. v. North Georgia Milling Co., 126 Ga. 279, 55 S. E. 50; Central Georgia Brick Co. v. Carolina Portland Cement Co., 136 Ga. 693, 71 S. E. 1048; Phosphate Mining Co. v. Atlanta Oil & Fertilizer Co., 20 Ga. App. 660, 93 S. E. 532; 3 Williston on Contracts, §§ 1298, 1336.

2. Sales \S 418(7)—Measure of damages for seller's breach of contract for delivery in installments stated; damages not abated because buyer had no use for goods or did not purchase them in the market.

In such an action the buyer may recover such damages as he would have sustained by a nonperformance by the seller of his obligations upon their maturity, viz. the difference in the contract price and the market value at the time and place of delivery, subject to abatement by any circumstances of which the buyer ought reasonably to have availed himself or did avail himself to mitigate his loss. Roehm v. Horst, 178 U. S. 1, 20 Sup. Ct. 780, 44 L. Ed. 953; 3 Williston on Contracts, § 1297. It is no defense to the seller and no ground for abatement in the buyer's damage that the latter contracted for the bottles for a purpose not mentioned in the contract, and that he had no use for them or that he failed to go into the market and buy.

3. Sales \S 176(3)—Demand that seller deliver installment does not waive right to sue for breach if demand refused.

Where the seller defaulted in making a periodic delivery under the contract, a demand by the buyer that the seller perform this obligation does not amount to a waiver by the buyer of his right to sue for the entire breach upon the seller's refusing to comply with such demand.

4. Sales \S 107—Failure to make payment does not justify refusal to deliver without notice that terms of contract will be insisted on.

Assuming that the seller could justify his refusal to make further deliveries under the terms of the contract upon the ground that the buyer had failed to make payment for any past delivery, yet, since the parties to a contract may in the course of its execution depart from its terms and pay or receive money under such departure without any right in the other party to treat such departure as a violation of the contract, in the absence of reasonable notice of his intention to do so given by the other party (Civ. Code 1910, § 4227), the seller cannot, after having acquiesced in such departure and having failed to give such notice to the buyer, justify his refusal to comply with his obligation to deliver under the terms of the contract upon the ground that the buyer has failed to make payment for a past delivery.

5. Sales \S 153—Tender at buyer's place of business during absence held insufficient.

"A tender of specific articles must be such as to enable the party to whom tendered to take immediate possession, and at the time and place agreed on in the contract. If no place is agreed on, they must be carried to the person entitled to them, if residing within this state, unless, from the nature of the articles, or the contract, another place of delivery be inferred." Civ. Code 1910, \S 4323. The contract in the instant case provides that the articles are to be delivered at such place as the buyer may direct, and there being nothing in their nature or in the contract from which another place of delivery could be inferred, in the absence of any direction by the buyer as to the place of delivery, to constitute a valid tender the articles should have been carried to the buyer in person. It not appearing that the buyer resided without the state, the carrying of the articles to his place of business, in his absence and without his knowledge, did not constitute a valid tender under the contract.

1. Frauds, statute of \S 129(4)—Possession under parol contract insufficient to take contract out of statute.

Possession alone by the purchaser under a parol contract for the sale of land is insufficient to take the contract without the statute of frauds. Civ. Code 1910, $\S\S$ 4634, 4636.

2. Frauds, statute of \S 129(7)—Improvements must be substantial and permanent and such as only an owner would ordinarily make; use of fertilizer insufficient.

Valuable improvements made by the purchaser, which when coupled with possession alone will take the contract without the statute, must be improvements substantial and permanent in their nature, and such that no one but an owner ordinarily would make under like circumstances. The placing of fertilizer by the purchaser upon part of the land preparatory to making a crop thereon is not such an improvement. Porter v. Allen, 54 Ga. 623.

3. Frauds, statute of \S 150(1)—Petition properly dismissed on demurrer when not showing part performance.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Bills and notes \S 431—Not paid when check intended as payment credited to maker and proceeds drawn out by him.

Under the undisputed evidence, as outlined in the statement of facts below, the court did not err in directing a verdict for the plaintiff.

Error from Superior Court, Coffee County; J. I. Summerall, Judge.

Action by Thomas Byrd against J. M. Miller. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

This was a suit on a promissory note. The defendant admitted the execution of the note, and relied upon a plea of payment. The undisputed evidence shows the following facts: Miller executed and delivered to one Evans the note sued on, which in due course was purchased by Byrd, the plaintiff. After its maturity Byrd left the note for collection with the Broxton Banking Company, which, as his agent, had authority, on its payment, to surrender it. While the bank thus held the note for collection the maker made arrangements with one Milhollin to borrow the money necessary to take it up, and Milhollin acting solely as his agent, went to the bank and got the note, with the understanding that it should either be returned or paid. After the bank had thus intrusted the note to Milhollin, acting as Miller's agent, Milhollin made and delivered a check to Miller in a sum equal to the amount called for by the note; and Miller, after indorsing the check, returned it to Milhollin, who thereupon delivered to Miller the Byrd note. After about two weeks, the check, thus drawn and indorsed, was carried by Milhollin's bookkeeper to the bank, which credited Miller with it on the books of the bank. It does not appear that the bank was given any direction as to how the check should be applied, but it is undisputed that when the check was thus sent to the bank the bank "was not notified that the check was to be credited to Mr. Thomas Byrd, or that it was in payment of his note." It was not until after about one year that Byrd ascertained he had received no credit for the note, or that Miller became aware that the Milhollin check had been credited to his, and not Byrd's account, at which time the proceeds of the check had been withdrawn from the bank by Miller. The court directed a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, which the defendant assigned as error, on the theory that his defense of payment had been sustained.

On Motion for Rehearing.

JENKINS, P. J. The gist of the ground of counsel's motion appears to be that, since this court has held that the bank was the authorized agent of the plaintiff, Byrd, to collect the note, and that Milhollin, in procuring the note from the bank was acting as the agent of the defendant, Miller, the mere sending of a check to the bank, which was payable to and indorsed by Miller, amounted to a payment of the note, although the bookkeeper who carried it gave no such direction, and although the check was, in conformity with the usual course of business, deposited to the credit of Miller, the apparent owner. This contention is based on the theory that a principal is bound by the authorized acts of his agent within the scope of his authority. Civil Code 1910, § 3593.

If Milhollin had actually paid over the check to the bank with direction that it be applied on the note held by the bank for collection, this principle might have application, although even then the defendant could not claim he had been injured, since he himself has received and appropriated to his own use the proceeds of the check. In a case such as that, however, the defense of payment might be good, and the owner of the note might have to look to the bank, and the bank, in turn, to Miller. However, since it is undisputed that the bookkeeper did not turn over the check to the bank for the benefit of Byrd, or with any sort of direction that it go in settlement of the note, and since the bank, in the absence of any such direction, simply applied the check to the account of the person having apparent ownership, these questions do not arise; and it is our opinion that the note has never been paid, either in fact or in law.

Rehearing denied.

EVERROAD et al. v. DICKSON PLANING MILL CO. (No. 11480.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2. Feb. 24, 1921).

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Replevin §8(2), 71(2)—Plaintiff must recover on his own title; plaintiff may show adjudication re-establishing title to property sold bankrupt.

A plaintiff in trover must recover on his own title, and not on a lack of title in the defendant. Where it appears that the title was originally in the plaintiff, and would have continued in him but for a sale by him to one from whom the defendant claims title, the plaintiff may, in establishing his own title, show an adjudication voiding the sale and re-establishing his title, had in a proceeding between him as an intervening claimant and his vendee, in a bankruptcy proceeding which had been instituted against the vendee, which intervention was filed and adjudication had after the defendant had made his alleged purchase under which he claims title from the plaintiff's vendee, and it will not be necessary for the plaintiff to show that the defendant was a party to such intervention proceedings, when the evidence fails to establish any facts which will warrant the inference that the defendant acquired any title from the plaintiff's vendee.

2. Sales §202(2,3)—Title held not to pass when condition as to execution of notes not complied with.

Although the property was delivered by the plaintiff's vendee to the defendant under a contract of sale between them, by the terms of which the defendant was, as a condition to the sale, to cause promissory notes to be executed to the plaintiff's vendee for the payment of the purchase money, no title passed into the defendant because of his failure to execute the notes. Wheeler & Wilson Mfg. Co. v. Irish-American Dime Savings Bank, 105 Ga. 57, 81 S. E. 48.

3. Verdict properly directed.

Applying the above principle of law to the undisputed facts as shown by the evidence, a verdict for the plaintiff was properly directed.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; Geo. L. Bell, Judge.

Action by the Dickson Planing Mill Company against G. B. Everroad and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Affirmed.

The Dickson Planing Mill Company, the plaintiff in the court below, on or about October 3, 1917, shipped a carload of lumber to the Phoenix Planing Mill Company, which latter company went into bankruptcy on October 25, 1917. The Dickson Planing Mill Company, by proper proceedings in the bankruptcy court, set aside the sale of the lumber to the bankrupt on account of fraudulent representations by the bankrupt, and secured an adjudication re-establishing the title to the lumber in the plaintiff. In the meantime, one G. B. Everroad secured possession of the lumber under an alleged contract of sale between him and the bankrupt, whereby Everroad was to execute and deliver to the bankrupt certain promissory notes, but which notes were never executed and delivered. The Dickson Planing Mill Company thereupon sued out a bill trover proceeding against Everroad, and upon the trial thereof the trial judge directed a verdict for the plaintiff, and the defendant excepts.

1. Sales \S 406—Performance or offer to perform obligations of buyer held conditions precedent to suit against seller.

Where, under a contract of sale, the buyer must perform a certain obligation as a condition precedent to the performance of the obligations resting on the seller, he must show performance or an offer to perform prevented by the seller as a condition precedent to an action against the seller for breach of the contract.

2. Sales \S 174—Failure to furnish bank guaranty as agreed releases seller from liability.

Where a contract of sale requires the purchaser to furnish a bank guaranty to the seller as a condition precedent to the shipment of the goods, the purchaser's failure to comply with such condition unless compliance be prevented by the seller is a breach of the contract releasing the seller from his obligations.

3. Sales \S 82(2)—Contract by telegraph calling for bank guaranty contemplates immediate furnishing.

Where a contract of sale requiring the buyer to furnish the seller a bank guaranty was made by telegraph, it was within the contemplation of the parties that the bank guaranty should be furnished immediately and without delay.

4. Sales \S 191—Obligation to furnish bank guaranty not complied with by arranging with bank to accept draft.

A provision of a contract of sale requiring the buyer to furnish the seller a bank guaranty was not performed by arranging with a bank to guarantee payment of a draft by the seller for the purchase price without actually furnishing the guaranty contracted for.

5. Sales \S 174 — Obligation to furnish bank guaranty held not complied with without unnecessary delay.

STEPHENS, J. [1] 1. A purchaser under a contract of sale for personalty, who by the terms of the contract must perform a certain obligation resting upon him as a condition precedent to a performance of the obligations resting upon the seller, must show a performance, or an offer to perform prevented by the seller, of such obligation on his part, as a condition precedent, before he can maintain an action against the seller for a breach of the contract.

[2, 3] 2. Where under the terms of such a contract the purchaser must furnish a bank guaranty to the seller as a condition precedent to the seller's shipping to him the commodity contracted for, a failure by the purchaser chaser to comply with such condition precedent, unless compliance be prevented by the seller, amounts to a breach of the contract by the purchaser, and will operate to release the seller from his obligations under the contract. Where the offer and acceptance are made on the same day by telegraphic communication, it is within the contemplation of the contracting parties that the bank guaranty shall be furnished immediately and without unnecessary delay.

[4, 5] 3. The mere perfecting of arrangements by the purchaser with a bank to guarantee the payment of a draft by the seller upon the purchaser for the purchase money of the commodity sold, without actually furnishing the guaranty as contracted, is not a performance by the purchaser of the condition precedent; nor is this condition complied with by a communication by the purchaser to the seller on the day following the execution of the contract, wherein the purchaser notifies the seller that he has forwarded to the seller a certified check for only a part of the purchase money, as "evidence good faith," and requesting approval by the seller of such arrangement. Such a proposal by the purchaser, inviting delay and requesting approval of such proposed substitute for his compliance with the condition precedent, amounts to a failure by him to comply with the condition precedent without unnecessary delay, as contemplated in the contract, and releases the seller from his obligations under the contract.

4. In a suit by the purchaser against the seller to recover damages for an alleged breach of the contract by the seller, a petition alleging the above facts fails to set out a cause of action, and should have been dismissed on general demurrer.

(No. 11650.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2.
Feb. 26, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Evidence ¶441(9).—Buyer cannot defend suit on purchase-money note by showing goods not in accordance with oral contract.

Where goods sold and delivered under a written contract are of the character described in the contract, the purchaser cannot, after having inspected the goods and given a note in payment therefor and in discharge of his obligation under the contract as expressly stipulated in the note and for no other consideration, defend against a suit on the note upon the ground that the goods were bought under an oral agreement as to quality, at variance with the written contract, which oral agreement was violated by delivery of goods of a different quality from that orally contracted for.

2. Evidence ¶434(11).—No defense to note that execution induced by fraudulent representation that goods could be converted into goods of description referred to in oral agreement.

While it is true that, after goods have been contracted for and delivered to the purchaser and he has inspected them there may be a new agreement by the terms of which the seller is to make good any breach of warranty or repair any defect in the goods sold as a consideration for the execution of a promissory note for the purchase money by the purchaser, yet, where there is no such consideration and a note is given for the purchase money, expressly stipulating in its face that it is given in compliance with the purchaser's obligation under the original contract, it is no defense to the note that the purchaser was deceived and fraudulently induced to execute it by a fraudulent representation to him by the seller that the goods which were of the description mentioned in the original written contract could by a simple process be easily altered and converted into goods of the description mentioned in the alleged oral agreement.

3. Motion for new trial properly overruled.

The evidence tending to establish such defense having been properly ruled out and a verdict for the plaintiff having been properly directed, it was not error to overrule the defendant's motion for a new trial.

Error from City Court of Floyd; W. J. Nunnally, Judge.

Action by the Dawson Bros. Manufacturing Company against O. L. Stamps. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

The Dawson Bros. Manufacturing Company, as plaintiff, sued O. L. Stamps, as defendant, on a promissory note for $700. The defendant admitted the execution of the note, and filed a plea of failure of consideration. The evidence showed that on or about June 7, 1918, the plaintiff entered into a written contract with the defendant whereunder the plaintiff was to ship to the defendant 50 barrels of unsweetened apple juice in good secondhand barrels. About 30 days after the goods had been shipped to and received by the defendant, an agent of the plaintiff called on the defendant for a settlement, at which time the defendant complained to the plaintiff's agent that the apple juice was not sweetened, and was for that reason not suitable for the purposes intended, and was not salable. The barrels and their contents were then examined and inspected by the defendant and the plaintiff's agent, whereupon the plaintiff's agent gave to the defendant certain directions and instructions as to how to convert the contents of the barrels into a sweet and salable article. The defendant then executed the note sued on, writing across its face the following words and figures: "In payment as per invoice 6/10/18." The invoice described the goods sold as vinegar stock. The trial court directed a verdict for the plaintiff, and the defendant excepts.

RUSHTON v. HALL & BROWN WOOD WORKING MACH. CO. (No. 11388.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2. March 4, 1921.)

(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

1. Contracts \S 245(2)—When parties reaching agreement by correspondence make formal contract, with additional stipulations, it is the contract.

Where parties have arrived at a complete contract by correspondence, but immediately afterwards, and before performance by either party, execute a formal agreement containing additional stipulations, the formal agreement will be regarded as the contract.

2. Contracts \S 237(2)—Written contract not without consideration, though parties had reached complete agreement by correspondence.

Though parties had reached a complete contract through correspondence, a formal written agreement containing additional stipulations was not void for want of consideration on the ground that the promisor was already bound under another contract.

3. Appeal and error \S 1051(3)—Error in admitting instrument cured by maker's admission of execution.

Any error in admitting an instrument in evidence without producing the subscribing witness was cured when the maker in his testimony afterwards admitted the execution of the instrument.

4. Sales \S 38(1)—Statement of desire for formal contract for convenience held not fraud.

Where parties had reached a complete contract of sale by correspondence, a statement by the seller to the purchaser that he desired a formal contract for convenience in keeping a record of the transaction, whereby the purchaser was induced to execute a formal contract containing stipulations against his interest not contained in the correspondence, was not a fraud on the purchaser.

5. Sales \S 287(1)—Notice of dissatisfaction does not relieve buyer of effect of retention of goods which by contract is admission of truth of warranties.

Where a contract of sale provides that retention of the goods for a specified time shall constitute a trial and acceptance and be a conclusive admission of the truth of all warranties, the buyer is not relieved of the force of such provision by giving notice of dissatisfaction within the specified time while still retaining the goods.

Error from Superior Court, Campbell County; John B. Hutcheson, Judge.

Action by the Hall & Brown Wood Working Machine Company against W. W. Rush-ton. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Johnson & Scott, of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error.

W. S. Dillon, C. M. Lancaster, and Wm. J. Davis, Jr., all of Atlanta, for defendant in error.

STEPHENS, J. [1, 2] 1. Where two parties by negotiations through written correspondence have arrived at an agreement which, without more, amounts to a complete contract, but immediately thereafter and before the performance by either party of any act under the agreement, execute a formal agreement in writing containing other stipulations regarding the subject-matter in addition to those contained in the correspondence, the contract between the parties will be considered as having been completed only upon the execution of the formal written agreement, and the latter will be regarded as the contract. It is not void for want of consideration upon the ground that at the time of its execution the promisor was already bound to the promisee under another contract. See, in this connection, 1 Williston on Contracts, \S 28; 7 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law (2d. Ed.) 139.

[3] 2. Where the signature of the maker of a written instrument purports to have been witnessed by a subscribing witness, any error in admitting the instrument in evidence without producing the subscribing witness is cured when the maker afterwards in his testimony admits the execution of the instrument.

[4] 3. Where such formal contract contains certain stipulations against the interest of the purchaser which were not contained in the preliminary negotiations, a statement made by the seller to the purchaser, to the effect that the seller desired that the contract be placed in formal shape for his convenience in keeping a record of the transaction, cannot amount to a fraud on the purchaser upon the ground that by such statement he was induced to execute the agreement containing such stipulations. It not appearing that the other representations relied on by the purchaser as fraudulent were false, the defense that the execution of the contract was induced by fraud is not sustained.

[5] 4. "When the written contract for the sale of an article provides that the retention of the article for a given time after the date of shipment shall constitute a trial and acceptance and be a conclusive admission of the truth of all warranties, the mere fact that within the time stipulated notice of dissatisfaction has been given to the seller, but notwithstanding the article has been retained, will not have the effect to relieve the buyer from the force of the terms of the written contract." Fay & Eagan Co. v. Dudley, 129 Ga. 314(2), 58 S. E. 826.

5. In a suit by the seller against the purchaser to recover the purchase money for the property sold under the contract, a verdict for the plaintiff was properly directed.

Judgment affirmed.

HENDERSON v. HINES, Director General of Railroads. (No. 11286.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2. Feb. 26, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Exceptions, bill of \S 57—Not dismissed because record does not show entry of acknowledgment of service.

A motion to dismiss the bill of exceptions "because same does not properly show any service upon the defendant in error" will be denied when counsel for the defendant in error in their brief filed in this court admit "that due and legal service was acknowledged by its attorneys upon a paper which was properly entitled in the cause," and where such acknowledgment of service appears on a paper signed by counsel for the defendant in error, properly entitled in the case and properly describing the case filed in this court, although there appears from the record no entry of filing of such paper in the court below.

2. Master and servant \S 260(1), 261(1), 283(1), 289(1)—Assumption of risk and contributory negligence are ordinarily for jury, and not determined on demurrer; petition held not imperatively to demand inference of negligence or assumption of risk.

What acts of the master are among the risks assumed by the servant, and what conduct of the servant amounts to a failure to exercise due care to avoid the consequences of the master's negligence, are ordinarily questions for the jury, and in a suit by the servant to recover of the master for personal injuries received by the servant while in the master's employ, by reason of the alleged negligence of the master, these questions will not be solved against the plaintiff on demurrer, unless the facts alleged in the petition imperatively demand the inference that the alleged negligent act of the master causing the injury to the servant was a risk assumed by the servant, or that the servant could by the exercise of due care have avoided the consequences of the master's negligence. Angusta Southern R. R. Co. v. McDade, 105 Ga. 184, 137, 31 S. E. 420; Southern Cotton Oil Co. v. Gladman, 1 Ga. App. 259(8), 58 S. E. 249. The facts alleged in the petition in the instant case not being of such a character as to demand this inference, the general demurrer to the petition was improperly sustained.

3. Master and servant \S 137(4)—Injury to brakeman by track crew throwing tie from train actionable.

Where the act complained of was the negligent throwing of cross-ties out of the train by a train crew at a place in a populous community where the train crew knew that people were in the habit of passing, an employee of the railroad, who happened in the discharge of his duties to be passing over such passageway, and was injured by such negligent act of the train crew, may recover for such negligence if it was the proximate cause of his injury. The special demurrer was improperly sustained.

Error from City Court of Thomasville; W. H. Hammond, Judge.

Action by James Henderson against W. D. Hines, Director General of Railroads. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

The petition alleges substantially that the plaintiff was in the employ of the defendant as a brakeman, and that on a certain date he was a member of the crew of a certain freight train of the defendant; that the train on that day had been stopping at intervals for the purpose of allowing certain track laborers under the supervision of a section foreman, who were in one of the box cars of the train, to throw off cross-ties; that these cross-ties were, in accordance with custom, being thrown off on the right side of the train; that at a certain stop the conductor of the train, in the presence of the section foreman, told the plaintiff that at the next stop the engine was to be cut off from the train, and directed the plaintiff to perform this duty; that the plaintiff, at the next stop, alighted from the rear of the train, and proceeded to walk up the track on the left side of the train, towards the engine, for the purpose of carrying out the orders of the conductor, and that, when he reached the door of the car where the section foreman and crew of track laborers were at work, he was suddenly and without warning struck by a cross-tie, which had been thrown off from the left side of the train in violation of the custom; that at the previous stops no cross-ties had been thrown off on the left side of the train; that the place where the plaintiff was struck was near a large town, and that the right of way on both sides of the track at that point was used by the public as a highway and pathway, and that the section foreman and the plaintiff both knew of this; that the section foreman failed to give any warning before throwing off the cross-ties; and that the defendant was negligent in the following particulars: In permitting the cross-ties to be thrown off on the left side of the train and on the side opposite to that formerly used; in permitting the cross-ties to be thrown off without giving any warning to the plaintiff and others who might be passing, and in failing to maintain a lookout for that purpose; in permitting cross-ties to be thrown off at the time when the section foreman knew that the plaintiff was to pass the car in going up to the engine for the purpose of obeying the orders which the section foreman heard the conductor of the train give to the plaintiff, without giving warning to the plaintiff; in permitting cross-ties to be thrown off without maintaining a lookout and giving warning, when the section foreman knew that the right of way at that point was used by the public in general; that at the time of his injury the plaintiff was in the exercise of ordinary care, and did not anticipate and could not foresee any of the negligent acts complained of; that he took the precaution to walk on the left side of the track, knowing that no cross-ties had theretofore been thrown off on that side of the track. The trial judge sustained a general demurrer to the petition, and the plaintiff excepted.

(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

1. Corporations §116—Sale of stock not avoided by false statement as to value.

Value being a mere matter of opinion, a false statement as to the value of corporate stock made by a seller to induce a sale of the stock is not such a misrepresentation of an existing fact as amounts to fraud avoiding the sale or the note given for the purchase price.

2. Corporations §116—False statement as to price at which stock has sold may avoid sale.

A false statement by a seller of corporate stock, as to what stock in the corporation has sold for, might, if innocently acted upon by the purchaser to his damage, avoid the sale and afford a defense to the purchase-money note.

3. Bills and notes §351—Purchase before or after maturity immaterial when claim of fraud not sustained.

In an action on a note, the issue as to whether plaintiff purchased before or after maturity was immaterial, where the defense of fraud was not supported by the evidence.

4. Bills and notes §537(4)—Verdict properly directed when execution admitted and defense not proved.

In an action on a note where defendant admitted the execution of the note and the evidence failed to sustain the defense of fraud, a verdict for plaintiff was properly directed.

Action by the Central Trust Company against B. H. Askew, Jr. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Dowling & Askew, of Moultrie, for plaintiff in error.

Pope & Bennet, of Albany, for defendant in error.

STEPHENS, J. [1] 1. Value being a mere matter of opinion, a false statement as to the value of stock in a corporation, made by a seller to induce a sale of the stock, is not such a misrepresentation of an existing fact as will amount to a fraud and void the sale. Coca Cola Bottling Co. v. Anderson, 13 Ga. App. 772, 80 S. E. 32. In a suit on a promissory note given for the purchase price of certain stock in a corporation, a defense by the maker that he was induced to execute the note by fraud is not sustained by evidence that at the time of the execution of the note the payee falsely represented to him the value of the stock.

[2] 2. A false statement made by the seller, as to what stock in the corporation has sold for, might, if innocently acted upon by the purchaser, to his damage, void the sale and afford a defense to the note. There is no evidence to sustain any such contention. The evidence as to various sales of stock from time to time, at values less than the price at which it is alleged that the seller had represented in making the sale for which the note sued on was given, does not show that they related to any transaction had prior to the time the note sued on was executed.

[3] 3. The defense to the note not being supported by the evidence, the issue as to whether or not the plaintiff transferee was a purchaser before or after maturity is immaterial.

[4] 4. The defendant having admitted the execution of the note sued upon, and the evidence failing to sustain the defense relied upon, a verdict for the plaintiff was properly directed.

Judgment affirmed.

1. Criminal law \S 695(6)—Evidence objected to en bloc properly admitted when part admissible.

When testimony consisting of several sentences was objected to en bloc and a portion was admissible, its admission was not error.

2. Criminal law \S 1064(1)—Grounds of motion for new trial should be complete in themselves.

Grounds of a motion for a new trial should be complete in themselves, and reference to other grounds should not be required in order to understand the assignments of error.

3. Criminal law \S 1169(2)—Admission of evidence is harmless when facts established by other evidence admitted without objection.

The admission of testimony, if error, was harmless, where every substantial statement therein was established by other evidence admitted without objection.

4. Criminal law \S 448(7)—Testimony that carbon copy can be erased not opinion of witness.

Testimony that a carbon copy could be erased was a statement of fact, and not purely an opinion of the witness.

5. Criminal law \S 762(3)—Instruction that certain facts would be sufficient evidence of intent held not erroneous expression of opinion.

An instruction that, if an instrument was forged and defendant knew it and passed it with such knowledge, this would be sufficient evidence of his intent to defraud, was not erroneous, as it was an expression of opinion as to the legal effect of certain facts if proved and not an expression of opinion as to what was proved.

BLOODWORTH, J. 1. Grounds 1, 2, 3, 4, and 8 of the amendment to the motion for a new trial, are but amplifications of the general grounds.

[1] 2. Ground 5 of the amendment to the motion for a new trial complains that certain evidence was erroneously allowed to go to the jury. This testimony, which consisted of several sentences, was objected to en bloc, and at least a portion of it was admissible. "Where evidence is offered and objected to, and a portion thereof is admissible and a part objectionable, unless the illegal portion is specified and properly objected to, the whole will be admitted." City of Atlanta v. Sciple, 19 Ga. App. 694 (3), 698, 92 S. E. 28, 29, and cases cited. See, also, Thacher v. Carolina Cement Co., 21 Ga. App. 569 (1), 94 S. E. 838, and cases cited.

[2, 3] 3. "Grounds of a motion for a new trial should be complete in themselves; and when a particular ground is under consideration, reference to other grounds should not be required in order to understand the assignments of error." Bowen v. Smith-Hall Grocery Co., 146 Ga. 157 (4), 160 (4), 91 S. E. 32, 34. Under this ruling we are not called upon to consider ground 6 of the amendment to the motion for a new trial. However, granting, but not conceding, that the admission of the testimony complained of in this ground of the motion for a new trial was erroneously admitted, it was harmless error, as every substantial statement therein was established by other evidence, admitted without objection.

[4] 4. A witness was asked: "I will get you to state whether or not a carbon copy can be erased." To this he replied: "Yes, sir; it can be erased." This was a statement of a fact, and not "purely an opinion of the witness."

[5] 5. The judge charged the jury:

"If the instrument was a forged paper, and the defendant knew it and passed it with this knowledge, this would be sufficient evidence of his intent to defraud."

This was not error. In Johnson v. State, 127 Ga. 278 (4), 56 S. E. 420, the Supreme Court approved a charge in almost these exact words. In thus charging the judge expressed an opinion as to the legal effect of certain facts if proved, but did not express any opinion as to what was proved.

"It is not error that the court should tell the jury what the legal effect of evidence is. On the contrary, it is his duty to do so. He must not say or intimate what is or is not proved, but if facts be proved, then he may and should say what effect the law gives to the proof of such facts; and if the facts proved be the only way in which that legal effect or presumptive or logical conclusion in law can be reached, he may also tell the jury that. It will be a strong expression of opinion on the legal effect of facts when proved to the satisfaction of the jury, but it will not be either an expression or intimation of what has been proved to the satisfaction of the jury." Hagar v. State, 71 Ga. 167 (8).

6. The jury had ample evidence upon which to base their finding, the verdict is approved by the trial judge, and the judgment is affirmed.

1. Contracts \S 198(2)—Building contract held to contemplate construction of suitable and safe foundation.

A contract for the erection of a building of such size and dimensions as to require its foundation to be constructed with special reference to the character of the ground contemplates not only the erection of a properly constructed building, but also the construction of a suitable and safe foundation for the building.

2. Contracts \S 296 — Alteration of building contract to provide for different foundation held not breach of contract.

Where a building contract authorized the owner to make alterations, changes or additions and the builder to make additions, etc., an alteration providing for a different kind of foundation and different treatment of the ground found necessary to support the structure and render it safe was not a violation of the contract, though there was nothing to indicate that such an alteration might become necessary, especially where the contract provided that soil conditions were not guaranteed.

3. Contracts \S 296—Subcontractor held bound by alterations or changes permitted by main contract.

One having a subcontract to do excavating for the foundation of a building and to shore and protect adjoining walls in conformity with the plans, drawings, and specifications was bound to perform his obligations under any altered or changed conditions resulting from any alteration or deviation from the plans or specifications permitted under the provisions of the main contract.

4. Contracts \S 296—Subcontractor required to assume additional risks from change in plans of foundation.

Where a building contract authorized alterations and it was found necessary to abandon the plans for a concrete foundation and erect the building on a foundation resting on piles, one having a subcontract to do the excavating and shore and protect adjoining walls was bound to assume the additional risks and hazards incident to the construction of a foundation built on piles, though such alteration was not expected, and he was assured by the main contractor that it would not be made, especially where he knew that soil conditions were not guaranteed.

5. Contracts \S 296—Demand that subcontractor perform under conditions as changed by alterations held not to entitle him to rescind.

Where a subcontractor was bound to perform his contract under altered conditions permitted by the main contract, a demand by the principal contractor that he perform the work under such altered conditions for the extra compensation provided in case of alteration was not a breach of the contract entitling him to sue on quantum meruit.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; Geo. L. Bell, Judge.

Action by the Morrow Transfer & Storage Company against the Wells Bros. Company of New York. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error, and defendant files a cross-bill of exceptions. Judgment affirmed, and cross-bill of exceptions dismissed.

King & Spalding and Spalding, MacDougald & Sibley, all of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error.

Rosser, Slaton, Phillips & Hopkins and Smith, Hammond & Smith, all of Atlanta, for defendant in error.

STEPHENS, J. [1] 1. A builder's contract providing for the erection of a building, which is to be of such size and dimension as to require its foundation to be constructed with special reference to the character of the ground upon which it is to rest, contemplates not only the erection of a properly constructed building under the terms of the contract, but also contemplates the construction of a suitable and safe foundation for the building to rest upon.

[2] 2. In such a contract, which provides for the erection of the building according to certain plans and specifications which call for a certain character of foundation, where there is a provision that "the owner may make such alterations, changes, or additions to the work as may be required, without invalidating the terms of the contract," and that the builder may "at any time during the progress of this work make any additions to, or alterations or deviations from, the drawings or specifications without invalidating this agreement," an alteration afterwards made in the contract, plans, or specifications providing for a different kind of foundation and a different treatment of the ground upon which the building is to rest; which is found after the work has progressed to be necessary in order to support the structure and render it safe, is not a violation of the contract, but is only such an alteration or deviation as is contemplated in the contract providing for a properly constructed building on a good and appropriate foundation. This is true even though at the time of the execution of the contract there was nothing in the nature of the work contemplated or in the character of the ground upon which the building was to be located which would then indicate that such an alteration in, or deviation from, the foundation plans might become necessary for the purpose of carrying out the builder's contractual obligation to erect a properly and safely constructed building. More especially is this true when the contract provides that test borings and samples of the soil had been made and were subject to the inspection of bidders, but that the soil conditions were not guaranteed.

[3] 3. A contract entered into by the builder with a third person, by the terms of which the third person obligated himself to do and perform for the builder certain work devolving upon the builder under his contract with the owner, such as excavating for the foundation of the building and shoring and protecting the adjoining walls and assuming responsibility for their safety, which provided that the subcontractor would perform his obligations under the contract "in conformity with the plans, drawings, and specifications, including all revisions to date made by [the architect], which said plans, drawings, and specifications are signed by the parties hereto and are hereby made a part of this agreement according to the true intent and meaning thereof," obligated the subcontractor to perform his obligations under the subcontract under any altered or changed conditions resulting from any alteration in or deviation from the plans or specifications contained in the builder's contract with the owner and permitted under the provisions of that contract.

[4] 4. Where, after the execution of the builder's contract with the owner, it was found that the character of the ground rendered it necessary, in order to obtain a building properly and safely constructed as contemplated in the contract, to abandon the original plans calling for a concrete foundation and to substitute therefor an alteration in such plans providing for the erection of the building upon a foundation resting upon piles, such alteration in the plans being necessary for the purpose of obtaining a properly and safely constructed building upon an appropriate foundation, was an alteration permitted under the provisions of the contract; and the subcontractor, being bound to perform his obligations contained in the subcontract in conformity with and with reference to any alteration in the plans as permitted under the builder's contract with the owner, was bound to perform his obligations to excavate, shore, and protect the adjoining walls, with all additional risks and hazards attendant upon the construction of a foundation built on piles. He being bound to perform the subcontract in conformity with any alterations in the plans or specifications permitted by the builder's contract with the owner, his obligation to so perform is in no wise affected or lessened by the fact that the specific alteration afterwards made by the builder and the owner in the plans and specifications were not expected by the subcontractor when executing the subcontract, or that he was assured by the builder that the particular alteration would not be made. Especially is this true when the subcontractor before entering into the contract had notice that no guaranty was made as to the character of the ground upon which the foundation was to rest, and where the builder's contract with the owner provided in the plans and specifications that test borings and samples of the soil had been made and were subject to inspection, but that the soil conditions were not guaranteed.

[5] 5. The subcontractor being bound to the builder to perform his contractual obligations under such altered conditions permitted by and made in pursuance of the builder's contract with the owner, a demand by the builder that the subcontractor alter the plans of his work accordingly, and perform his contract under such altered conditions and for such extra compensation as the contract provided should be paid to him should alterations be made in the manner in which his contract was to be performed, did not amount to a breach of the subcontract by the builder, and the subcontractor had no right to rescind the contract upon the ground that the contract had been repudiated by the builder.

6. This being a suit by the subcontractor against the builder to recover on a quantum meruit after having attempted to rescind his contract on the ground of its having been breached by the builder, the trial judge, in view of the above rulings, did not err in his rulings on the exceptions of law and fact to the auditor's report, and in directing a verdict for the defendant. (Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2.

(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

1. Malicious prosecution §19—Facts insufficient to convict may afford probable cause.

Facts which are in law insufficient to authorize a conviction for a specific crime may nevertheless afford probable cause for the institution of a prosecution for such crime.

2. Malicious prosecution §18(2)—Probable cause for prosecution for simple larceny.

Facts which do not authorize a conviction for simple larceny, but do authorize a conviction for larceny after trust, may afford probable cause for a prosecution for simple larceny.

3. Malicious prosecution §71(2)—Probable cause question of law.

It is a question of law for the court as to what facts constitute probable cause.

4. Malicious prosecution §18(2)—Probable cause for simple larceny shown, though wrong offense charged.

Where plaintiff was intrusted by a member of a firm to which defendant belonged with lumber to be sold to a third party, the proceeds to be collected and paid to the firm, and plaintiff received payment but failed to transmit such payment, there was probable cause for a prosecution instituted by defendant with knowledge of such facts, though the prosecution was for simple larceny instead of larceny after trust.

5. New trial §70—Improperly dealt when undisputed evidence failed to support verdict.

In an action for malicious prosecution where the undisputed evidence showed probable cause, the verdict for plaintiff was unsupported by the evidence, and it was error to overrule defendant's motion for a new trial.

STEPHENS, J. [1, 2] 1. Facts which are in law insufficient to authorize a conviction for a specific crime may nevertheless afford probable cause for the institution of a prosecution for such crime. Facts which do not authorize a conviction for simple larceny may afford probable cause for a prosecution for such crime when they do authorize a conviction for larceny after trust.

[3, 4] 2. In a suit for malicious prosecution, it being a question of law for the court as to what facts constitute probable cause (Hicks v. Brantley, 102 Ga. 264, 272, 29 S. E. 459), it follows that where the plaintiff had been intrusted by a member of a firm, to which the defendant belonged, with an amount of lumber to be delivered by the plaintiff and sold to a third party, the proceeds of the sale to be collected by the plaintiff and paid to the defendant's firm, and such third party had made payment for the lumber to the plaintiff and the latter had failed to transmit such payment to the defendant's firm, which facts were known to the defendant, who, with knowledge of the facts, instituted a prosecution against the plaintiff for simple larceny instead of larceny after trust, the prosecution was instituted by the defendant with probable cause.

[5] 3. The undisputed evidence showing the above facts and demanding the inference that the prosecution was carried on with probable cause, the verdict for the plaintiff was without evidence to support it, and it was error to overrule the defendant's motion for a new trial.

Judgment reversed.

RAILEY v. UNITED LIFE & ACCIDENT INS. CO. (No. 11922.)(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
Jan. 28, 1921. Rehearing Denied
March 2, 1921.)(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Insurance \S 389(6), 392(1), 438—Exemption from liability for death in military service not against public policy; not waived because insurer knew insured would probably engage in such service; not waived by retaining unpaid portion of premium with knowledge.

The provisions of a life insurance policy exempting the insurer from liability for death occasioned by the insured engaging in military or naval service in time of war unless a written permit shall be issued by the company are not void as against public policy; and this is so even where the insured is drafted into the service.

(a) The fact that the insurer knew, at the time the policy was issued, that the insured would in all probability engage in military or naval service, is legally insufficient to work a waiver of the above war clause.

(b) Nor was the retention by the company of an unearned portion of the first premium, with knowledge of the fact that the insured was engaged in the military service of his government in time of war, sufficient to constitute such a waiver.

2. Insurance \S 438—Under policy excluding death in military service, death from drowning as result of collision of transports held excluded.

The death of the insured, who had been drafted into the military service of the United States during the recent war with Germany, having occurred in the North Channel, between the coasts of Scotland and Ireland, as a result of an accidental collision between a ship (upon which he and other soldiers were being transported to Europe) and a sister ship under the same convoy, no liability under the policy (except the reserve due thereon) existed, in view of the plain and unambiguous provisions of the policy exempting the insurer from all indemnity (except the amount of the reserve thereon) in the event the insured lost his life while engaged in military service without the confines of continental United States.

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

3. Evidence \S 11—Judicial notice taken of sinking of transport.

The court will take judicial cognizance of the time and place of the sinking of the transport Otranto as a result of an accidental collision with a sister ship; it being a well-known and historical fact.

4. Appeal and error \S 1139—Judgment affirmed notwithstanding plaintiff's right to recover nominal amount, with directions that defendant pay such amount.

Where the petition on a life insurance policy was drawn in three counts seeking to recover $1,500, $3,000, and $4,500, respectively, a judgment dismissing the case will not be reversed because of plaintiff's right to recover the reserve amounting to $2.26, but will be affirmed, with direction that, when the remittitur is filed, defendant pay such amount.

Error from City Court of Tifton; James H. Price, Judge.

Action by J. H. Railey, administrator, against the United Life & Accident Insurance Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed, with directions.

See, also, 103 S. E. 184.

John Henry Poole, of Tifton, for plaintiff in error.

Fulwood & Hargrett, of Tifton, for defendant in error.

BROYLES, C. J. This is a suit by J. H. Railey, as administrator of the estate of G. S. Railey, against the United Life & Accident Insurance Company on a policy issued by the defendant in December, 1917, upon the life of the deceased, and payable to the latter's estate. The defendant interposed both a general and special demurrer, and to the judgment sustaining the general demurrer and dismissing the suit the plaintiff excepted.

The policy sued upon provided for payment of a single indemnity, under certain conditions; for payment of a double indemnity, under certain conditions; and for payment of a triple indemnity, under certain other conditions. The plaintiff's petition was drawn in three counts, the first seeking a recovery of the single indemnity; the second seeking a recovery of the double indemnity; and the third asking a recovery of the triple indemnity.

The material and controlling exempting clauses of the policy are as follows:

"In event of death resulting from or occasioned by the insured engaging in military or naval service in time of war [italics ours], or at any time in aeronautic ascension or aviation or in submarine voyage, whether the insured shall actually be engaged in military or naval service or not, unless a written permit shall be issued by the company, the sum payable under this policy shall be the reserve thereon."

Written upon the back of the policy was the notice:

"Upon written request by the insured, a war service permit to the amount of the single indemnity will be issued and renewed annually, without extra premium, to cover additional risk of war conditions, while the insured is engaged in military service within the confines of continental United States during the present war with Germany or any of her present allies; such permit will not, however, cover death occasioned by or resulting from aeronautic ascension, aviation or submarine voyage." (italics ours.)

These provisions did not conflict with any of the other terms of the policy or with the incontestability clause thereof, which provided that—

"After one year in force this policy will be incontestable except for nonpayment of premium and military or naval service in time of war [italics ours], and for aeronautic ascension or aviation and submarine voyage."

[1] 1. The above provisions limiting liability in event of the death of the insured while engaged in military or naval service, without the written permit of the insurance company, are not void as being against public policy. See 4 Joyce on the Law of Insurance, § 2237; 3 Cooley's Briefs on the Law of Insurance, p. 2217 (h); Reid v. American Nat. Assurance Co. (Mo. App.) 218 S. W. 957; La Rue v. Insurance Co., 68 Kan. 539, 75 Pac. 494; Miller v. Illinois Bankers' Life Ass'n, 138 Ark. 442, 212 S. W. 810, 7 A. L. R. 378. Attention is also directed in this connection to the recent case of Mattox v. New England Mutual Life Ins. Co., 25 Ga. App. 811, 103 S. E. 180, where this court recognized the validity of such war clauses.

The fact alleged in the petition that the company knew at the time the policy was issued that the insured would in all probability engage in military or naval service is insufficient to constitute a waiver of the war provisions of the contract, for it reasonably appears that the company and the insured expected the policy to continue in force for a long number of years, and, in view of the probability of military service, agreed to a practical suspension of liability during such service. Neither was the fact that the company retained an unearned portion of the first premium after the insured's entry into the army legally sufficient to constitute a waiver of the war clauses of the policy. If, as held by this court in the Mattox Case, supra, the company's retention of unpaid premium notes did not operate to waive the war clauses in that case, then surely the mere retention of an unearned portion of the premium in the instant case was insufficient to constitute such a waiver. Moreover, in the Miller case, supra, it was expressly held that the acceptance of the premium, even with full knowledge that the insured was, at the time of payment, actually engaged in war service, did not work a waiver. See, also, to the same effect Sandstedt v. American Central Life Ins. Co., 109 Wash. 338, 186 Pac. 1069. The fact (as shown by a certified copy from the clerk of the Supreme Court of Arkansas) that the agreed statement of facts in the Miller Case showed that the insured had entered the military service as a volunteer, is immaterial. The same rule would apply where the insured was drafted into the service.

[2] 2. It being clear, therefore, that the war clauses of the policy are valid, and that they were not waived by the insurer, we will proceed to briefly apply them to the facts as alleged in the petition. It is distinctly alleged that the policy was issued in December, 1917, and that the insured, who was drafted into the army, lost his life by accident on October 6, 1918, when the ship Otranto, which was conveying the insured, together with other soldiers, to Europe, in order that they might be used in the great World War, collided with a sister ship. Obviously, therefore, these facts precluded a recovery of either the single, double, or triple indemnity ties, the policy expressly, in plain and unequivocal terms, providing that no liability (except for the reserve on the policy) should exist if the death of the insured occurred while engaged in military or naval service in time of war, without the written permit of the insurance company, and the petition not showing that such a permit was ever issued. Nor does the petition show that the insured took advantage of the written notice indorsed on the back of the policy, which provided that—

"Upon written request of the insured, a war service permit to the amount of the single indemnity, will be issued and renewed annually, without extra premium, to cover additional risk of war conditions, while the insured is engaged in military service within the confines of continental United States during the present war with Germany or any of her present allies."

[3] Moreover, even had the insured exercised this right, there could still be no recovery, as the war service permit was, by express stipulation, to be effective only in the event the insured's death occurred while engaged in military service "within the confines of continental United States," and while the petition is silent as to exactly where the insured lost his life, it alleges, as above stated, that his death was the result of a collision between the Otranto, a ship upon which he was being conveyed to Europe, and another ship under the same convoy, and this court will take judicial cognizance of the now well-known and historical fact that on October 6, 1918, the transport steamer Otranto accidentally collided with her sister ship Kashmir and was sunk in the North Channel, between the Irish and Scottish coasts.

[4] It is true, and so conceded by the defendant, that, under the allegations of the petition, the plaintiff was entitled to recover the sum of $2.28, the reserve alleged to be due on the policy at the date of the death of the insured, and the petition showed a cause of action for that amount. Moreover, it does not appear that this amount was ever tendered to the plaintiff by the defendant. Since, however, the petition was drawn in three counts, seeking a recovery of $1,500, $3,000, and $4,500, respectively, and the reserve admitted to be due was only the nominal sum of $226, we think that the defendant should be allowed the privilege of paying this small amount and have the case finally disposed of, and we decline to reverse the judgment dismissing the plaintiff's case, but affirm it, with direction that, when the remittitur is filed, the defendant pay to the plaintiff the amount of the reserve on the policy, with interest from August 11, 1919, the date when the defendant refused payment of the policy.

Judgment affirmed, with direction.

Master and servant §=185(6), 233(4)—Fellow servant's act and contributory negligence cause of injury from using rope.

Where a rope too short for its intended purpose had been spliced by a fellow servant, and the injured employee discovered that it was too short but undertook to force it on a pulley and in so doing was injured, the injury was due to the negligence of the fellow servant and to his own negligence.

Bryan & Middlebrooks, of Atlanta, and Geo. H. Carswell, of Irwinton, for plaintiff in error.

Allen & Pottle, of Milledgeville, for defendant in error.

PER CURIAM. The only negligence alleged in the petition was that the defendant failed to furnish to the plaintiff a rope of proper length for the purpose intended, it being alleged that the rope was too short and that on that account it would not go into the grooves as the other ropes which he had placed therein. Upon the trial the evidence conclusively showed that the rope furnished by the defendant to the plaintiff had been spliced by a fellow servant who was assisted by the plaintiff, and that, upon undertaking to put upon the pulley this particular rope which was used as a belt, the plaintiff discovered that the rope was too short and undertook to force it on the pulley with a bar, and that in so doing he suffered his injury.

We hold that the evidence in this case showed that the injury sustained by the plaintiff was due to the negligence of a fellow servant, and to his own negligence in undertaking to place the rope on the pulley. For this reason the court erred in overruling the motion for a new trial. See Donaldson v. Marsh Cypress Co., 9 Ga. App. 267, 70 S. E. 1121, and cases there cited.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Bills and notes §=537(1)—Verdict for plaintiff demanded when execution admitted and defense not sustained.

In a suit against the maker by the transferee of a series of promissory notes falling due consecutively, some of the notes appearing on the face to have matured and the others appearing not to have matured, where the defendant admits the execution of the notes and the indebtedness represented by them, and does not deny the allegation in the petition that the entire series is due by virtue of the terms of a collateral agreement between the maker and the payee, which provides that the entire series shall become due upon default by the maker in payment of other notes in the series when due, but disputes the title of the plaintiff in the notes and pleads a failure of consideration and breach of warranty, a verdict for the plaintiff is demanded, in the absence of any evidence to sustain the defendant's plea.

2. Appeal and error §=728(3)—Assignment of error not setting out excluded evidence, or showing evidence offered to support plea, held insufficient.

Where it does not appear what evidence was offered by the defendant in support of the plea of failure of consideration and breach of warranty, an assignment of error that the court erred in refusing to allow the defendant to prove by a named witness that the consideration of the notes had failed, and that the ruling of the court in excluding the evidence prevented the defendant from establishing his defense, presents nothing for consideration, where neither the evidence nor the nature of the evidence is set out.

3. Bills and notes §=370—Exclusion of evidence of failure of consideration and breach of warranty as against transferee not error.

There being no evidence that the plaintiff transferee had not acquired the notes bona fide for value and without notice of any defense by the maker, and the maker's plea of failure of consideration and breach of warranty being predicated upon an alleged contract between him and the payee, and there being no evidence as to this contract, and it not appearing from any of the assignments of error in the motion for a new trial that such contract was offered in evidence, none of the assignments of error in the motion for a new trial show grounds for a reversal, since they except only to the failure of the trial judge to admit testimony tending to show that the consideration had failed and that the warranties contained in the contract had been breached.

1. Mortgages §235—Blank indorsement of secured note transfers legal title and authorizes holder to foreclose.

A blank indorsement of the payee of a mortgage note is sufficient to pass the legal title in the note and the mortgage to the holder thereof, and the mortgage may be foreclosed by the holder in his own name. Civil Code 1910, §§ 3278, 3345, 3346, 3347, 4274; Setze v. First National Bank of Pensacola, 140 Ga. 606, 79 S. E. 540.

2. Appeal and error §679(1)—Assignment that defendant had right to plead failure of consideration held without merit.

The plea of failure of consideration not being stricken, and it not appearing what evidence, if any, was offered by the defendant in support of such plea, an assignment of error that "the defendant had a legal right to plead failure of consideration" is without merit.

1. Brokers §55(1)—Contract held not broken by procuring another broker to obtain purchaser.

A real estate brokerage contract, which provides that the agent may sell, or through his influence may sell, certain real estate for the owner, is not breached by the agent procuring another real estate dealer to obtain a purchaser. It being within the contemplation of the contracting parties that the agent will not necessarily be required to personally perform his duties under the contract, but that he may through his influence procure the performance of such duties through the instrumentality of some other person, such performance by a third party is not subject to the objection that the agent has delegated his authority. Springfield Fire Ins. Co. v. Price, 132 Ga. 687, 64 S. E. 1074.

2. Brokers §55(1)—Contract to sell at stipulated sum not broken by procuring another to obtain purchaser.

A contract which provides that the agent may sell the property at a certain stipulated amount, as $50 per acre, does not necessarily repose any personal trust or special confidence in the skill, discretion, or judgment of the agent, and the agent may, without committing a breach of the contract, perform his duties under it by procuring the services of another, who, acting for the agent, obtains a purchaser under the terms of the contract. Civil Code 1910, § 3578; McCroskey v. Hamilton, 108 Ga. 640, 34 S. E. 111, 75 Am. St. Rep. 79.

3. Brokers §40—Contract held not contradictory as to commissions.

The contract does not contain terms that are contradictory, where it provides that an agent is employed by the owner to sell certain real estate, consisting of a certain number of acres, at a certain price per acre, to net the owner a certain price per acre, and to retain, as a commission for his services in selling the property, the difference between the selling price and the net price to the owner, and also where it provides that the agent may sell, or through his influence in procuring the services of another, cause to be sold, such described property, and retain as a commission for his services all of the purchase price above a certain amount.

4. Evidence \S 442(4)—When brokerage contract leaves selling price blank, it may be proved by extrinsic evidence.

Where, in such a contract, the amount at which the agent is to sell the property is left blank, the amount may be proved by extrinsic evidence, under a proper allegation in the petition as to the amount. Georgia Railroad & Banking Co. v. Reid, 91 Ga. 377, 17 S. E. 934.

5. Brokers \S 82(1)—Petition in action for commissions held not demurrable.

In a suit by the agent against the owner on such a contract, the petition, which contains two counts, one count alleging such a contract as is set out above in paragraph 1 of the syllabus, and the other count alleging a contract as set out in paragraph 2 of the syllabus, is not subject to any of the special or general grounds of the demurrers interposed. The plaintiff is therefore entitled to recover the larger amount sued for, if he can prove the contract declared upon.

6. Pleading \S 192(6)—No demurrer for matter requiring evidence to show.

The contract, as it appears copied and set out in the petition, contains no evidence of any physical characteristics (such as being partly printed and partly in writing) as might aid in its construction or show the invalidity of any of its clauses, and such question cannot be raised on demurrer. Such facts, if they exist, must be established by proof.

7. Rulings on demurrer.

On demurrer to the petition the first count was improperly stricken, and the other count was properly allowed to stand.

8. Petition held sufficient.

The petition otherwise sets out a cause of action.

1. Frauds, statute of \S 152(1)—Must be pleaded.

In a suit for breach of contract, defendant cannot claim the benefit of the statute unless the statute is pleaded.

2. Evidence \S 471(20)—Testimony as to state of market and actual selling price not opinion evidence.

While direct testimony as to market value is in the nature of opinion evidence, testimony as to the state of the market and the actual selling price of a certain commodity at a particular time and place is testimony as to a positive fact, and not opinion evidence.

3. Evidence \S 113(2)—Value of commodity at distant place is irrelevant and creates no issue.

Where the issue to be determined is the state of the market as respects a certain commodity at a certain time and place, evidence as to the state of the market at the same time at a place several hundred miles distant is irrelevant and, though admitted, creates no issue for the jury.

4. Evidence \S 113(1)—Food regulations not admissible when value not affected.

When it does not appear that the value of the article involved was in any way affected by the United States food regulations, they cannot be considered in determining such value.

[2, 3] 2. While "direct testimony as to market value is in the nature of opinion evidence," testimony as to the state of the market and as to the actual selling price of a certain commodity at a particular time and place is testimony as to a positive fact and is not in its nature opinion evidence, and where undisputed a verdict may properly be directed as to the value thus proved. Where the issue to be determined is as to the state of the market as respects a certain commodity at a certain time and place, evidence as to the state of the market of the commodity at the same time at a place several hundred miles distant is irrelevant, and, although admitted, creates no issue for a jury upon the question under consideration.

[4] 3. Where it does not appear that the value of the article in question was in any affected by the United States food regulations, such regulations cannot be considered in determining the value of such article.

[5] 4. It is not necessary to pass upon the other assignments of error, as they are not insisted upon.

[6] 5. This being a suit for a breach of a contract for the sale of personal property to be delivered in the future, and the undisputed evidence establishing the contract and its breach by the defendant, to the plaintiff's damage in a certain amount, a verdict for the plaintiff was properly directed.

6. A verdict, however, was demanded for the plaintiff in the sum of only $472.50. Since the verdict directed was for $500.50, the judgment is affirmed, with direction that the plaintiff write off the excess.

1. Evidence §423(8)—Surety not required to give principal notice of intention before proving suretyship as defense to suit on contract.

Section 3556 of Civil Code 1910, which provides that where the fact of suretyship does not appear upon the face of the contract it may be proved by parol provided the surety gives notice to the principal of his intention to make such proof, applies only to cases where the defendant seeks to establish himself as a surety, not by way of a plea in bar to a suit against him on the contract, but for the purpose of enforcing his rights as a surety against his principal.

2. Husband and wife §158—Married woman may plead that she was surety and not bound without giving principal notice of intention to make such a defense.

A female defendant whose name appears as a principal on the face of the contract sued on may plead in bar to the suit that she was in fact a surety only, and that, being a married woman at the time she entered into the contract, the contract of suretyship was void, and it is not necessary to the validity of such plea that it appear that notice was given to the alleged principal as required by Civil Code 1910, § 3556, of her intention to make such defense. The court erred in striking the defendant's plea and in giving judgment for the plaintiff.

GROVE MFG. CO. v. SALTER. (No. 11360.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2.
March 4, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Fraudulent conveyances §47—Bulk sales statute applies only to sales by merchant, trader, or dealer.

The sale in bulk act of this state (Civ. Code 1910, §§ 3226-3229) applies only to sales of "any stock of goods, wares, or merchandise in bulk" by a merchant, trader, or dealer in such articles. A bona fide purchaser for value of any stock of "goods, wares, or merchandise in bulk" from a vendor who is not such a merchant, trader, or dealer acquires good title to the property, even though he has not complied with the terms of this act. See, in this connection, Civ. Code 1910, §§ 4120, 3225; Cooney, Eckstein & Co. v. Sweat, 133 Ga. 511, 512, 66 S. E. 257, 25 L. R. A. (N. S.) 758.

2. Fraudulent conveyances §198—Good-faith purchaser from one not a merchant, etc., acquires good title notwithstanding prior sale in violation of bulk sales act.

Where, in a claim case, the defendant in fi. fa. was a merchant, trader, or dealer in merchandise contemplated in the act, and had made a sale of his stock of goods, wares, or merchandise in bulk which was fraudulent for failure to comply with the terms of this act, a claimant who had bona fide and for value afterwards purchased such stock of goods, wares, or merchandise in bulk, without notice of such fraudulent sale, from another party who was not a merchant, trader, or dealer in merchandise in such property, acquired good title to the property.

3. Certiorari \Leftrightarrow 68—Properly overruled when verdict and judgment authorized by law and evidence.

The verdict and judgment as rendered for the claimant being authorized under the law and the evidence, the trial judge did not err in overruling the certiorari.

METROPOLITAN LIFE INS. CO. v. MONROE. (No. 11536.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2.
Feb. 24, 1921.)

(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

1. Certiorari \Leftrightarrow 43—Superior court does not acquire jurisdiction unless bond given.

Under Civ. Code 1910, § 5185, requiring the party applying for a writ of certiorari to give bond and security for the payment of all future costs and eventual condemnation money, the superior court acquires no jurisdiction if the bond is not given.

2. Certiorari \Leftrightarrow 43—Bond to person described as administrator runs to him personally, when actual principal cannot be ascertained.

Under Civ. Code 1910, § 3570, providing that the words, "agent, administrator," etc. are generally words of description, a certiorari bond, payable to an individual whose name is followed by the word "administrator," runs to him individually, and the word "administrator" is to be taken merely as descriptio personæ, when there is no means of ascertaining the actual principal with absolute and legal certainty.

3. Certiorari \Leftrightarrow 43—Bond cannot be considered as payable to one as administrator of another, where it merely describes him as administrator.

Where a certiorari bond, in the caption and in the body of the bond, describes the obligee as M., administrator, it cannot be construed as payable to M. as administrator of G., though physically attached to a petition for certiorari, not referred to in the bond, reciting a verdict and judgment in favor of M. as administrator of G. against the party giving the bond.

4. Certiorari \Leftrightarrow 43—Amendment of writ and answer held not to give jurisdiction when bond insufficient.

Where a certiorari bond was insufficient because describing the obligee merely as M., administrator, with nothing to show who the actual principal was, the allowance of an amendment of the writ and answer of the trial judge to properly designate the defendant in certiorari as M., as administrator of G., did not give the superior court jurisdiction.

5. Certiorari \Leftrightarrow 43—Defendant entitled to have writ dismissed when bond insufficient under statute.

Though an instrument void as a statutory bond may be good when properly sued on as a common-law obligation, defendant in certiorari was entitled to have the writ dismissed when the bond did not comply with the statutory requirements.

Stephens, J., dissenting.

Error from Superior Court, Bibb County; H. A. Mathews, Judge.

Action by Turner Monroe, administrator, against the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and writ of certiorari dismissed by the superior court, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Jones, Park & Johnston and C. Baxter Jones, all of Macon, for plaintiff in error.

C. H. Hall, of Macon, for defendant in error.

JENKINS, P. J. [1] 1. Under the provisions of section 5185 of Civil Code 1910, it is the general rule that before any writ of certiorari shall issue the party applying for the same shall give bond and security for all future costs and the eventual condemnation money, payable to the adverse party, and if he fails so to do the superior court does not acquire jurisdiction of the case. Miller v. Anderson, 118 Ga. 432, 433 (2), 45 S. E. 365; Jones v. Gill, 121 Ga. 93, 96, 48 S. E. 688; Carroll v. Inner Shoe Tire Co., 21 Ga. App. 397, 94 S. E. 643.

[2] 2. A certiorari bond, payable on its face to a named individual, followed by the word "administrator," which falls within itself to furnish the means whereby the actual principal for whose benefit the bond is executed can be ascertained with absolute and legal certainty, amounts to nothing more than an undertaking in favor of the named individual, and the word "administrator" is to be taken merely as descriptio personæ. Code 1910, § 3570.

[3] Thus, where the caption to a certiorari bond is entitled "Turner Monroe, Administrator, v. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co., in the Municipal Court of the City of Macon, September Term, 1919," and where the bond recites dissatisfaction with the verdict rendered in said case, and a desire to certiorari the same, as a reason for entering into said bond, and where the obligor binds himself for future cost and the eventual condemnation money unto "Turner Monroe, Administrator," the obligation must be taken as being executed in favor of Turner Monroe individually, and cannot be construed as payable to "Turner Monroe as administrator upon the estate of Jeannette Green," although the bond may be physically attached to a petition for certiorari, but to which no reference is made, reciting a verdict and judgment adverse to petitioner in the case of Turner Monroe as administrator upon the estate of Jeannette Green v. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co., filed to the September term, 1919, of the Municipal Court of the city of Macon.

[4] 3. The fact that the judge of the superior court may have allowed the answer of the trial judge and the writ of certiorari issued by the clerk, both referring to the case as "Turner Monroe, administrator," to be amended nunc pro tunc, so as to read "Turner Monroe, as administrator upon the estate of Jeannette Green," would not operate to give the superior court jurisdiction of a case which in the absence of the required bond it could not entertain. Miller Co. v. Anderson, 118 Ga. 432 (2), 45 S. E. 365.

[5] 4. Irrespective of whether or not under section 5707 of Civil Code 1910 a certiorari bond is amendable in any respect (see Simpkins v. Johnson, 3 Ga. App. 437, 60 S. E. 202, and Carroll v. Inner Shoe Tire Co., 21 Ga. App. 397, 94 S. E. 643, holding it to be not amendable), no offer to amend was made in this case; and, while it is sometimes true that an instrument may be void as a statutory bond, and yet be good when properly sued on as a common-law obligation (Paxson v. Planters' Warehouse & Loan Co., 20 Ga. App. 267, 92 S. E. 1023), yet the defendant in certiorari is entitled to whatever rights were his pertaining to the statutory requirements of the bond, and the judge of the superior court did not err in dismissing the writ. Judgment affirmed.

HILL, J., concurs.

STEPHENS, J. (dissenting). It is true that the bond is payable to Turner Monroe in his individual capacity. He can nevertheless, by proper proof of all the circumstances, sue in his representative capacity as administrator of the estate of Jeannette Green, and recover on the bond. 18 Cyc. 877. This being true, it would seem that, where all of the facts necessary to support a recovery can be ascertained from the record, judgment could be entered up in favor of the opposite party, Turner Monroe, as administrator of the estate of Jeannette Green, just as if the bond had been made to Turner Monroe in his representative capacity, and without inquiring into any matters dehors the record. The bond being entitled in the cause of Turner Monroe, Administrator, v. Metropolitan Life Insurance Company, in the municipal court of Macon, and it appearing from the answer of the judge of that court to the writ of certiorari on file in the instant case that no case was pending in the municipal court of Macon in which Turner Monroe was plaintiff against the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company, except the case of Turner Monroe as administrator of the estate of Jeannette Green, it seems that the facts necessary to establish liability on the bond in favor of Turner Monroe as administrator of the estate of Jeannette Green are supplied by the record, and therefore judgment can be rendered on the bond without inquiry into matters outside the record.

JACKSON et al. v. DORSEY, Governor.
(No. 11453.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2.
March 4, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Ball \S 84—Not defense to forfeiture that prisoner not brought to trial after demand.

Where a scire facias has issued upon a forfeiture of a criminal recognizance, it is no defense by the surety that his principal was not brought to trial at the subsequent term of court after having made a legal demand for a trial at the former term as provided in Pen. Code 1910, \S 983, when it does not appear that the principal had been discharged and acquitted or was legally entitled to be discharged and acquitted.

2. Criminal law \S 576(5)—Demand for trial waived by absence and discharge defeated.

Voluntary absence from court (such as being a fugitive from justice) by one under a criminal charge, who made a demand for a trial at a former term of the court, amounts to a waiver of such demand and does not entitle him to a discharge and acquittal of the offense charged, as provided in Pen. Code 1910, \S 983. Flagg v. State, 11 Ga. App. 37, 74 S. E. 562.

3. Other assignments not passed on.

In view of the above ruling, it is unnecessary to pass upon the other assignments of error as to rulings on the pleadings.

4. Criminal law \S 1103—Assignments requiring inquiry into evidence not considered when evidence not properly briefed.

The brief of the evidence in this case consists of questions and answers and colloquies between the court and counsel, and it appearing that no bona fide effort has been made to brief the evidence as is required by law, this court will not consider any assignment of error in the determination of which it is necessary to inquire into the evidence, such as an exception to the direction of a verdict upon the ground that evidence was improperly admitted or that the evidence raises an issue of fact for the jury. Trueheart v. State, 13 Ga. App. 661(2), 79 S. E. 755, and cases cited.

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2.

(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

1. Certiorari ¶43—Writ void, if issued before bond given as required by law.

A writ of certiorari in a civil case, unless sued out in forma pauperis, is absolutely void, if issued before the applicant has given bond as prescribed by law.

2. Certiorari ¶43—Bond must be approved, and certificate is not substitute.

A bond on certiorari, to be effectual, must be approved by the judge or justice of the court in which the case was tried, and a certificate of the trial magistrate that the plaintiff has paid all costs accrued and given bond as required by law is not a sufficient substitute for the written approval required by law.

3. Certiorari ¶70(9)—Writ of error to judgment overruling certiorari dismissed, when judgment refusing to dismiss certiorari must be reversed.

Where a certiorari should have been dismissed, and the judgment refusing to dismiss it must be reversed, the subsequent hearing was nugatory, and a writ of error to the overruling of the certiorari will be dismissed.

STEPHENS, J. [1, 2] 1. A certificate of the trial magistrate that the plaintiff 'has paid all costs accrued in the trial and given bond as required by law in said case' is not a sufficient substitute for the written approval required by law." *Sanford v. [3] 2. "Inasmuch as the judgment, in the present case, refusing to dismiss the certiorari, complained of in the cross-bill of exceptions, must be reversed, the subsequent hearing was nugatory, and a writ of error to the overruling of the certiorari will be dismissed." *Alabama Midland Ry. KLINE CAR CORPORATION v. WATKINS MOTOR CO. (No. 11314.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2.
Feb. 26, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Abatement and revival ¶3—Question of jurisdiction cannot be raised by denial of jurisdictional allegations.

"Pleas to the jurisdiction must be pleaded in person, and must, when relied on, be pleaded specially, unless a want of jurisdiction appears on the face of the proceedings—in which case it may be taken advantage of on motion." Civ. Code 1910, § 5665. The defendant, not having filed a special plea to the jurisdiction, cannot raise the question in his plea by a general denial of facts alleged in the petition showing jurisdiction of the person.

2. Damages ¶85—Party making deposit to secure performance may recover it after expiration of contract in absence of any default.

Where a contract provides that a sum of money deposited by one of the contracting parties with the other party as a guaranty for the faithful performance of the contract by the party making the deposit shall, upon the latter party's failure to faithfully perform his obligations under the contract, be appropriated by the other party and applied as liquidated damages, the party making the deposit may, after the expiration of the contract, recover the amount of the deposit when it appears that he had not in any way violated his obligations under the contract and is in no way indebted to the opposite party.

3. Sales \S 183—Failure to deliver, when not due to excepted causes, relieves other party of performing.

Where the contract provides that the party making the deposit shall at certain intervals during the life of the contract purchase automobiles from the other party, and further provides that the other party will not be liable for any loss or damage thereunder arising from a nonperformance of his obligations to make the deliveries contracted for if such loss or damage is caused by reason of fires, strikes, or causes beyond his control, a failure by him to make deliveries, when not due to any of such causes, amounts to a breach of the contract by him, absolving the other party from performing.

4. Verdict for plaintiff authorized.

In a suit, therefore, by the party making the deposit, to recover the same, where the evidence shows no breach of the contract on his part, and fails to show that performance by the opposite party was prevented by fires, strikes, or causes beyond his control, a verdict for the plaintiff was authorized.

5. Evidence \S 271(6)—Statement of seller giving reasons for nondelivery of goods not evidence in his behalf.

Where a party, under the contract, has the right to delay deliveries on account of such causes, a mere statement by him assigning such causes as a reason for a failure by him to comply with his obligations under the contract is not evidence in his behalf showing the existence of such causes.

6. Evidence \S 5(2)—No judicial notice that failure to perform act was due to war or general public condition.

While the existence of a war or any fact of general public notoriety may be taken notice of by the courts without proof, it does not follow that a court will take notice, without proof, that a failure to perform any particular act is due to the existence of a recognized war or any general public condition.

7. Evidence \S 222(2)—Promise to refund deposit under contract held an admission and not varying written contract.

A party to a contract may, as in the instant case, make admissions tending to establish his liability—as a statement by the party holding the deposit, promising to refund the deposit to the party who made it—and such evidence is not subject to the objection that it is extrinsic evidence seeking to vary the terms of a written contract.

8. Evidence \S 427—Trial \S 255(3)—Failure to charge on burden of proof without request held not error.

It does not appear that a charge instructing the jury that the plaintiff carried the burden of proof would, under the evidence in this case, likely have produced a different result; and therefore a failure of the court so to charge, in the absence of any special request to do so, was not error.

9. Sufficiency of evidence.

The evidence authorized the verdict, and no error of law appears.

BEVERIDGE v. SIMMERVILLE. (No. 11486.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2, March 4, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Landlord and tenant \S 310(1)—On judgment in landlord's favor in proceeding to dispossess, he is entitled to double rent.

Upon the trial of an issue formed upon a summary proceeding under Civ. Code 1910, \S 5386, by a landlord to dispossess his tenant for failure to pay rent, where judgment goes against the tenant, the landlord is entitled to recover double the rent reserved or stipulated to be paid, unless the tenant was one at will or sufferance, in either of which latter events the landlord is entitled to recover double what the rent of the premises is shown to be worth.

2. Landlord and tenant \S 309—Instruction that parol contract for more than one year created tenancy at will not error.

Where upon the trial of such an issue there is evidence authorizing the inference that the rental contract was in parol and for a term longer than one year, it was not error to instruct the jury that such a contract by operation of law, became a tenancy at will. Civ. Code 1910, $\S\S$ 3693, 3708.

3. Landlord and tenant \S 309—Failure to charge that law implied renewal, when tenant continued to pay rent after termination of lease held error.

There being evidence also authorizing the inference that the lease contract as originally entered into was for a period of one year, and that the tenant after the expiration of the year continued in possession of the premises and continued to pay rent under the terms of the contract, and continued to live on from year to year, paying rent under the terms of the original lease contract, it was therefore error to fail to charge that under such state of facts the law implied a renewal of the original lease contract for a year, and that a tenancy from year to year was created. Allen v. Montgomery, 25 Ga. App. 817, 105 S. E. 88.

4. Landlord and tenant \S 297(1, 2)—Summary proceedings do not lie unless possession has been demanded and refused; notice to terminate tenancy at will not sufficient demand; agreement to vacate does not dispense with demand.

Before a tenant can be summarily dispossessed under the Civ. Code 1910, \S 5385, for holding over beyond his term or for failure to pay rent, it must appear that possession of the premises has been demanded of him, and that he had refused or failed to vacate. The giving by the landlord to the tenant of two months' notice, as required by Civ. Code 1910, \S 3709, to terminate a tenancy at will, is not such a demand for possession of the premises as will warrant the issuance by the landlord of a summary proceeding to dispossess the tenant; nor will an agreement by the tenant with the landlord to vacate by a certain date operate in lieu of the demand required by the statute.

5. Landlord and tenant \S 298(2)—Damages from landlord's conversion of tenant's property cannot be recouped in proceeding to dispossess.

The tenant cannot, in such a proceeding, recoup damages not arising under the contract. Where the landlord entered upon the premises without authority, after the issuance of the writ and after the giving of the counter affidavit and bond by the tenant, and converted to his own use certain personal property belonging to the tenant, damages arising out of such unlawful conversion cannot be set up by the tenant by way of recoupment in defense to the proceeding to dispossess.

6. Landlord and tenant \S 310(1)—Double rent not recoverable without evidence as to when possession was demanded.

Double rent cannot be recovered from a tenant prior to demand for possession, and, there being no evidence as to when demand, if any, was made, the verdict for double rent is not supported by the evidence. Talley v. Mitchell, 138 Ga. 392, 75 S. E. 465.

CITY OF COLLINS v. FINDLEY.
(No. 11634.)(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2.
Feb. 24, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Bridges \S 37—City liable for negligent failure to maintain small bridge in safe condition.

Failure of a municipal corporation to use due care in maintaining its streets in a condition safe for persons traveling over them renders the municipality liable to any one injured without fault on his part on account of any negligently permitted defect in a small bridge or timbers placed across a ditch in the street.

2. Bridges \S 46(4)—Doctrine of res ipsa loquitur applies when plank of bridge apparently safe flies up and strikes mule.

Where a bridge over a ditch along a public thoroughfare in a city is covered with planks apparently safe, but one of which, as a team passes over the bridge, flies up and injures one of the mules to the team, the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur applies, and the inference is authorized that the municipality was negligent.

3. New Trial \S 70—Motion properly overruled when evidence authorized verdict.

The evidence authorized the inference that the driveway over which the plaintiff's mules were traveling and in which the bridge was located was a public thoroughfare in the city of Collins, and otherwise authorized the verdict for the plaintiff. It was therefore not error to overrule the defendant's motion for a new trial.

2. Action — Misjoinder in action against two automobile drivers for injuries in a collision.

HILL et al. v. AMAN et al. (No. 223.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. March 16, 1921.)

Appeal and error — Assignments not in brief are deemed abandoned.

Assignments of error which appear in the record but are not brought forward in defendant's brief are deemed to be abandoned under Supreme Court rule 84 (81 S. E. xii).

Exceptions and Appeal from Superior Court, Sampson County; Connor, Judge.

Action by J. H. Hill and another against A. W. Aman and others. Judgment for the plaintiffs, and defendant Aman excepts and appeals. No error.

Civil action tried upon exceptions to report of referee. Upon the hearing his honor modified the findings of the referee in some particulars, and, as thus amended, the same was adopted and approved and judgment entered thereon in favor of the plaintiff. Defendant A. W. Aman excepted and appealed.

Grady & Graham, and H. E. Faison, all of Clinton, for Hill.

Butler & Herring and John D. Kerr, Sr., all of Clinton, for Aman.

PER CURIAM. There are only three assignments of error in the record: (1) That the court erred in not setting aside the findings of fact by the referee; (2) that the court erred in not sustaining the defendant's first exception to the referee's finding of fact; and (3) that the court erred in not sustaining the defendant's first exception to the referee's conclusion of law. While these assignments of error appear in the record, they do not seem to have been brought forward in defendant's brief, and therefore are deemed to be abandoned under rule 84 (81 S. E. xii). Notwithstanding this irregularity, we have examined the record, and find no error of which the defendant can justly complain.

The controversy was largely one of fact. It appears upon the face of the record that the case was heard with care and with due regard for the rights of the parties.

No error.

BRINSON et al. v. McCOTTER et ux.
(No. 177.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. March 18, 1921.)

Appeal and error \S 1106(3)—Action to determine title remanded to have necessary parties joined.

Where, on appeal in an action to settle the title to a tract of land submitted on an agreed statement of facts, it appears that there can be no complete determination in the absence of the heirs of a certain claimant, the cause will be remanded to the lower court to have those heirs made parties with the right to plead, or, if so advised, the heirs may become parties in the Supreme Court and adopt the agreed statement of facts.

Appeal from Superior Court, Pamlico County; Bond, Judge.

Action by F. C. Brinson and others against S. E. McCotter and wife. Judgment for the plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Cause remanded to have necessary parties made parties to the action.

Z. V. Rawls, of Bayboro, for appellants. Small, MacLean, Bragaw & Rodman, of Washington, N. C., for appellees.

PER CURIAM. This is an action to settle the title to a tract of land, submitted upon an agreed statement of facts, and, it appearing that there cannot be a complete determination of the rights of the parties in the absence of the heirs of Ellis H. Pickles, it is ordered that the cause be remanded to the superior court in order that the said heirs be made parties to this action with the right to plead, or, if so advised, they may make themselves parties in this court and adopt the agreed statement of facts.

(151 N. C. 60)

SLUDER v. WOLF MOUNTAIN LUMBER CO. et al. (No. 586.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. March 9, 1921.)

1. Acknowledgment \S 59 — Seal of commissioner of affidavits presumed.

Where acknowledgment of a deed was taken before a commissioner of affidavits of North Carolina for the state of Maryland and no seal appears on the record, but the commissioner recites his official seal, the same is presumed.

2. Acknowledgment \S 33—Of commissioner of affidavits not required to be under seal.

In 1856, the certificate of acknowledgment of the commissioner of affidavits was not required to be under seal.

3. Records \S 10 $\frac{1}{2}$ —Order for registration not necessary.

If a deed be in fact registered after proper probate, the lack of an order of the clerk of the superior court ordering its registration does not invalidate the registration; the statutory provision for such an order being directory and not mandatory.

4. Wills \S 242—Probate in one state does not pass title to land in another state.

Probate of a will in the state of Maryland was insufficient to pass title to land in the state of North Carolina, where the will was dated December 28, 1877, and was subscribed by two witnesses, only one of whom testified, and there was no evidence that the other witness was dead or beyond the state, or that his testimony could not be procured.

5. Wills \S 434—Improper probate cured by statute.

Probate of a will in Maryland, insufficient under the law of North Carolina because only one of two witnesses testified, was cured by the curative act, Pub. Loc. Laws (Ex. Sess.) 1913, c. 142, as to an heir, who had no vested interest at the time of the ratification of the act.

6. Wills \S 71, 204—Effect of curative acts on rights of heirs.

If a will has been defectively executed, as if it has one witness instead of two, or if for any reason void, rights of heirs could not be affected by subsequent legislation, because this would be to make a will for one who died intestate; but curing a defect in the probate of a will executed in accordance with statutes stands upon an entirely different footing, as an heir has no vested interest by reason of a defect in the probate of a will.

Appeal from Superior Court, Jackson County; Bryson, Judge.

Action by Margaret Sluder against the Wolf Mountain Lumber Company and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Civil action tried May term, 1920, superior court Jackson county, Bryson, J., upon these issues:

(1) Is the plaintiff, Margaret Sluder, the owner of the land described in the complaint? Answer: No.

(2) Are the defendants, the Wolf Mountain Lumber Company, George H. Smathers, trustee, the owners of the land embraced in state grant No. 290, to T. J. Foster, as alleged in the answer? Answer: Yes.

At the conclusion of the evidence the court directed the jury to answer the issues, "No," and rendered judgment for the defendant. Plaintiff appealed.

J. G. Merrimon and A. Hall Johnston, both of Ashville, for appellant.

E. C. Ward, of Ashville, for appellees.

ALLEN, J. This action involves the title to a tract of land containing 424 acres lying in the county of Jackson and described in the complaint. The plaintiff introduced the following chain of title: Deed from P. G. Bowman to Nelson B. Gowan dated May 25, 1880. Thence deeds and a will connecting the plaintiff with Nelson B. Gowan. The plaintiff then offered for the purpose of showing a cloud upon her title and as estoppel as against the defendants, a deed from Nelson B. Gowan to F. P. Hooper dated October 17, 1896, for one-fourth interest in this land, and then a deed from W. A. Henson, sheriff, to F. P. Hooper, dated June 20, 1901, for three-fourths interest; thence subsequent deeds connecting the defendants with Nelson B. Gowan. The plaintiff then rested.

The defendant then offered state grant No. 290 to John T. Foster dated October 9, 1856; deed from John T. Foster to Robert L. Dashiell dated November 28, 1856; will of Robert L. Dashiell devising the property to Mary J. Dashiell, his widow, exemplified copy of which was recorded in Jackson county July 27, 1917; deed from Mary J. Dashiell to defendant George H. Smathers dated September 23, 1908; and then deeds to the Wolf Mountain Lumber Company.

[1, 2] The plaintiff insists that the deed from Foster to Dashiell was never properly probated. This exception cannot be sustained. The acknowledgment of the deed was taken before a commissioner of affidavits of North Carolina for the state of Maryland. No seal appears on the record, but the commissioner recites his official seal, and the same is therefore presumed. Johnson v. Eversole Lumber Co., 144 N. C. 717, 57 S. E. 518; Heath v. Cotton Mills, 115 N. C. 208, 20 S. E. 369. However, the statute in question, did not require the certificate of acknowledgment in force in 1856, the date of the acknowledgment made by commissioner of affidavits to be under seal. Revised Code, c. 21, § 2; Johnson v. Duvall, 135 N. C. 642, 47 S. E. 611; Johnson v. Lumber Co., 144 N. C. 717, 57 S. E. 518.

[3] There is no order of the clerk of the superior court of Jackson county ordering this deed to registration. We do not think this invalidates the registration. It has been in effect held that the fiat for registration is not absolutely essential. The statutory provision for such an order is directory and not mandatory. If the deed be in fact registered after proper probate, the lack of a fiat does not invalidate the registration. Holmes v. Marshall, 72 N. C. 37; Young v. Jackson, 92 N. C. 144; Darden v. Steamboat Co., 107 N. C. 437, 12 S. E. 46; U. S. v. Hiwassee Lumber Co., 238 U. S. 553, 35 Sup. Ct. 851, 59 L. Ed. 1453.

But in any event the probate or registration of this deed is validated by chapter 204, Public, Local and Private Laws North Carolina Extra Session 1913. It is true this statute "is valid as against creditors or purchasers for value from the donor, bargainer or lessor named in such deed only from the ratification of this act." The act was ratified October 11, 1913. The plaintiff does not claim under the said deed and derives no title by any other conveyance from the grantor in said deed.

It is contended:

"That the court erred in admitting the will of Robt. L. Dashiell, for that the same was not properly probated, and was not properly recorded in the state of North Carolina."

[4] We are of opinion that the probate of the will in the state of Maryland was insufficient to pass title to land in the state of North Carolina. The will was dated December 28, 1877. The witnesses were John M. Phillips and David Terry. David Terry testified that he saw the said testator sign and seal the said annexed writing, and heard him publish, pronounce, and declare the same as and for his last will and testament; that at the time of the doing thereof the said testator was of sound disposing mind, memory, and understanding, so far as this deponent knows, and as he verily believes; and John M. Phillips the other subscribing witness thereto were present at the same time with this deponent, and together with him subscribed his name thereto as a witness in the presence of the testator and of each other, at the request of the testator.

[5] There is no evidence that the other witness is dead or beyond the state or that his testimony cannot be procured. The probate fails to comply with our statute, but we think it is cured by the curative act, chapter 142, Public, Local and Private Laws Extra Session 1913. This act contains the following provision, viz.:

"That this act shall not apply to pending suits or vested interests, and nothing herein shall be construed to prevent such wills from being impeached for fraud."

This will devises the property to Mary J. Dashiell, under whom the defendants claim by deed dated September 23, 1908. The plaintiff claims also under the heirs at law of Robert L. Dashiell by deed dated May 14, 1917, some time after the act was ratified. We cannot see that the plaintiff had any vested interest in the land at the time of the ratification of the act. She certainly had none from the heirs of Dashiell, because her deed was dated some years afterwards. In our opinion she had no vested interest derived from Nelson B. Gowan because it is not shown that he had any title to the land in 1880.

[6] If the will had been defectively executed, as if it had one witness instead of two, or if for any reason void, the rights of the heirs could not be affected by subsequent legislation, because this would be to make a will for one who died intestate, but curing a defect in the probate of a will, executed in accordance with our statutes, stands upon an entirely different footing, and if the power cannot be exercised, then all of the legislative acts validating probates of wills are void, because wills are probated after death and the interest of the heir has then accrued.

The question is, however, foreclosed by the unanimous opinion of the court in Vanderbilt v. Johnson, 141 N. C. 370, 54 S. E. 298, which has been approved in Weston v. Lumber Co., 160 N. C. 263, 75 S. E. 800, and Vaught v. Williams, 177 N. C. 82, 97 S. E. 737.

In the Vanderbilt Case the court states the facts and its conclusion as follows:

"In deraining his title, the plaintiff offered in evidence the will of John Strother, dated November 22, 1816. The will is attested by two witnesses, but was admitted to probate in Tennessee upon the testimony of one only. The General Assembly of North Carolina at its session of 1885 enacted an act to cure the defects in the probate of this will, and to ratify and validate the orders of the probate courts of this state in regard thereto. Private Laws 1885, c. 52. The referee held that the act 'has not the effect to cure and make valid the probate of said will.' In this we think there is error. We are of opinion that the act is valid and effectual for the purpose for which it was enacted. * * * The defendants do not claim under a deed executed by the heirs at law of John Strother, before the passage of the act, and therefore no vested right intervenes. Legislation validating the probate of deeds, curing defects in privy examinations of married women and the like, has been very common in this state, and has been uniformly upheld."

This case is exactly like the one before us, and, instead of being overruled, it has been twice affirmed on the point now under discussion.

In Weston v. Lumber Co., supra, Walker, J., while discussing the effect of curative acts, says:

"The statutes are highly remedial, and should be liberally construed, so as to embrace all cases fairly within their scope. It is constructive legislation; we are saving titles, and not destroying them. It has been said that 'such acts are of a remedial character, and are the peculiar subjects of legislation. They are not liable to the imputation of being assumptions of judicial power.' McFaddin v. Evans Co., 185 U. S. 505. It was further held that to validate defective probates and registrations is a proper exercise of legislative power and favored by the courts."

In the Vaught Case a curative act was considered and its effect upon the heirs, who claimed that their interests were vested, and could not be disturbed by subsequent legislation. The decision was against the contention of the heirs, and in the course of the opinion the court quotes from In re Patterson, 155 Cal. 637, 102 Pac. 945, 132 Am. St. Rep. 126, that—

"The heirs had no vested right to have this law forbidding the probate of such wills continued in force. Their right to the estate of the ancestor was given by statute, and it was contingent upon the fact of there being no will in existence which could be proved."

And from West Side Belt R. Co. v. Pittsburgh Const. Co., 219 U. S. 92, 31 Sup. Ct. 196, 55 L. Ed. 107:

"In Walson v. Mercer, 8 Pet. 88 [8 L. Ed. 876], such an act was sustained against a charge that it divested rights and impaired the obligation of a contract. The act considered made valid the deeds of married women which were invalid by reason of defective acknowledgments, and avoided a judgment in ejectment rendered against one of the parties to the action because of such a defect in a deed relied on for title. The controversy was between the successor by descent of the married woman and the grantee in the deed. It was said in the argument that the descents had been confirmed by two judgments of the Supreme Court of the state against the deed, adjudicating it to be void on points involving its validity, which judgments, it was contended, were conclusive evidence that the deed was no deed, and that the rights acquired by descent were absolute vested rights. The act was nevertheless sustained, as we have stated."

And from 6 R. C. L. 815, that—

"The heirs have no vested right in having any law relating to a pending probate continued in force."

The proviso in the act of 1913 to the effect that the act shall not apply to "vested interests" does not affect the result, as we have seen the heirs had no vested interests.

The judgment is affirmed.

Affirmed.

NOTE.—This opinion was written by BROWN, J., at last term, except that part discussing the effect of the curative act.

(181 N. C. 85)

BUTLER et ux. v. BELL et al. (No. 217.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. March 16, 1921.)

1. Deeds \S 177—Remainders \S 9—Second deed between same parties held to destroy life estate reserved in first deed and not to merge estates.

Where a grantor reserving a life estate subsequently executed another deed to the same grantees conveying the land in fee without any condition or reservation and reciting that it was for the purpose of revoking the prior deed, there was no merger of the life estate and remainder, but a destruction of the life estate and creation of a fee simple absolute.

2. Deeds \S 76—Voidable and not void if executed by one without sufficient mental capacity.

Deeds executed by a grantor without sufficient mental capacity to execute a deed were not void, but only voidable, and were valid for all purposes until assailed and set aside at the instance of those having an interest to impeach them.

3. Adverse possession §71(2)—Deed to one having notice that grantor's deed was voidable held color of title.

A deed to one who had notice that the deed to his grantor was executed by a person without sufficient mental capacity constituted color of title, and where the grantee entered into possession and continued in possession openly, notoriously, continuously, and adversely for seven years, he acquired a good title.

4. Equity §67—Does not aid those guilty of laches.

Equity will not aid one who is guilty of laches in prosecuting his rights or who lies by while the title of another is maturing with his full knowledge and does nothing.

5. Limitation of actions §1 — Statute held beneficial.

The statute of limitations is a wise and beneficial law, not designed merely to deprive any one of his just rights by lapse of time, but to afford security against stale demands.

6. Limitation of actions §19(3)—Applies to suit to cancel deeds and recover land.

A suit to cancel deeds and recover the land covered thereby by the devisee of the grantor is really ejectment and is barred by the statute of limitations.

7. Limitation of actions §73(5)—Coverture does not affect adverse possession subsequent to 1899.

Plaintiff's coverture does not prevent the acquisition of title by adverse possession against her under a deed made in 1905 in view of C. S. § 408, providing that the time computed as constituting adverse possession shall not include any possession against a feme covert during coverture prior to February 13, 1899.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sampson County; Connor, Judge.

Suit by Musco Butler and wife against N. A. Bell and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. No error.

It appears in the record that prior to June 26, 1903, W. A. Bell was the owner of several tracts of land in Sampson county, and, desiring to divide them among certain of his children and grandchildren, he caused them to be surveyed and then conveyed the lots, as shown in the survey, to his children and grandchildren, except the plaintiff Esther R. Butler, one of his children, who alleges that her father intended to give and convey to her the 100 acres of his land, which is the subject of this suit, and that he made his will in 1898 and devised it to her therein. He died in 1905. It further appears that on June 26, 1903, the defendant N. A. Bell, son of W. A. Bell, procured from the latter and his wife a deed purporting to convey to N. A. Bell the said 100 acres, but reserving a life estate to themselves; and that on April 30, 1904, N. A. Bell received another deed for the same land from W. A. Bell and his wife conveying to them (N. A. Bell and wife) a fee simple absolute in the same land without any condition or reservation whatever, and with full covenants. It is expressed in this deed that it is made for the purpose of revoking the former deed to the same person for the same tract of land. Afterwards, on January 21, 1905, the defendants N. A. Bell and wife conveyed by deed to their codefendant, Nathan Barefoot, the same tract of land in fee simple and without any condition or reservation, and with full covenants of seizin, warranty, and against incumbrances.

Plaintiff brought this action to set aside said deeds, and alleged that, at the time the first two deeds were executed by W. A. Bell and wife, W. A. Bell was not mentally capable of making them, and that the defendants N. A. Bell and wife, Eva Bell, and Nathan Barefoot, well knowing that to be the case, deliberately and fraudulently conspired between themselves to take advantage of it in order to procure the first two deeds, so that the land could be conveyed to the defendant Nathan Barefoot, which was afterwards done in pursuance of the previous understanding and conspiracy between them.

Defendants denied that there had been any fraudulent conduct whatsoever on the part of the three defendants named, or any of them, and especially denied that W. A. Bell was non compos mentis or even of weak mind when the first two deeds were made, or that any advantage was taken of him by them or either of them; that all of the transactions, including the execution of the Barefoot deed, were open and above board, and the deeds founded upon a valuable consideration, and nothing was done by them, or either of them, which should impeach or impair their validity; and that the defendants were purchasers in good faith and for valuable considerations. They further aver that all of the said deeds were duly probated and registered immediately after their execution, and have been spread upon the public record ever since and until the present time, and that plaintiffs had full notice and knowledge thereof for many years before this action was commenced in 1916, and especially for more than three years, and therefore they plead that, for this reason alone, if for no other, the plaintiffs are debarred from any recovery in this case. They further aver, in denial of plaintiffs' title, and right to recover the land in controversy, that, at the time he received his deed, and ever since and for more than seven years before this action was brought, the defendant Nathan Barefoot has been in the open, notorious, and adverse possession of this land, claiming the same as his own, under the said deed, which was known to plaintiffs, and that, even if there was originally any defect in his title under said deeds, he has acquired a good and indefeasible one by virtue of his possession, held adversely under the same, and continued, as aforesaid.

The jury returned the following verdict, upon the issues submitted to them:

"(1) At the time of the execution of the first deed from Willis A. Bell and wife to the defendant N. A. Bell, on June 26, 1903, did the said Willis A. Bell have sufficient mental capacity to execute a deed? Answer: No.

"(2) At the time of the execution of the second deed from Willis A. Bell and wife to N. A. Bell and wife, on April 30, 1904, did the said Willis A. Bell have sufficient mental capacity to execute a deed? Answer: No.

"(3) Was Nathan Barefoot an innocent purchaser for value, without notice of any lack of mental capacity of Willis A. Bell to execute the deeds referred to in issues 1 and 2, for the land described in the deed from N. A. Bell and wife to Nathan Barefoot, dated June 25, 1905? Answer: No.

"(4) Is the plaintiffs' cause of action barred by the three-year statute of limitations? Answer: Yes.

"(5) Is the plaintiff's cause of action barred by the seven-year statute of limitations? Answer: Yes."

The court charged the jury that, although an estate for their lives was reserved in the first deed by W. A. Bell and his wife, it was merged by the second deed and the Barefoot deed in the remainder, and therefore the statute of limitations began to run against plaintiffs when the merger took place, and that, as Nathan Barefoot had held the possession of the land continuously, notoriously, and adversely, under his deed, for more than three years, and also for more than seven years before the commencement of this action, the plaintiffs' cause of action, if they had any, is barred by the statute of limitations, and that, the facts being admitted, the jury should answer the fourth and fifth issues, "Yes."

Judgment on the verdict, and appeal by plaintiffs.

Grady & Graham, of Clinton, for appellants.

Fowler & Crumpler, of Clinton, for appellees.

WALKER, J. (after stating the facts as above). The admitted facts, as above set forth, justified his honor's instruction to the jury on the third and fourth issues. It will be observed that the issues did not correspond with the allegations, as stated in the complaint, and denials in the answer. There is no finding of a conspiracy to defraud the plaintiffs, nor of any actual fraud committed by defendants. The simple and only finding is that, at the time the two deeds were made by W. A. Bell, he did not have sufficient mental capacity to execute them and that Nathan Barefoot purchased from N. A. Bell and his wife with notice of this fact. We need not consider this feature of the case any further, as we will base our decision on other grounds. The plaintiffs contended that there was no merger of the life estate with the remainder, and that the statute of limitations did not bar them, as they could not sue until the life estate expired. Defendants contended that there was such a merger, and therefore no life estate to prevent the statute from barring the plaintiffs.

[1] According to our view of the record, the question of merger does not arise. The first deed, or the one to N. A. Bell, alone, dated June 26, 1903, and registered in Book 126, at page 438, conveyed the fee to him, reserving a life estate to the grantors. The second deed, dated April 30, 1904, and registered in Book 130, at page 44, conveys the fee simple absolute to N. A. Bell and his wife, Eva A. Bell, without any reservation or condition, and contains the following recital:

"This deed is for the purpose of revoking prior deed for said land, which is now on record, and the land known as the Bass place, found in Book 126, page 438."

[2, 3] The deed which is revoked is the first deed, the one to N. A. Bell alone, each of the two deeds conveying the same tract of land as is alleged in the complaint and admitted in the answer. So that, instead of there being two estates, one a particular estate for life, and the other a remainder in fee, there is but one estate, the highest known to the law, as Blackstone says, and that is a fee simple absolute, and this is so, because the former deed, by consent of the parties to it, has been revoked and set aside by their solemn legal act, it being the one in which the grantors reserved a life estate, and the parties then substituted therefor a deed conveying the entire interest and estate in the land in fee simple. Both deeds conveyed the land, even though it was afterwards found that the grantor did not have sufficient mental capacity to do so. But they were not void for this reason, but only voidable, and were valid for all purposes, until assailed and set aside at the instance of those having an interest to impeach them. 13 Cyc. 591; Sprinkle v. Wellborn, 140 N. C. 163, 52 S. E. 666, 3 L. R. A. (N. S.) 174, 111 Am. St. Rep. 827. And the deed to the defendant Nathan Barefoot stands in the same category, for, at most, it was only voidable when attacked by the interested party, the feme plaintiff, and valid until set aside at her instance. It therefore constituted color of title, and when the defendant Nathan Barefoot entered into possession under it and continued in possession openly, notoriously, continuously, and adversely, for seven years, he thereby acquired a good title as against the true owner. There can be no question that the deed to Barefoot was good color of title. It had the appearance of passing the title and professed to pass it, but failed to do so. Seals v. Seals, 165 N. C. 409, 81 S. E. 613, Ann. Cas. 1915D, 134; Norwood v. Totten, 166 N. C. 648, 82 S. E. 951, where the principal cases are collected by the Chief Justice; McConnell v. McConnell, 64 N. C. 342; Perry v. Perry, 99 N. C. 273, 6 S. E. 86; Ellington v. Ellington, 103 N. C. 53, 9 S. E. 208; Smith v. Proctor, 139 N. C. 324, 51 S. E. 889, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 172. We held in Seals v. Seals, supra:

"A claim to property under a conveyance, however inadequate to carry the true title, and however incompetent the grantor may have been to convey, is one under color of title, which will draw to the possession of the grantee the protection of the statute of limitations"—citing Wright v. Mattison, 18 How. 50, 15 L. Ed. 280; Beaver v. Taylor, 1 Wall. 637, 17 L. Ed. 601; Cameron v. U. S., 148 U. S. 301, 13 Sup. Ct. 596, 37 L. Ed. 461.

[4] And our cases are to the same effect. McConnell v. McConnell, supra; Burns v. Stewart, 162 N. C. 360, 78 S. E. 321. So that, while Barefoot did not get the title by his deed, but acquired it, in another way and from a different source, by his adverse possession under color, this title must therefore prevail against the plaintiffs' prior right. Judge Connor charged that plaintiffs knew of the facts that Barefoot was in possession claiming to hold adversely to them under his deed, which conveyed the entire title, when taken in connection with the deed of W. A. Bell and wife to his grantors, N. A. Bell and wife, the first deed to N. A. Bell having, by consent of parties, been revoked and put out of the way, as if it had never existed. There is no room for arguing that there are two separate estates, one for life, and the other in remainder, as the last deed, or the one to N. A. Bell and wife, passed only one estate, which was a fee simple absolute and destroyed the former life estate, instead of merging it. If that is not incontrovertibly true, and the parties intended that there should be two estates, there was no use in making the last deed, and besides it clearly expresses, on its face, the contrary intention of the parties. If there had been a case of merger, equity would not keep the two estates apart, for it will not aid one who is guilty of laches in prosecuting his rights, or who lies by while the title of another is maturing with his full knowledge, and does nothing, when it was so easy to prevent the operation of laches or the statute of limitations by simple procedure. Litigation must end somewhere (interest reipublice ut sit finis litium). Equity aids the vigilant, not the indolent.

[5] Justice Story well observed that it has often been a matter of regret, in modern times, that, in the construction of the statute of limitations (21 Jac. 1, c. 16), the decisions had not proceeded upon principles better adapted to carry into effect the real objects of the statute; that, instead of being viewed in an unfavorable light as an unjust and discreditable defense, it had not received such support as would have made it what it was intended to be, emphatically a statute of repose. It is a wise and beneficial law, not designed merely to deprive any one of his just rights by lapse of time, but to afford security against stale demands. The possession of the land by defendant Nathan Barefoot was, in law, notice of his claim. Tankard v. Tankard, 79 N. C. 54.

And as to the maxim that the law aids the vigilant and not those who sleep over their rights, Sir Wm. Blackstone said that, in all possessory actions, there is a time of limitation settled, beyond which no man shall avail himself of the possession of himself or his ancestors, or take advantage of the wrongful possession of his adversary; for, if he be unreasonably negligent, the law refuses afterwards to lend him any assistance to recover the possession, both with a view to punish his neglect, and also because it is presumed that the supposed wrongdoer has in such a length of time procured a legal title, otherwise he would sooner have been sued. And it was said by the Vice Chancellor, in Manby v. Bewick, 3 K. & J. 352, the Legislature has in this, as in every civilized country that has ever existed, thought fit to prescribe certain limitations of time, after which persons may suppose themselves to be in peaceable possession of their property and capable of transmitting the estates of which they are in possession, without any apprehension of the title being impugned by litigation in respect of former transactions.

[6] This is really ejectment, the remedy of cancellation being resorted to as ancillary, merely to the primary relief, or, in other words, it is in its essence a suit to remove a cloud, or obstruction out of the way of effectuating the main purpose, which is the recovery of the land. Against such a recovery the statute bars, for it is so expressly provided therein.

[7] The coverture of plaintiff will not avail her. Consol. Statutes, vol. 1, § 408, and note; Carter v. Reaves, 167 N. C. 131, 83 S. E. 248; Graves v. Howard, 159 N. C. 594, 75 S. E. 998, Ann. Cas. 1914C, 565.

We therefore conclude that plaintiffs were barred by the three-year statute, and also by adverse possession under color for seven years, as held by the court below.

No error.

(181 N. C. 75)

HARRIETT et al. v. HARRIETT et al.
(No. 169.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. March 16, 1921.)

1. Life estates §17—Life tenant believing he owned fee can recover for improvements.

While as a general rule a life tenant is not entitled to compensation from the remaindermen for the enhancement of the property by his improvements, a life tenant, or one holding under him, who was in possession of the property with a bona fide belief he owned the fee, can recover for improvements thereon which enhanced the value of the remainder.

2. Improvements §5(4)—Rents to which improver is entitled not offset against improvements.

The right of one in possession under a bona fide but mistaken belief he owned the fee to recover for the enhancement of the property by the improvements made by him is not to be abated by the rental value of the property during his possession, where he was rightfully in possession under the life tenant, so that he was entitled to the rents.

Appeal from Superior Court, Jones County; Connor, Judge.

Suit for partition by C. P. Harriett and another against M. N. Harriett and others. From a judgment distributing the proceeds of the consent sale which allowed to the named plaintiff the value of improvements made by him without abatement on account of the rents received, defendants appeal. No error.

This was a petition originally filed for actual partition, and by consent a sale of all the property was ordered and it was sold. Enough of the proceeds of the sale was left in the clerk's office to protect the matters involved in this appeal which arise upon a petition by the plaintiff for betterments.

James Harriett was the father of plaintiffs and defendants, and died in 1877, leaving a widow, Mary E. Harriett, who died in 1917, and the plaintiffs and defendants are their only descendants as heirs at law and devisees.

Ames L. Simmons, who was then the owner, conveyed the lands known as the "home place" to James Harriett prior to his death in fee simple by description that included more than 100 acres, which was the quantity intended to be conveyed, and after James Harriett's death, while his children were young, Simmons executed to Mary E. Harriett, the widow and mother of the children, a deed purporting to convey in fee simple the 100 acres known as the home place, being 100 acres cut out of the original boundary in the deed from Simmons to James Harriett. After the deed was made to Mary E. Harriett, she occupied the land up to the bounds set out in the deed to her, and Ames L. Simmons and his descendants occupied the remainder of the land in the James Harriett deed.

James Harriett left a will duly probated, devising the said 100 acres to his wife, Mary E., during her natural life, and then to her children. In 1904 plaintiff under an arrangement with Mary E. Harriett went on the land, and from 1905 to 1914, ten years, occupied the land, and he or his mother had the rents and profits thereof. In 1908 his mother made him a deed and delivered it to him under an agreement that it was not to be registered until after her death, and plaintiff kept possession of it till it was taken from his safe after he left the home place in 1914. The plaintiff and the defendants thought up to the time of Mary E. Harriett's death that she owned the land in fee simple. It is admitted, however, that she only owned a life estate and the remainder, subject to her life estate, was in the plaintiff and defendants.

It is alleged in the petition that the plaintiff made valuable improvements upon the land which enhanced its value under the honest belief that he would be the owner of the land upon the death of his mother.

The jury returned the following verdict:

"(1) Did plaintiff while making improvements on land described in petition have a well-grounded belief that he was the owner of the land in fee, subject to the life estate of his mother? Answer: Yes.

"(2) Was plaintiff, while making improvements on land described in the complaint, a tenant in common with defendants of said land, subject to the life estate of his mother? Answer: Yes.

"(3) In what sum, if any, was the value of the said land enhanced at the death of Mary Harriett in June, 1917, by such permanent improvements as were made during her life by plaintiff? Answer: $1,780.

"(4) What was the clear annual value of the land during the time plaintiff was in possession of same, exclusive of the use of improvements made by plaintiff? Answer: $125 per year."

Judgment was entered upon the verdict in favor of the plaintiff allowing him the value of the improvements assessed by the jury without abatement on account of the rents, and the defendants excepted and appealed, assigning the following errors:

"(1) In refusing to direct the jury to answer the first issue, 'No.'

"(2) In refusing to charge the jury: 'If you believe the evidence, you should answer the first issue, "No."'

"(3) In the submission of the first issue to the jury.

"(4) In the submission of the second issue to the jury.

"(5) In the submission of the third issue to the jury.

"(6) In not setting aside the verdict.

"(7) In not signing the judgment tendered that the defendants go without day.

"(8) In signing the judgment set out in the record.

"(9) In refusal to credit the $1,780 found on the third issue with the $1,250 for the ten years' rental at $125 per year found under the fourth issue.

"(10) In not crediting on the $1,780 found on the third issue with rent at the rate of $125 per year from the beginning of the year 1905 to the date of Exhibit A, May 23, 1908.

"(11) For that the judgment as rendered did not deduct from the $1,780 found on the third issue ^{7180/15375} of $1,780, being the pro rata part of the land other than the home place of the unimproved value of the whole land."

Ward & Ward, of Newbern, for appellants.

W. D. McIver and R. A. Nunn, both of Newbern, for appellee.

ALLEN, J. The issues submitted to the jury are raised by the pleadings and are substantially like those approved in Pritchard v. Williams, 176 N. C. 110, 96 S. E. 733, and as there was evidence supporting the contention of the plaintiff that he made valuable improvements on the land, believing in good faith that he would own it in fee upon the death of his mother, under a deed executed by her, the court could not direct a verdict in favor of the defendants.

[1] The fact that there was an outstanding life estate in the plaintiff or in his mother is not a bar to the claim for betterments, since the plaintiff claimed under a deed and believed he owned the fee.

"It is the general rule that a life tenant is not entitled to compensation from the remainderman for the enhancement of the property by reason of his improvements, nor can a charge upon the lands or the inheritance be made for such improvements, it being generally held that a life tenant should not be permitted to consume the interest of the remainderman by making improvements that the remainderman cannot pay for, or that he does not desire, and also that improvements are made for the immediate benefit of the life estate, and usually without reference to the wishes of the remainderman. Mere knowledge on the part of the remainderman that improvements are being made and passive acquiescence therein are not sufficient to charge him with the cost thereof. An exception has been made where the life tenant is an infant, and the income from the property is by order of the court invested in permanent improvements. Ordinarily, a third person claiming under the life tenant is entitled to no greater rights than the life tenant himself, but some courts, applying equitable principles, have allowed recovery where improvements have been made by a person who, although in fact holding under a life tenant, believed himself to be the owner of the fee." 17 R. C. L., 635.

Our court has adopted the view allowing betterments to one holding under a life tenant when made under the honest, well-grounded belief that he owns the fee. Pritchard v.

Williams, supra, and the same case at this term.

The cases upon the right of a life tenant to compensation for improvements are collected in the note to Porter v. Osmun, 3 Ann. Cas. 689.

This disposes of the first, second, third, fourth, and fifth assignments of error; the sixth, seventh, and eighth are formal; and the ninth, tenth, and eleventh present the question of the right of the defendants to set off against the improvements the rents and profits of the land during the occupancy by the plaintiff.

[2] The usual rule is undoubtedly that one claiming betterments is chargeable with the rents, even beyond the three years, as an offset against a recovery for the improvements (Con. Stat. § 700; Whitfield v. Boyd, 158 N. C. 453, 74 S. E. 452); but this is because generally the owner of the land at the time of its recovery also owns the rents, and the law gives to each what belongs to him. It awards to the owner the land and his rents, and to the occupant the value of his improvements; but in this case the owners were not entitled to the rents during the occupancy by the plaintiff, because of the life estate in his mother or in the son, one of whom was the owner of the rents, and consequently there can be no abatement of the recovery for the improvements in favor of the defendants on account of the rents, to which they have no claim or right.

It is upon this principle that the rights of the parties were adjusted in Pritchard v. Williams, which is also reported in 175 N. C. 319, 95 S. E. 570, and 178 N. C. 444, 101 S. E. 85.

No error.

DERRICK v. SOVEREIGN CAMP, W. O. W.
(No. 10573.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Feb. 28, 1921.)

Insurance ¶697—Sovereign Camp held liable in tort for injuries to new member during initiation.

Subordinate lodges of the Woodmen of the World are agents of the Sovereign Camp in initiating and making members of the order, and the acts of a subordinate camp are binding upon the Sovereign Camp, even though such acts are not authorized by the Sovereign Camp, and the Sovereign Camp may be liable in damages in tort for injuries sustained, both compensatory and punitive.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Saluda County; S. W. G. Shipp, Judge.

Action by James P. Derrick against the Sovereign Camp of the Woodmen of the World. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Metton & Belser, of Columbia, and E. W. Able, of Saluda, for appellant.

B. W. Crouch, C. J. Ramage, and J. D. Griffith, all of Saluda, for respondent.

WATTS, J. This is an action in damages in tort for injury sustained by plaintiff in course of initiation by Delmar Camp of the Sovereign Camp of the Woodmen of the World. The cause was tried before Judge Shipp and a jury, for the fall term of court, 1919, for Saluda county, and resulted in a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $1,000 actual damages and $500 punitive damages. After entry of judgment defendant appeals, and by exceptions raises the point "whether the Sovereign Camp of the Woodmen of the World is to be held responsible for injuries inflicted by members of a subordinate camp, during the performance of a ceremony, in no way authorized or prescribed by the Sovereign Camp."

Appellant insists the Sovereign Camp is not responsible: First, because the evidence shows that the Sovereign Camp did not authorize the "warm reception," during the performance of which the injury occurred; second, because as a matter of law the Sovereign Camp cannot be held responsible for the acts of members of a subordinate camp, done in the course of a ceremony, which the Sovereign Camp has not authorized.

It has been decided in Mitchell v. Leach, 89 S. C. 420, 48 S. E. 290, 66 L. R. A. 723, 104 Am. St. Rep. 811, that subordinate lodges of the Woodmen of the World are agents of the Sovereign Camp, in initiating and making members of the order, and the acts of the local camps are binding upon the parent camp, if performed within the scope of the agency, even though such acts are not authorized by the Sovereign Camp. In 31 Cyc. 1582, we find the following:

"The liability of the principal for torts committed by his agent is not limited to torts which he expressly authorized or directed. He is liable for all torts which his agent commits in the actual or apparent course of his employment, and if the agent commits a tort in the apparent course of his employment, the principal is liable therefor, even though he was ignorant thereof, and the agent in committing it exceeds his actual authority or disobeyed the express instructions of his principal."

To the same end inferentially see what Mr. Justice Gary (now Chief Justice) says in Williams v. Tolbert, 76 S. C. 217, 56 S. E. 903, and cases therein cited.

The exceptions are overruled, and judgment affirmed.

GARY, O. J., and FRASER, J., -concur.

COTHRAN, J. (concurring). I concur in the result, and file this opinion simply from an apprehension that the principles announced in the main opinion may be invoked in cases not parallel with the exceptional circumstances of this case.

Mr. Justice WATTS declares that the injury complained of was sustained by the plaintiff "in the course of initiation by Delmar Camp." The record, however, shows that the initiation proper, according to the ritual prescribed by the Sovereign Camp, had been fully completed at the July meeting, a month before the August meeting at which the side degree was conferred.

If the statement referred to was entirely accurate, the case of Mitchell v. Leach, 89 S. C. 420, 48 S. E. 290, 66 L. R. A. 723, 104 Am. St. Rep. 811, would be absolutely controlling, and no further remark would be necessary. The fact that the injury sustained was received after the initiation had been completed and at a subsequent meeting, during the conferring of a side degree, not a part of or connected with the prescribed ceremony of initiation, differentiates the case at bar from the Mitchell Case, and in my opinion calls for special notice.

I do not think that there can be disagreement as to this proposition: Where the initiation ceremonies are fully completed and the initiate understands that the fantastic "stunts" in which he is to become the principal actor are not a part of the initiation ceremonies, that he is at liberty to participate in them or not as he pleases, but he is willing to assume for the time being the role of "the goat" in order to qualify himself to enjoy the discomfiture of the next victim, neither the local camp nor the Sovereign Camp would be responsible for injuries received thereby, but that his remedy would be against those alone who may have instituted that species of amusement. But there are exceptional circumstances in this case which in my opinion fix liability upon the Sovereign Camp and induce my concurrence in the judgment. It would be an interesting inquiry ordinarily, and quite material to the issue, whether the side degree was conferred by Delmar Camp as a lodge, or by the individual members for their own amusement without the authority of the local camp. We are relieved of this inquiry, however, by the argument of the appellant's attorneys. They say:

"It must be noted that the institution of this ceremony was a distinct and regular performance of the local camp; it originated in this camp; it was held in a regular way; * * * there were regularly appointed members of the camp who carried through this ceremony; * * * distinctly the exercise of a power."

Both exceptions refer to the side degree as the "action of the subordinate lodge." So that question is no longer open to inquiry. Whatever was done was the act of the local camp, and not of individual members.

In the disposition of this appeal the court must assume to be true the following statement of the plaintiff: At the July meeting when he received what now appears to have been a full initiation, he was told by the officers of the camp who conducted the initiation "to come back; that there was another one coming." "They said they wanted me back next meeting night; that they had some more degrees." He did return to the August meeting. The lodge was duly opened by the Consul Commander. After the lodge was opened, he was carried out to the ante-room and prepared for the side degree. He was then taken into the lodgeroom, and the degree conferred, during which he received the injury of which he complained.

The plaintiff of course did not know of what the initiation consisted, or that it was fully completed at the July meeting; naturally, from the directions to return for the August meeting to receive other degrees, he supposed that it was not. It does not appear that he knew that he was called upon to go through a performance for the amusement of the lodge, or that he had any other conception than that it was a deferred part of the initiation ceremony. It was conferred, according to plaintiff's statement, just after the lodge was opened and while it was in session.

Now as to the law applicable to these facts: The case of Mitchell v. Leech, 69 S. C. 413, 48 S. E. 290, 66 L. R. A. 723, cited in the opinion, settles the principle that a subordinate lodge is the agent of the parent organization, which is responsible in damages for the tortious act of its agent done within the scope of its agency, and that maltreatment of a candidate during the ceremony of initiation is within such scope, although the particular "stunt" he was required to perform or the instrumentality employed was not prescribed by the parent organization. "The subordinate lodges were the agents of the Sovereign Camp; the acts of the local camps were binding upon the parent camp if performed within the scope of the agency, even though not authorized by the Sovereign Camp." 69 S. C. 421, 48 S. E. 292, 66 L. R. A. 723. To the same effect see Hutchinson v. Real Estate Co., 65 S. C. 75, 43 S. E. 295; and in Reynolds v. Witte, 13 S. C. 5, 36 Am. Rep. 678, it is thus expressed at page 16 of 13 S. C. (36 Am. Rep. 678):

"The proper enquiry is, whether the act was done in the course of the agency and by virtue of the authority as agent."

The expressions "scope of the agency," "course of the agency," "course of the employment," are practically synonymous, and they include all acts within the apparent scope of the authority conferred on the agents by the principal, as well as those expressly authorized or necessarily implied from express authority; all acts within the scope of the authority which the principal held the agents out to the world to possess. 21 R. C. L. §§ 34, 81. Considering that the Sovereign Camp alone had the power to prescribe the initiation ceremonies, that the local camp had no authority to depart from the ceremonial ritual, it follows that the local camp had no actual or implied authority to put on the side degree entertainment. But that is not conclusive of the question. The further inquiry must be answered: Was it within the apparent scope of its authority?

It was to the interest of the Sovereign Camp that new members be received; their introduction is the life blood of all such organizations. The election and initiation of them is confided by the Sovereign Camp to the local camp. In such initiation the local camp was "about the business" of its master. They proceeded to attend to that business; the plaintiff put his person at their disposition; suffered himself to be hoodwinked; was put through a series of ceremonials of which he was, of course, uninformed. How could he know that they had finished with him without being so told? What other inference could he draw than that they had not, when told to return in August for more degrees? That it was within the apparent scope of their authority is shown by his implicit obedience to that authority.

If as a matter of fact the side degree was not a part of the initiation, the plaintiff unquestionably was justified in thinking that it was. This presents a case of apparent authority, which is equivalent to actual authority, and so comes within the principle of the Mitchell Case.

The purpose of this opinion is to limit my concurrence to the facts of this particular case.

WELLS v. HOLMAN. (No. 10585.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. March 12, 1921.)

Discovery ¶89—Plaintiff can inspect books of operations necessary to determine his share in resulting profits.

Where it was admitted that plaintiff had a right under a contract to a share in the farming and mercantile operations of defendant for specified years, he is entitled to an order permitting him to inspect such books and papers in the possession of the defendant or under his control which show the net profits of defendant from such transactions.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Sumter County; Mendel L. Smith, Special Judge.

Action by F. A. Wells against Dr. F. K. Holman. From an order granting plaintiff the right to inspect certain books of the defendant, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

The order referred to in the opinion was as follows:

This order is passed pursuant to a motion duly noted and made before me on behalf of the plaintiff, who seeks to procure an inspection and copy, or permission to take a copy, of the books, papers, and documents in the possession of or under the control of the defendant, the same being those kept by the defendant showing the farming operations and the mercantile operations, the storage and sale of cotton which was raised or purchased during the years 1914 and 1915. After hearing argument for and against this motion, I am convinced that in the exercise of my discretion the said motion should be granted.

It is therefore ordered that the defendant, F. K. Holman, do, within five days from the date of this order, give to the attorneys for the plaintiff an inspection and copy, or the opportunity and permission to take a copy, of such books, documents, and papers as are in the possession of or under the control of the defendant, or his attorney, that show the farming operations and the mercantile operations out of which the plaintiff was to have a percentage of the net profits for the years 1914 and 1915, including such as show the sales and other disposition of the produce raised and purchased in connection with said farming and mercantile transactions for said years; in other words, both the complaint and answer having alleged that the plaintiff was to have a certain percentage from the net profits from the farming operations and mercantile operations, including the net profits realized from the share croppers and from the purchase and sale of cotton for the years 1914 and 1915, I hold that the plaintiff is entitled to such inspection of the books, documents, and papers made by or for the defendant in the ordinary course of such farming and mercantile operations, showing the facts and figures upon which a settlement between them would necessarily be based, and not such papers as would be of a purely private nature, but rather those partaking of the nature of mutual entries of account showing the items necessarily relevant in a bona fide settlement between the parties.

The second part of the motion with regard to any possible refusal of the defendant to comply with this order will not be passed upon now, as I hold it would more properly come up when some exigency demands it.

Marion W. Seabrook, of Sumter, for appellant.

Raymon Schwartz and Epps & Levy, all of Sumter, for respondent.

GARY, C. J. For the reasons assigned by his honor the circuit judge, the order made by him is affirmed.

WATTS and FRASER, JJ., concur.

COTHRAN, J. I concur in the judgment affirming the order of the circuit judge, but, as the appeal raises squarely the issue whether or not the documentary evidence to an inspection of which a moving party may be entitled under section 427 of the Code is limited to such as the adverse party expects to use on the trial of the case, and does not include such as the moving party may desire to obtain from his adversary for his own use, I think that this issue should be determined.

In the case of Cartee v. Spence, 24 S. C. 550, the court throws out a very strong intimation that it is so limited, but declines specifically to decide the question. So in Jenkins v. Bennett, 40 S. C. 393, 18 S. E. 929, and Parker v. Railroad Co., 48 S. C. 384, 26 S. E. 669, the doubt suggested in Cartee v. Spence was not resolved, but passed over as not being involved, all these opinions having been written by the same great judge (Chief Justice McIver). No subsequent case has been found by me or pointed out by counsel.

Even an intimation from so profound an authority would incline me to follow it almost without question, if it were not so opposed to my preconceived conviction of the purpose of the section, the very terms of the section, and the numerous authorities upon the subject. The question is an important one of practice, and I think it should be settled in view of the doubts suggested in the cases above cited.

In the first place, the terms of the section impose no limitation upon the character of the documentary evidence other than "containing evidence relating to the merits of the action or the defense therein." This is extremely broad, and covers not only evidence which the adversary may expect to use in his interest, but such as the moving party may desire to obtain in his interest. It must be assumed that the exercise of the discretion lodged in the circuit judge will prevent an abuse of this privilege in an attempt to embark upon a "fishing excursion" or to pry into the private concerns of the adversary.

It is manifestly in the interest of a determination of a controversy according to the justice and right of the matter; it works against surprise; it is conducive to that preparation of a case which insures dispatch in the conduct of the litigation and an intelligent disposition of the real points of controversy.

The particular controversy between these parties demonstrates the utility of the proceeding. Here is an admitted contract covering extensive farming operations, the compensation of the plaintiff to be determined upon the basis of net profits; all record evidence of these operations is in the hands of the defendant; it is essential to the plaintiff's interest that he have access to these records.

That the applicant was under the circumstances entitled to the order is established by the following authorities:

"He is entitled to production or inspection only when the same is material and necessary to establish his cause of action." 14 Cyc. 370.

"A production or inspection of papers will be granted where the applicant has an interest or right in them which justifies an unlimited inspection and the right is the attendant of the relief to which he is entitled. This is the case with books * * * of an employer at the instance of his employee, where the employee is to be paid by a percentage of the business done by the employer, or of books showing the profits of a joint venture, at the instance of one of the parties interested therein. In all such cases the production of all books and documents can be compelled on the ground of common interest." 14 Cyc. 369; 18 C. J. 1117, 1119.

"The remedy can be granted only to obtain the disclosure of facts or the production of documents in his adversary's knowledge or possession or under his control, which are material and necessary to make out his own case"—that is, the appellant's. 9 R. C. L. 174.

The ruling is the opposite of the intimation in Cartee v. Spence, supra, and is emphasized by the immediately following declaration:

"The right does not extend to a discovery of * * * evidence which relates exclusively to the adverse party's case."

DIRECTOR GENERAL OF RAILROADS v. CHANDLER.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
March 17, 1921.)

1. Evidence ⇨407(2)—Bill of lading prima facie evidence that carrier received goods, but may be rebutted.

Bill of lading constitutes prima facie evidence of fact that carrier received goods recited therein, but this evidence may be rebutted.

2. Carriers ⇨52(1)—No recovery from carrier under bill of lading where goods were never delivered to carrier.

Where plaintiff purchased potatoes and directed seller to bill them in his name from point of shipment to him at destination and on delivery of bill of lading paid for the potatoes, he could not recover from the carrier for loss of the potatoes, where no potatoes were ever delivered to the carrier under the bill of lading, the carrier's agent, due to the fact that seller, who operated on a large scale, presented to him for signature a number of bills of lading purporting to cover an equal number of carload shipments, all of which were signed at the same time, agent failing to detect the error in checking the bills; the recitals of the bill of lading in no way estopping the carrier from showing the true facts.

Error to Circuit Court, Northampton County.

Notice of motion for judgment brought by J. W. Chandler against the Director General of Railroads operating the New York, Philadelphia & Norfolk Railroad. Verdict and judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Mears & Mears, of Eastville, and Geo. R. Allen, of Philadelphia, Pa., for plaintiff in error.

J. Brooks Mapp, of Keller, for defendant in error.

KELLY, P. This was a notice of motion for judgment brought by J. W. Chandler against the Director General operating the New York, Philadelphia & Norfolk Railroad. There was a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff, and the defendant assigns error.

On July 6, 1918, Chandler purchased from Louis Distributing Company, represented by and hereinafter called Louis, 199 barrels of Irish potatoes, supposed by Chandler to have been already loaded by Louis on a car of the New York, Philadelphia & Norfolk Railroad at Eastville, Va. At the time of such purchase nothing had been done with reference to billing the car for shipment, and no freight receipt or bill of lading had been requested of or issued by the railroad company. Chandler instructed Louis to have the car shipped from Chandler at Eastville to Chandler at Chicago, thus naming Chandler as both consignor and consignee; and Louis procured from the agent at Eastville a bill of lading accordingly, which he delivered on the same day to Chandler, and the latter thereupon paid Louis $965.15, the aggregate of the agreed price of $4.85 per barrel for the 199 barrels covered by the contract of purchase. The bill of lading recited that the 199 barrels had been delivered to the railroad company. The plaintiff's notice of motion expressly states that the amount sued for is claimed on account of "loss of one carload of Irish potatoes containing 199 barrels shipped by me from Eastville, Va., on July 6, 1918, to myself at Chicago, Ill.," and that "this carload of potatoes had been bought by me from Louis Distributing Company"; and, while the plaintiff further says in the notice that Louis delivered to him the railroad company's original bill of lading covering the shipment, and that the plaintiff accepted the same in good faith and paid cash therefor, it is clear beyond debate, from the allegations and the proof, that what the plaintiff did was to buy a carload of potatoes from Louis at an agreed price, authorize and instruct him to ship the same in plaintiff's name to Chicago, and then settle with Louis upon presentation of the bill of lading, treating that document as evidence that the contract of purchase and the incidental instructions had been complied with by Louis. The plaintiff was dealing with Louis so far as the purchase was concerned, and the bill of lading, when tendered to and signed by the defendant, purported to represent the property of Chandler and not the property of Louis. The plaintiff, therefore, was both in form and substance the shipper, and had clearly made Louis his agent in regard to the shipment. The bill of lading was signed for the company by its agent, and for the plaintiff by Louis, and these facts appeared on the bill when delivered to and accepted by the plaintiff.

As a matter of fact, it developed that the goods recited in the bill of lading were never delivered to the carrier. This is not conceded by the plaintiff's counsel, but it is, as we view the evidence, clearly proved. Although another car number was used in the notice of motion, there is no dispute about the fact that the claim is made on account of the contents of a certain car, known as S. A. L. No. 24053. It is shown that this car, containing 199 barrels Irish potatoes, had been already billed out by Louis on July 1, 1918, to another party at another destination, and had gone forward before the bill of lading in this case was issued. The mistake, so far as the defendant's agent was concerned, was due to the fact that Louis, who seems to have operated on a large scale, presented to him for signature on July 6th a number of bills of lading purporting to cover an equal number of carload shipments, including the one here involved, all of which were signed at the same time. The agent failed to detect the error in checking the bills that day, but made the discovery later.

[1] Of course, the bill of lading constituted prima facie evidence of the fact that the carrier had received the goods recited therein; but this evidence was conclusively rebutted by the testimony of the agent. It is true that on cross-examination he said that he did not bring with him to the trial the records of the defendant showing the facts above detailed, particularly with reference to the movement of S. A. L. car No. 24053, but he was not asked to produce them, and there was no objection to his testimony on that account. A careful examination of his evidence leaves no room to contend that any goods at all were delivered to the carrier under the bill of lading in question.

[2] The case, therefore, is simply one in which a shipper is suing the carrier to recover for loss of goods which were never delivered for carriage. As between such parties and under such a state of facts there can be no recovery, the recitals of the bill of lading in no way estopping the carrier from showing the true facts. These propositions are so well settled and so obviously sound and just that we need not recite authority for their support.

Having reached this conclusion, we need not consider the further contention of the defendant that, even if the plaintiff could claim to be a third party holding the bill of lading as a bona fide assignee for value, the fact that no goods had actually been delivered to the carrier would still defeat the liability. The decisions of various state courts are in conflict upon this question. See 4 R. C. L. pp. 25, 26, § 29, and cases cited in notes 8 and 9; 6 Cyc. 419, and notes 96 and 98. The federal courts have heretofore uniformly held with the contention of the defendant. See R. O. L. supra, and note 7; Cyc., supra, and note 97; Friedlander v. Texas, etc., R. Co., 130 U. S. 416, 9 Sup. Ct. 570, 32 L. Ed. 991. Being an interstate bill of lading, the rule in the federal court would, in the absence of statute, perhaps control. By act of Congress now, however, the rule seems to have been materially modified. See Barnes' Fed. Code (1919) § 7999; Act August 29, 1916, c. 415, 39 Stat. 542, § 22 (U. S. Comp. St. § 8604kk).

Nor is it necessary to pass upon the errors assigned in respect to the instructions given and refused by the trial court. That court seems to have intended to hold as we do upon the law of the case, for it gave a number of instructions for the defendant plainly telling the jury that the plaintiff would not recover if the potatoes were not delivered to the carrier, and yet it gave one instruction for the plaintiff squarely in conflict with that proposition. If the facts as to the delivery to the carrier were such as to take the case to the jury upon that point, the judgment would have to be reversed for this irreconcilable conflict in the instructions. We are of opinion, however, that the facts as to delivery to the carrier were fully developed from plaintiff's standpoint; that the carrier was conclusively shown not to have received the goods; and that therefore the plaintiff is not entitled to recover anything. We shall therefore not remand the cause for a new trial, but shall reverse the judgment complained of, and, pursuant to section 6365 of the Code, enter final judgment in this court for the defendant.

Reversed.

LEVY, Director of Public Welfare, v. KOSMO.

SAME v. MANGIGIAN et al.

(Nos. 1, 2.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. March 17, 1921.)

1. Appeal and error \S 781(7)—Execution of leases sought by mandamus held to have rendered controversy moot.

Appeals from orders, granting petitions in mandamus to require respondent to assess rentals on market property under the ordinance and to give petitioners their preference right to lease such premises, involve only moot questions, where it appears that respondent had conformed to the orders by executing the leases sought by petitioners.

2. Appeal and error \S 843(2)—Court will not construe lease where lessees are not parties.

On appeal in mandamus proceeding to compel a city official to lease market property to petitioners, which had become moot by the execution of the leases sought for, the court will not construe other leases of the same property executed by respondent with other lessees who were not parties to the proceedings.

Error to Law and Equity Court of City of Richmond.

Separate petitions by Bill Mangigian and others and by Aristea Kosmo against E. C. Levy, Director of Public Welfare of the City of Richmond. From orders granting the prayer of the petition in each case, the respondent brings error. Appeals dismissed.

These are both cases of petitions of the defendants in error to the court below praying for writs of mandamus to be issued requiring the plaintiff in error to assess the rental for the year 1920 of the two stores (one involved in the one case and one involved in the other), located at the southern end of the meat market (also known as "First Market"), facing on Main street, in said city (both unnumbered, but the store involved in case No. 1 being known and designated in the record as "Stall 101 in the First Market" and also as "Store A," and the store involved in case No. 2 being known and designated in the record as "Stall No. 100 in the First Market" and also as "Store B"), as provided for in section 14 of chapter 29 of Richmond City Code 1910, and to comply with the provisions of such section regarding the posting of the assessment in a conspicuous place, and for general relief.

The proceedings in the respective cases were instituted, matured for hearing, and heard at different times in the court below, but as they involve practically the same questions they were submitted to be and are heard and considered together on appeal.

The plaintiff in error is hereinafter referred to as the respondent, and the defendants in error as plaintiffs in the respective cases, in accordance with their positions as parties in the court below.

Case No. 1 was instituted and matured for hearing in the court below on December 30, 1919, and on that day such court entered one of the orders assigned as error in that case by the respondent. That order granted the prayer of the petition in such case, the substance of which is above set forth, with respect to the store therein involved, namely, it ordered the respondent to proceed "to assess the rental value of Stall No. 101 in the First Market for the year 1920, to post said assessment, and to give to the relator the preference for the renewal of her present lease for said stall for the year 1920 at the rental value so assessed."

It appears from the record in case No. 1 that the respondent on December 30, 1919, complied with the requirements of the order just mentioned in every particular, by assessing the rental for the store known as "Stall No. 101" for the year 1920 at $1,750, payable monthly in advance, by having the clerk of the First Market post a copy of the assessment in said market, and a copy of such notice was sent by respondent to counsel of record for the plaintiff in case No. 1, thereby giving her the preference for the renewal of her then present lease, all in accordance with the prayer of her petition and with the said order of court.

Subsequently, on January 8, 1920, the respondent filed a supplemental answer to the petition in case No. 1, and moved the court to rehear the case. This motion the court overruled and the action of court below in overruling such motion is also assigned as error in such case.

Case No. 2 was instituted and matured for hearing in the court below on January 10, 1920; and on that day such court entered an order granting the prayer of the petition in such case in precisely the same language as that employed in the above-mentioned order of December 30, 1919, in case No. 1, in granting the prayer of the petition in that case (which language is above quoted), even in the particular of referring to the store involved as "Stall No. 101." The latter reference was, however, manifestly a typographical error, "Stall 100" being intended; the order being so construed in effect by the appeal of respondent complaining of it as applicable to "Stall 100," that being the store involved in case No. 2.

The following mentioned peculiar situation of fact is developed by and shown in the records, which does not appear to have been brought to the attention of or to have appeared in any way before the court below in case No. 2 at the time the order was entered therein just mentioned, nor in case

No. 1 at the time the order was entered therein on January 8, 1920, aforesaid.

On December 30, 1919, at the same time he complied with the requirements of the order of that date in case No. 1, as aforesaid, respondent did precisely the same things in all particulars for the benefit of the plaintiffs in case No. 2 with respect to the store involved in that case, and left no doubt as to that, for the notice posted in the market as aforesaid on December 30, 1919, is dated that day and is as follows:

"Rental for the two stores at the southern end of the Meat Market, facing on Main street, has been assessed for the year 1920 at $1,750.00 each, payable monthly, in advance." (Italics supplied.)

"Application for the rental of these stores must be made in writing on or before January 1, 1920.

"As these stores are unnumbered the eastern one of these stores is hereby designated as 'Store A' and the western one is hereby designated as 'Store B.' Applicants will conform to the above designations in submitting their applications. Bond for the amount of the lease will be required as part of the lease.

"All applications shall be addressed to Dr. E. C. Levy, Director of Public Safety, Room 408, City Hall.

"[Signed] E. C. Levy,
"Director of Public Welfare."

A copy of this notice was sent counsel of record for the plaintiffs in case No. 2 (as well as to counsel of record for the plaintiff in case No. 1, as aforesaid), with the following at the foot of it:

"For your information I am sending you this copy of the notice which I have had the clerk of the First Market post in said market, in accordance with section 14, chapter 29, Richmond City Code 1910, and in accordance with the opinion and choice of the city attorney.

"[Signed] E. C. Levy."

It is stated in the reply brief for them that the plaintiffs in both case No. 1 and case No. 2 "agreed to lease the stalls at the price fixed by the plaintiff in error, and written leases were entered into between plaintiff in error and defendants in error for the year 1920."

Respondent, by counsel, admits the correctness of this statement of fact, but takes the position that a question involved in these cases still remains undetermined, which is as follows:

It appears from the record in case No. 1 that, by written lease dated November 28, 1919, the said respondent demised both of the stores above mentioned to Dick Papazian and N. E. Darhanian, for the term of one year, commencing on January 1, 1920, and ending on December 31, 1920, with a provision in the lease:

"That a notice of ninety days, in writing only, from either party to the other shall be necessary to terminate this lease at the end of said term, or at the end of any renewal or continuance thereof."

And in the supplemental brief for the respondent this position is taken:

"By reason of this situation it is claimed that should the judgment of the [court below] be reversed, the said lessees would be entitled to 90 days' notice of the termination of said lease, from which it is clear that should the proceedings be dismissed on the ground that the question that the record now presents is a moot question, and therefore need not be determined, the plaintiff in error desires to bring to the attention of the court, and have determined the question as to whether he would be compelled to recognize the validity of the lease, which by its express terms gave to the lessees the right to occupy the premises in question for and during the year 1921; no notice having been given by the plaintiff in error of the cessation of said lease on the 31st day of December, 1920."

No issue was made as to this matter by the pleadings before the court below, and the lessees here mentioned are not parties to either of these cases, nor before the appellate court in any way.

The following should also be stated:

It appears from the supplemental brief for the respondent that, on December 17, 1920, the aforesaid section 14 of chapter 29 of Richmond City Code 1910 was so changed as to be no longer operative, and so that any subsequent rental of the stores involved in these cases will be controlled by the new city ordinance on the subject, the construction of which is not involved in such cases.

Ordway Puller, E. V. Farinholt, and H. R. Pollard, all of Richmond, for plaintiff in error.

T. Gray Haddon, of Richmond, for defendants in error.

SIMS, J. (after stating the facts as above).

[1] As appears from the statement above, the respondent executed the leases for the year 1920, the preference of privilege of obtaining which was sought by the respective petitions of the plaintiffs in both of the cases before us, which constituted the sole subject of the orders of the court below under review, and that hence there is no longer any actual controversy between the parties to these cases over the matters in issue involved in the appeals. The cases, therefore, present merely a moot question for our decision so far as the parties to these cases are concerned. Hamer v. Commonwealth, 107 Va. 636, 637, 638, 59 S. E. 400; Mills v. Green, 159 U. S. 651, 16 Sup. Ct. 132, 40 L. Ed. 293; Garrett v. Smead, 121 Va. 390, 93 S. E. 628; note in Ann. Cas. 1912C, p. 247. Further,

[2] It would seem from the facts shown in the above statement that, prior to the time the leases aforesaid were made to the plaintiffs in the cases before us, a lease of the same property was made by respondent to two other parties, namely, one Dick Papazian and one N. E. Darbanian, and we are asked to construe a certain provision in that lease. But these lessees were not parties in the court below to either of the cases before us, and no issue was made by the pleadings in either case in the court below involving that subject. It is therefore plain that any decision we might make on these appeals with respect to the proper construction of the provision of the lease just mentioned could not be carried into effect against the lessees last mentioned. Such a decision would be merely an opinion upon a moot question not in issue in the cases before us.

The appeals in both cases must therefore be Dismissed.

KELLEY et al. v. THOMPSON et al.
(No. 4160.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Feb. 15, 1921. Rehearing Denied
March 29, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Equity §130—Judgment §460(1)—Caption does not determine nature of bill; bill to annul decree for fraud considered original bill.

A bill to annul a decree for fraud in its procurement, filed after the adjournment of the term at which it was entered, will be construed as an original bill, although in its caption it describes itself as a bill in the nature of a bill of review.

2. Judgment §460(1)—Essentials of bill to set aside decree for fraud stated.

A bill to set aside a decree for fraud must state the decree, and the proceedings which led to it, with the circumstances of fraud on which it is impeached.

3. Appeal and error §1178(8)—Costs §238(2)—Equity §241—Decree sustaining demurrer should grant leave to amend, and on reversal leave will be granted; costs denied appellant for failure to raise question in lower court.

A decree, sustaining a demurrer to a bill deemed insufficient generally, should grant leave to amend before dismissing it, and, if upon appeal the bill appears to be amendable, the decree will be reversed, and the cause remanded, with leave to amend, but without costs to appellant; he not having asked permission to cure the defect.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Randolph County.

Suit by F. P. Kelley and others against John Thompson and others. Decree for defendants on demurrer, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed, demurrer sustained with leave to amend, and cause remanded.

W. B. & E. L. Maxwell, of Elkins, for appellants.

A. M. Cunningham, of Parsons, for appellees.

LYNCH, J. [1-3] The decree whose correctness is challenged upon this appeal sustained defendants' demurrer to the bill and dismissed it without granting leave to amend, and held the bill unamendable. Upon its face and by its prayer the pleading purports to be a bill in the nature of a bill of review, though formally it is an original bill filed to annul the decree entered in the suit of John Thompson against F. W. Smith and his wife, Creed Isner, trustee, F. P. Kelley and J. H. Lawson; Kelley and Lawson being plaintiffs in the bill so dismissed. Both suits brought in the same court had for their main purpose an adjudication of the true ownership of a 40 horse power furnace boiler, a 35 horse power engine, and a No. 4 Star feed grinder, the title to each of which is claimed by Thompson on the one part and by Kelley and Lawson on the other. Thompson, who was plaintiff in the first suit, based his right to the engine and boiler on a purchase by him and a loan of the property to the Smiths, to be used by them to furnish the necessary motive power for the operation of a grist and flouring mill owned by them in Randolph county, and to the feed grinder by a purchase by the Smiths and payment by Thompson of the purchase price therefor, and through a sale and purchase by him of the engine, boiler, and grinder at a sale by Isner, trustee, under the terms of a deed of trust executed by the Smiths to Isner covering the three items of property, the trust being to secure Thompson the return of the engine and boiler and the payment of the money so advanced by him to pay for the grinder.

The plaintiffs, Kelley and Lawson, who, together with Isner, the trustee, and the Smiths, were defendants in the Thompson suit, trace their title to the engine, boiler, and feed grinder to their purchase of the grist and flour mill, then owned by the Smiths, at a judicial sale authorized by decree of the same court entered in the suit of C. M. Hart against the Smiths and a man named Canfield, the engine, boiler, and feed grinder having, prior to the sale under the decree, been attached to or installed in and as a part of the mill, and operated in connection therewith by the Smiths. To the Hart-Canfield suit neither Thompson nor plaintiffs Kelley and Lawson were parties, but they were present when the sale was made and the mill property purchased by Kelley and Lawson, and, with the acquiescence or permission of Isner, who executed the decree of sale, Thompson publicly announced his ownership of the engine, boiler, and feed grinder, and accompanied the announcement with the expressed intention and purpose to enforce his lien on them under the trust to Isner, notwithstanding their attachment to the mill property, then about to be sold under the decree. This announcement Kelley and Lawson heard, as they admit, but they understood it only in a qualified sense, and not as broadly as the language used imports. The effect of the qualification need not be considered at this time, as we are dealing only with the demurrer. It is, however, important to note that the lien on the mill proper, enforced by the decree of sale entered, was superior in dignity and priority to that of Thompson under the deed of trust to Isner, because the first-mentioned lien antedated the second and existed long prior to the inception of the arrangement between the Smiths and Thompson, if there was such an arrangement.

To establish his right to enforce in his favor the lien under the terms of the deed of trust by the Smiths to Isner, Thompson brought his suit against them, Kelley and Lawson, and upon a full hearing on the merits of the controverted title to the engine, boiler, and feed grinder a decree, now questioned on the ground of fraudulent procurement, sustained Thompson's right to the property, and ordered it to be sold and the proceeds applied to the satisfaction of the liens and liability so secured. This order also appointed Isner to make the sale, and Thompson became the purchaser.

The specific ground alleged by plaintiffs in their bill for the annulment of that decree is the formation by Thompson and the Smiths of a conspiracy to defeat the right claimed by Kelley and Lawson by virtue of their purchase of the mill sold under the order of the court in the Hart-Canfield proceeding. In other words, the bill charges that Thompson and the Smiths combined to procure, and did procure, the decree in the suit of Thompson against the Smiths, Kelley and Lawson by perjury and false swearing, designed and effected by them to defraud Kelley and Lawson of their right and interest in the engine, boiler, and feed grinder.

Although not as certain and definite in its statements of the grounds of relief as a bill of the kind ordinarily should be, its allegations are not so far defective or objectionable as to warrant dismissal for that reason alone. If true, and for the purpose of the demurrer we must treat the allegations of the bill as true, they sufficiently charge, in general terms, the fraud relied on, and lack of knowledge and information on the part of the plaintiffs, Kelley and Lawson, until after the termination of the Thompson suit and the adjournment of the term at which the decree was entered and the sale under the deed of trust therein decreed, and their inability to ascertain and discover the fraud so perpetrated until a breach of the amicable relations theretofore existing between the Smiths and Thompson occurred, followed by litigation between them due to such breach, in which each charged the other with falsehood and perjury in the Thompson-Smith suit in respect to the true ownership of the engine, boiler, and feed grinder.

Although the bill filed by Kelley and Lawson may, and perhaps does, contain sufficient allegations concerning the unlawful combination and the perjury and false swearing thereby consummated, yet they are not as definite or as specific as they should be in that respect. They are somewhat vague and uncertain, and do not state with particularity how or in what respect the fraud practiced was the efficient cause for the decree complained of. Plaintiffs do not claim to have been surprised by the perjury, though they do say they did not know of it when it was committed, and not until long afterwards. Unless there was such surprise operating as a fraud, perjury is not a ground for a new trial or a rehearing or review, unless made so by statute, and there is in this state no legislation upon that subject. But surprise alone is not sufficient; it must be coupled with other facts and circumstances of sufficient weight to justify the belief that but for the false and fraudulent testimony the litigation might have terminated otherwise than it did. Such deception usually is chargeable to the misconduct of the litigant who prevails. As such it is one of the grounds of equitable cognizance. Anderson v. Woodford, 34 Va. (8 Leigh) 316, 327-328; Clark v. Sayres, 48 W. Va. 33, 35 S. E. 882; Bodkin v. Rollyson, 48 W. Va. 453, 37 S. E. 617; Plant v. Humphries, 66 W. Va. 88, 66 S. E. 94, 26 L. R. A. (N. S.) 558; Fulton v. Ramsey, 76 W. Va. 45, 49, 84 S. E. 1065; 14 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 739.

"If a decree has been obtained by fraud, it may be impeached by original bill, without the leave of the court; the fraud used in obtaining the decree being the principal point in issue, and necessary to be established by proof before the propriety of the decree can be investigated. * * * A bill to set aside a decree for fraud must state the decree, and the proceedings which led to it, with the circumstances of fraud on which it is impeached." 2 Daniell's Chancery Pl. & Pr. (6th Amer. Ed.) *1584, *1585; Prince v. McLemore, 108 Va. 269, 277, 61 S. E. 802.

Plaintiffs' bill, however, is not verified, nor is it accompanied by affidavits showing, or attempting to show, in what respect or to what extent there was perjury or false swearing on the part of the Smiths or Thompson, or in what way the fraud was perpetrated and accomplished the intended purpose. The bill also is equally at fault in this respect. These omissions are not fatal, but are curable by amendment. Though the defects are such as to render the pleading demurrable, the omission may be supplied, and for this reason the court should have granted plaintiffs leave to amend, instead of holding the bill unamendable.

There is not sufficient foundation for the motion of the appellee to dismiss this appeal as improvidently awarded, as it is predicated upon the conception that less than the jurisdictional amount is involved; in other words, that the grinder alone is the subject-matter of the litigation, and that its value is less than $100. In whomsoever may be the ownership of the engine and boiler, plaintiffs claim title thereto by purchase at the judicial sale mentioned, and the validity of their title is one of the matters adjudicated adversely to them in the Thompson suit, and it is from that decree that plaintiffs seek to purge the fraud alleged to have been committed by Thompson and the Smiths; wherefore the motion to dismiss is overruled.

For the several reasons given, our order will affirm the decree in so far as it sustains the demurrer, but reverse it in so far as it dismissed the bill, and remand the cause with leave to amend in the particulars mentioned, if plaintiffs be so advised, with direction, however, to re-enter the decree of dismissal if they do not elect to amend, but will not award appellants costs upon this appeal, as they did not pray for leave to amend; this, under the authority of Dickinson v. Foster, 81 W. Va. 739, and cases cited at page 743, 95 S. E. 196.

HOGAN et al. v. WARD et al. (No. 4071.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Feb. 15, 1921. Rehearing Denied
Mar. 29, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Partition —77(1)—When sale in partition proper stated.

Before there can be a sale of land in a partition suit, it must be ascertained and determined that partition cannot be conveniently made, and that the interests of those who are entitled to the land, or its proceeds, will be promoted by a sale thereof; but if the court, having jurisdiction of the land and of all parties interested therein, decree a sale of the land, without it appearing on the record that the interests of those entitled thereto will be promoted by the sale, the decree is erroneous, and not void.

2. Partition —77(4)—When prayer for general relief sufficient on which to base decree of sale stated.

In a suit for partition of lands where the bill does not pray for a sale if the partition cannot be conveniently made, and it appears in the proceedings that it is impracticable or impossible to make partition in kind, and that the welfare of the parties interested therein will be promoted by a sale, the prayer for general relief is sufficient pleading on which to base a decree of sale, especially where the rights of an innocent purchaser for value have intervened.

3. Partition —109(6)—Purchaser's title protected notwithstanding error in decree.

When real estate is sold in such partition suit, the record therein not showing that the interests of those entitled to same will be promoted by a sale, and is purchased by a party to the suit who did not in any way bring the property to sale, was not interested therein, and in no way induced the error, and the sale is confirmed without objection, his title is protected by section 8, chapter 132, of the Code (Code 1913, § 4942), notwithstanding the error in the decree.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Randolph County.

Action by William Darius Hogan and others against Wirt C. Ward and the West Virginia Pulp & Paper Company and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and the Paper Company and others appeal. Reversed, and bill dismissed.

Talbott & Hoover, of Elkins, for appellants.

W. B. & E. L. Maxwell, of Elkins, for appellees.

LIVELY, J. Appeal and supersedeas was obtained by the West Virginia Pulp & Paper Company, Spencer Hamrick, and George W. Hogan to a decree of the circuit court of Randolph county of the 7th day of November, 1919, setting aside, as void, deeds made to them by Naomi Hogan Vanpelt. The deed to Spencer Hamrick from her is dated July 31, 1909, that to George W. Hogan, June 26, 1907, and that to the West Virginia Pulp & Paper Company dated May 19, 1908, from John A. Innes, who received his deed from Naomi Hogan (afterwards Vanpelt) on October 10, 1905. The bill was filed at December rules, 1914, by William Darius Hogan, Esther Hogan, Charles Edmund Hogan, and William Henry Hogan, by their next friend and others against the above-named appellants, and Wirt C. Ward and others, alleging that their father, William H. Hogan, had died in 1901, intestate, and seized of two tracts of land, called the "mountain place" and "home place," respectively; that two suits were instituted shortly after his death, one by Jacob Hogan et al. against Naomi Hogan, the widow, et al. for a partition of the lands, and the other by Naomi Hogan against George W. Hogan et al. for assignment of dower to the plaintiff therein; that such proceedings were had in these cases as resulted in a sale of the "mountain place" to Wirt C. Ward and Elihu

Hutton; and that dower was assigned to the widow, consisting of the entire "home place" and in addition thereto a sum was decreed to her in lieu of her dower in the "mountain place" from the sale of that tract; that the interests of the heirs in the "home place" had been sold to Naomi Hogan, subject to her dower therein, and that she had afterwards deeded the entire "home place" to George W. Hogan and Spencer Hamrick in two separate tracts; and that before these sales to George W. Hogan and Spencer Hamrick she had conveyed the timber on the "home place" to John A. Innes, and that he had afterwards deeded the timber to the West Virginia Pulp & Paper Company. The bill prayed that the sale of the lands made to Ward and Hutton of the "mountain place," and that made to Naomi Hogan of the remainder interests in the "home place," and the subsequent deeds from her be set aside, canceled, and annulled, because the court in those two suits had no jurisdiction to pronounce the decrees of sale. The records of the two original causes in which the sales were made were exhibited and made a part of the bill. All the parties defendant either appeared and demurred to the bill or filed answers thereto. It appears that all persons interested in the lands mentioned were made either parties defendant or appeared as plaintiffs. The bill does not charge fraud or collusion in the procurement of the decrees of sale under which these lands were sold, but sets forth in a general way the proceedings had in the two original chancery causes, and alleges that the circuit court illegally assumed jurisdiction to sell the real estate, and that there were no pleadings upon which to base the decree except the report of the commissioners of partition appointed therein. George W. Hogan, Spencer Hamrick, Elihu Hutton, and Wirt C. Ward demurred to the bill; afterwards by amended bill John A. Innes and the West Virginia Pulp & Paper Company were made parties defendant, and the latter likewise demurred to the amended bill. On February 22, 1918 a decree was entered, sustaining the demurrers of Ward and Hutton, and those persons holding under them, and dismissing the cause as to them. From this decree no appeal was taken, and it is unnecessary to further consider any questions which arise as to the sale of the "mountain place." Appellees allege cross-error against this decree on this appeal; but this cross-assignment of error cannot be considered here, as these parties interested as purchasers of the "mountain place" are not before the court. It appears that an appeal was sought from this decree of February 22, 1918, but was refused. It is not important to detail the various pleadings filed in this case. The main question, and upon which all the other questions turn, is whether or not the sale of the "home place" to Naomi Hogan under the decree of October 2, 1904, pronounced in the original suits, was without jurisdiction of the court, and void. In the original suit of Jacob Hogan and Celesta Gibson against Naomi Hogan and the heirs of W. H. Hogan, filed at September rules, 1902, it was alleged that George W. Hogan and Levi H. Hogan had received their full, fair, and equal portion of the estate from their father in his lifetime, and were not entitled to anything further in the way of lands or personal estate; and it was afterwards determined upon proof that they had received their share, and a decree, finding that fact was entered, before the decree of sale of the "home place," and thereafter they had no further interest in the litigation. As before stated, commissioners were appointed to make partition of the Hogan lands and on August 16, 1904, they reported as to the "home place":

"Your commissioners would further report that said home place, after the termination of the widow's dower therein, is not, in their opinion, susceptible of partition in kind among the heirs of William H. Hogan, deceased, and the same should be sold either now, subject to the widow's dower, or after the termination of the widow's dower therein, and the proceeds divided among the heirs of the said Hogan."

On this report the decree of sale of the October term, 1904, was predicated, at which sale the widow, Naomi Hogan, bought the "home place," subject to her dower, for the sum of $340. Exceptions were made to the report of sale to the effect that the bid was inadequate, and the court ordered a new sale thereof; but at the second sale the land was sold to her for the same amount, and a decree of confirmation entered and deed made in conformity therewith. It nowhere appeared in this partition suit that the interests of the children of William H. Hogan would be promoted by this sale. Neither was there a prayer in the bill alleging that it was impracticable to partition the lands and asking for a sale. Because of the failure of the record to show these two things, the plaintiffs in this suit assert their right to have the decree set aside as null and void, without jurisdiction of the court to pronounce, and consequently that the deeds made in pursuance thereof should be set aside as void. It is not deemed important or necessary to set out in full the various pleadings and procedure in the original suits or in this suit. Only sufficient has been stated to bring out clearly the issue here involved.

The vital question in this case is whether or not the decree of October 2, 1904, in the original consolidated suits, which directed sale of the "home place," is void or voidable. If void, the decree in this case of William Darius Hogan et al. v. Wirt C. Ward et al. must be affirmed. If merely voidable, then a different disposition must be made.

[1] There are many cases decided by this court where the prerequisites of sale have been determined; and they consistently hold that there must be a pleading in the cause on which a decree of sale may be based; that it must appear that partition cannot conveniently be made; and that the interests of the parties entitled to the land will be promoted by a sale. Where these prerequisites did not appear, the decree of sale has been reversed on appeal. In Hull v. Hull, 26 W. Va. at page 30, Judge Green said that the record in that case did not show that the interests of the infant owners of the land would be promoted, and "this surely constitutes a palpable and substantial error in the proceedings and decree." In the case of Roberts v. Coleman, 37 W. Va. 143, 16 S. E. 482, the court reversed the decree of sale because the record did not show that partition could not have been conveniently made, nor that the interests of the owners would have been promoted by the sale. Judge Brannon, on page 158 of 37 W. Va., on page 487 of 16 S. E., says:

"The facts required by the statute must appear. Where the record does not show this, a sale is erroneous."

He does not say that the decree is void. The case of Waldron v. Harvey, 54 W. Va. 608, 46 S. E. 603, 102 Am. St. Rep. 959, was purely for partition, which was made, and each heir was required to pay his part of the costs, and the case was dismissed from the docket. Buskirk afterwards gave notice to the parties that he had become a beneficiary of the parties entitled to costs in the case, and that he would, at the following term, move the court to reinstate the cause on the court docket. The case was reinstated at the October term, and afterwards at the following April term a decree was entered, directing sale of sufficient lands to pay the costs. Under this decree 99 acres of the land assigned to one heir were sold by a commissioner. The court held this decree of sale void, saying that the decree that the heirs pay costs was a judgment, and must be enforced in another suit for that purpose. The court had no jurisdiction to sell for costs; also that the decree of sale was void because the final decree, making partition and dismissing the case from the docket, ended the case, and there was no case in court for further decree. That case has little application here. In Herold v. Craig, 59 W. Va. 353, 53 S. E. 466, the decree for sale was not held to be void. The decree in Hoback v. Miller, 44 W. Va. 635, 29 S. E. 1014, was declared void, because the court had no jurisdiction to sell upon the bill of the widow, who had nothing but a dower interest on which to predicate her bill. There was no jurisdiction. The decree was not merely erroneous, but void. The same holding, and for the same reason, is found in Conrad v. Crouch, 68 W. Va. 378, 69 S. E. 888. That case held a decree of sale of infants' timber to be void, because entered in a suit brought by a widow against the heirs for assignment of dower. She could not have the infants' land sold in such a proceeding either on account of insufficiency of personal assets to pay the debts of the estate, or on the ground that the interests of the infant heirs would be promoted by such sale.

"A sale of lands of infant heirs made in such proceedings, either for the purpose of paying debts of the estate, or on the ground that the interests of the infants will thereby be promoted, is void for want of jurisdiction." (3d pt. syl.)

The decree of sale in Smith v. Greene, 76 W. Va. 276, 85 S. E. 537, was reversed because it did not appear from the record that partition could not be conveniently made, and that the interests of the co-owners would be promoted by sale. The court said the decree was erroneous for want of proof. It did not say the decree was void.

Stewart v. Tennant, 52 W. Va. 559, 44 S. E. 223, an especially well-considered case, reiterates that before a sale of land can be made in a partition suit, before the decree can be entered, it must appear from the record that the partition thereof cannot be conveniently made. In that case there had been no report from commissioners that the land could not be conveniently partitioned, nor was it shown that partition could not be made. There was no recital to that effect in the decree. The decree recited that the interest of the two infants would be promoted by sale of their interests in the tract as shown by evidence adduced at the bar of the court; but the other necessary requirement of the statute, that partition could not be conveniently made, nowhere appeared in the record, and the opinion said that the decree was erroneous for these defects. In that case, as in this, it was insisted that the decree was void under the authority of Hoback v. Miller, supra, and Judge Poffenbarger said there was a great dissimilarity in these two cases. In Hoback v. Miller the plaintiff had no right to file any sort of bill upon which the sale of infants' land could be predicated; therefore the court was without jurisdiction and its decree void. But in Stewart v. Tennant the plaintiffs were tenants in common with the infant and entitled to partition, and upon their right of partition could force a sale, it appearing that partition in kind could not be made, and that it was to the best interests of the parties thereto that such sale be made. The necessary parties were before the court as well as the subject-matter, and the jurisdiction of the court was proper for sale. But one of the statutory requirements was not shown, and the decree was held to be erroneous, and not void. Judge Poffenbarger said:

"After that [jurisdiction of subject-matter and proper parties], in the exercise of its jurisdiction, the court departed from the rules of law governing the proceedings, which amounts to an error in the exercise of jurisdiction, but not to an act without jurisdiction. Whether the decree is erroneous and therefore voidable or actually void, having no force or virtue for any purpose, is not very material or important, but it seems to be voidable only."

[2] But it is insisted that there was nothing in the pleadings in the partition suit of Jacob Hogan and Celesta Gibson against Naomi Hogan et al. on which to base a decree of sale of the "home place"; the prayer of the bill being for partition only. We do not so hold. In a suit for partition, the statute expressly says that if partition cannot be conveniently made and the interests of those who are entitled to the subject or its proceeds will be promoted by a sale, a sale may be made. It necessarily follows that in every suit purely for partition the question of sale may arise by virtue of this statute, and if the facts required by the statute are shown on which to base a sale, it must be so done. It would be a remarkable situation if upon a bill for partition, purely, it should appear in the proceedings that partition could not be made, that then the bill should be dismissed because there was no alternative relief by sale prayed for in the bill. The report of commissioners of partition would be sufficient. It would bring the whole matter to the attention of the parties, and to the court for adjudication. The possibility and advisability of a sale necessarily enters into every suit for partition by virtue of this statute. A sale in a partition suit could not be made at common law. In Croston v. Male, 56 W. Va. 205, 49 S. E. 136, 107 Am. St. Rep. 918, the suit was instituted, not for a partition, but for a sale, and the court held that under the prayer for general relief a partition might be made. We cannot see why the converse thereof should not be true. No relief can be granted under a general prayer which is entirely distinct from and inconsistent with the special prayer. But the sale is not entirely distinct from and inconsistent with the prayer for partition, as above intimated. De Camp v. Carnahan, 26 W. Va. 839.

"Although a suit is for the sale of the property it has been said that the prayer should be for the partition as well as the sale, but the position is absurd, and cannot be maintained where the allegations show that division by allotment is impracticable. Plaintiff's relief, at least when the judgment is not by default, is not restricted by his prayer. Thus, although he prays for partition by allotment, it may be made by sale; and generally the court may grant any relief proper on the facts alleged and established, whether or not it be other, or in addition to, the relief in fact prayed for in the complaint." 30 Cyc. 219, 220.

The commissioners of partition reported that in their opinion the "home place" was not susceptible of partition in kind among the heirs of W. H. Hogan, deceased, after the termination of the widow's dower therein, and that the same should be sold. But the record is silent as to whether or not it would be to the best interests of the heirs to have a sale instead of partition. Here was a very patent defect in the proceedings, and the court should not have entered a decree upon this status of the pleadings and proof. But it did so. It was a very glaring error, and upon appeal there would have been no question of reversal. Possibly the judge may have had evidence before him sufficient to meet the requirement of the statute which the record does not disclose. Possibly he considered that the interest of the eleven heirs in the "home place," burdened as it was by the widow's dower, would be so insignificant to each that the costs of partition would not justify the division in kind, and that it would be to their interest to decree a sale. The land, after being twice advertised, brought in $340 only. The record does not disclose the age or health of the widow. She was a second wife. She is still living, married to Vanpelt. The propriety of the sale must be tested by the circumstances then existing. But we should not wander into the realm of speculation, and it is at once conceded that the facts sufficient to meet the requirement of the statute should appear in the record. The statute does not so require, but all our decisions so state. But the court had jurisdiction of the property, and of all the persons in interest, and if the court made a mistake, however palpable and egregious, it would not render the decree void, but voidable only. In the often cited case of Zirkle v. McCue, 26 Grat. (Va.) 517, which was a suit for partition, the commissioners after assigning the widow dower, including the mansion house and improvements, did not partition the residue among the eight heirs. They reported the facts to the court, but did not recommend a partition, and did not intimate that it could be conveniently done. They clearly saw the difficulty of partitioning so small a tract among so many, with due regard to wood and water and places of residence. After that report was returned to the court, it was suggested by counsel that it would promote the interests of all concerned to sell the residue of the tract in three parcels rather than to make an assignment of any particular parcel to any one or more of the heirs. A decree was entered for sale, and the appellate court confirmed that sale, inasmuch as the rights of an innocent purchaser had intervened.

[3] Another important principle enters into this case. Naomi Hogan (afterwards Naomi Hogan Vanpelt) purchased the remainder interests in the "home place," which "home place" she held for life under her assignment of dower. What are her rights? If the decree is erroneous and voidable only, then she is protected in her title by section 8 of chapter 132, Code 1918 (Code 1913, § 4942), which reads:

"If a sale of property be made under a decree or order of a court, and such sale be confirmed, though such decree or order be afterwards reversed or set aside, the title of the purchaser at such sale shall not be affected thereby; but there may be restitution of the proceeds of sale to those entitled."

A sale in partition is a judicial sale. The purchaser is protected by the judgment of the court as fully as in any execution or judicial sale. The various matters necessary to authorize the sale have all been made subjects of judicial inquiry and determination.

"If the court acted erroneously in deciding upon the sale, or committed any other error, this should have been corrected by appeal, or by some other appropriate proceeding in the partition suit. Not being so corrected, the parties interested have acquiesced in and ratified it; and they cannot employ it in any collateral matter to defeat the purchaser's title." Freeman on Cotenancy and Partition, § 548.

Formerly a purchaser at a judicial sale was charged with notice of every reversible error in the proceedings leading up to the sale, and if the decree of sale was reversed his title was lost. This holding made the title of purchasers at judicial sales so uncertain that few persons had the temerity to risk the investment of money in such sales, and it had a marked tendency to cut off bidders and prevent property from bringing anything like its true value. This became unbearable, and hence the statute, first enacted by the mother state, and afterwards incorporated in section 8, c. 132, of our Code. But it is insisted that Naomi Hogan Vanpelt was a party to this suit, and for that reason is not protected by this section of the Code. It does not follow that every purchaser who is a party to the suit is not so protected. If she moved the error she could not take advantage of her own act. If she had any interest in the proceeds of the sale, and caused the sale to be made, she would not be protected. But she did not have such interest, and she did not move for the sale. The proceeds went to the heirs, not one penny to her. It is true that in her answer she suggested that it would be better to have a sale of the "mountain place" of 393 acres, but she made no suggestion and was silent as to what should be done with the interests of the heirs in the "home place." The distinction between the status of purchasers who are parties to a suit is made in Childers v. Loudin, 51 W. Va. at page 568, 42 S. E. at page 641. That was a partition suit, and Johnson, one of the cotenants, purchased the land at a judicial sale, and Judge Poffenbarger said:

"While Johnson, the purchaser, is a party to the suit, it does not appear that he, in any way, encouraged or sought to bring about the sale of the land, and it cannot be said that he was the moving cause of the sale. The sale is not more beneficial to him than to his cotenants, and he does not stand in the situation of a creditor who has caused the land to be sold for the satisfaction of his debt and purchased it at the sale. Although a defendant and one of the owners, he did not even file an answer in the partition suit. This being true, the principle announced in Martin v. Smith, 25 W. Va. 585, Dunfee v. Childs, 45 W. Va. 155, Buchanan v. Clark, 10 Grat. 164, and Galpin v. Page, 18 Wall. 350, does not apply. In all those cases the purchasers whose titles were held not to be within the protection of the statute were persons who were benefited by the erroneous decrees and who had been instrumental in procuring the sale. In Dunfee v. Childs, it is said: 'Merely being a party would not alone disturb his purchase, but, if the decree goes to his benefit, it is otherwise. The same reason does not exist for protecting him as an innocent third person. He moves the proceeding.'"

George W. Hogan would also be protected by section 8 of chapter 132, Code, although he was a party to this suit, for, before the decree of sale of the "home place" was entered, it had been determined by decree that he had received his patrimony from his father in his father's lifetime and had no interest whatever in the partition of the land or distribution of the personal property, and he and one other of the heirs were dismissed from the suit. Moreover, it must be remembered that he did not purchase at the judicial sale, but took his title from Naomi Hogan Vanpelt several years after the judicial sale. We sustain the title of Naomi Hogan Vanpelt to the "home place," and it necessarily follows that the deeds from her to Spencer Hamrick, George W. Hogan, John A. Innes, and his vendee, West Virginia Pulp & Paper Company, must also be sustained.

We therefore reverse the decree of the circuit court of Randolph county, entered on the 7th of November, 1919, and dismiss the plaintiff's bill.

Decree reversed, and bill dismissed.

RICE v. RICE. (No. 4127.)(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Feb. 22, 1921. Rehearing Denied
March 29, 1921.)(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Divorce \Leftrightarrow 27(6)—Divorce from bed and board properly granted for cruel and inhuman treatment.

A divorce from bed and board will be granted where it appears by a fair preponderance of the testimony that the defendant has on various occasions violently assaulted and beat the plaintiff, his wife, and compelled her, to save herself from further indignities, to flee from their home at night in inclement weather, and remain all or a part of the night unprotected from the violence of the elements.

2. Appeal and error \Leftrightarrow 1009(4)—Decree reversed when against preponderance of evidence.

While great weight will be given to the findings of the chancellor upon conflicting oral evidence, still if the testimony of one of the parties is fully supported by circumstances which could not be changed or falsified, it substantially preponderates over the oral evidence of the adverse party in conflict with such circumstances, and this court will reverse a decree entered against the party in whose favor the evidence so preponderates.

3. Witnesses \Leftrightarrow 347—Acts by party inconsistent with testimony at trial will be considered.

Acts done by one of the parties to a suit prior to its institution, which are entirely inconsistent with the testimony given by him upon the trial, will be given great weight in determining what credence should be given to his oral testimony in conflict with the testimony of his adversary.

4. Divorce \Leftrightarrow 51—When evidence as to condoned cruel and inhuman treatment may be introduced stated.

It is competent in a suit for divorce upon the ground of cruel and inhuman treatment to prove acts upon the part of the defendant amounting to such cruel and inhuman treatment, even though the same may have been conditionally condoned, for after the condition upon which they were condoned has been broken they are again brought into existence as grounds for divorce, and even though not of themselves so relied upon, evidence touching them is competent to characterize the subsequent acts of the defendant which are set up as entitling the plaintiff to relief.

5. Divorce \Leftrightarrow 287—Appellate court will not on reversal of decree fix alimony but will remand cause.

Where, in a suit for divorce and alimony the relief prayed for is denied by the lower court, this court will not, upon reversal of such decree, fix the amount of such alimony, but will enter a decree of divorce, and remand the cause to the circuit court for the entry of a decree for alimony that will do justice between the parties.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Monroe County.

Suit by Martha C. Rice against William V. Rice. Decree for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed, decree for plaintiff, and case remanded.

R. L. Clark, of Union, for appellant.

J. A. Meadows, of Athens, for appellee.

RITZ, P. In the year 1908, the parties to this suit launched their bark upon the matrimonial sea, and after a more or less tempestuous voyage the craft was wrecked in the month of December, 1916, plaintiff contends because of the defendant's cruel and inhuman treatment of her, and as alleged by the defendant, because of the plaintiff's willful desertion and abandonment of him. Both of the parties had had the misfortune to be bereft of their respective former spouses, and the plaintiff was left with one daughter about 16 or 17 years of age, while the defendant, as a result of his former marriage, was the father of nine children, eight of whom were living at home at the time of the second marriage, and some of whom were of comparatively tender years. After the marital relations of the parties were permanently broken off in the month of December, 1916, the plaintiff lived part of the time with her daughter, who was then married, and supported herself as well as she could by the earnings of her labor. It appears that her health was not good, and at times she had been compelled to subsist upon the charity of her neighbors and friends, while the defendant is the owner of a farm with considerable live stock and farming equipment thereon, from which he derives a comfortable living for himself and his remaining family.

The plaintiff in September, 1918, instituted this suit praying for a divorce from bed and board from the defendant, and for alimony. The ground of her complaint is cruel and inhuman treatment. The court below referred the cause to a commissioner to take the evidence and report upon other questions submitted to him. Upon consideration of the evidence submitted by the commissioner the court below declined to grant any relief, and dismissed the plaintiff's bill, and this appeal is prosecuted to reverse that decree.

[1] The plaintiff testifies in her own behalf that almost from the time she and the defendant were married until the time she finally left him his conduct toward her was inhuman and brutal. She testifies that on many occasions he beat her, whipped her, and excluded her from the house in the winter time, and compelled her to spend the nights out in the cold; that on at least one occasion, when he was under the influence of liquor, he attempted to procure one of his grown children to whip the plaintiff, and upon the refusal of this child to do so he did it himself. Many of the acts of cruelty and inhumanity testified to by the plaintiff are likewise testified to by her daughter. It further appears from the evidence introduced on behalf of the plaintiff that the defendant was addicted to the immoderate use of alcoholic drinks, if indeed it can be said that there is any such thing as a moderate use of such liquors, and that during the times he was so under the influence of liquor he was very violent. It appears that during their marital life on as many as a half dozen occasions the plaintiff left the defendant's home and lived away from him during intervals of varying lengths, as she contends, in order to escape his violent attacks and to prevent him from further abusing and beating her. The defendant in his own behalf testifies that he never treated the plaintiff harshly or abusively, and if his testimony is to be believed there was nothing in his conduct that should have caused a breach of the ordinary calm of their matrimonial life. Some of his children testify likewise that their father never abused their stepmother. According to the testimony of the plaintiff a few days before she finally left the defendant's home in the month of December, 1916, he, in addition to brutal attacks upon her, made an indecent assault upon her daughter, who was then visiting at their home; that she then, as soon as she could get her clothing together and make her arrangements, left the defendant's home and went to the home of her brother in Raleigh county, and since said time she has never spoken to or had any direct communication with him. This charge is also denied by the defendant, and he contends that when she left on this occasion she told him she was going on a visit to her brother in Raleigh county; that their relations at the time were entirely amicable; that he furnished her the money to make the trip; and that when she returned and went to live at another relative's he sent one of his sons to her to request her to come home, which she refused to do. In this he is corroborated by several of his children. The oral evidence as to the conduct of the defendant towards the plaintiff in the particulars complained of is highly conflicting. It is necessarily in large part confined to the testimony of themselves, because of the intimate personal relations existing between man and wife, and were it not for some things appearing in this case independent of the testimony of either of the parties we would hesitate to disturb the findings of the lower court upon this conflicting state of the evidence.

[3] To these things we will now advert.

It appears that in the summer of 1915 after the plaintiff had left the defendant, as she claims because of excessive abuse and extreme cruelty toward her, she at his instance agreed to return upon his executing a writing promising that in the future his former conduct would not be repeated. By this writing he binds himself not to again break the peace toward the plaintiff, and while it is true that the plaintiff likewise signed this writing, the only thing that she agreed to do by it was not to reproach him with his past conduct. This writing is a clear admission upon his part that he had been guilty prior thereto of breaches of the peace toward the plaintiff, and is a solemn admission by him of the falsity of the evidence he has given upon this hearing.

Another item of evidence of very great weight is the fact that some time prior to the execution of this writing, acting upon the advice of some of her relatives and friends, the plaintiff caused a warrant to be issued for the defendant charging him with assault and battery committed upon her; that upon this warrant he was taken before a justice of the peace, and, upon a trial, was found guilty and fined for the offense. The justice of the peace who conducted this trial was introduced as a witness, and he testified that at the time of the trial there was still evidence upon the plaintiff's person of acts of violence committed upon her.

It further appears that the defendant is a man in moderate circumstances, and has a farm from which he derives a comfortable living for himself and his family; that the plaintiff has nothing, and is compelled to make her living by working in the kitchens of other people, or doing such other domestic labor as she is able to obtain, and as the condition of her health will allow. Under these conditions, is it at all probable that the plaintiff would have left the defendant if, as he contends, there was nothing out of the ordinary in their marital life? It is significant that the plaintiff on at least a half dozen occasions prior to December, 1916, left his home, as he claims without any reason or excuse, and that overtures were always made by him to have her return. It seems at no time did she ever forgive the offense with which she claims he was guilty until after he had repeatedly importuned her and made promises of reformation. He introduced some evidence tending to show that the plaintiff was unable or unwilling to get along with his children, but there is no substantial showing that the plaintiff had any more trouble with the defendant's children than is ordinarily incident to the rearing of a family of this size.

The defendant contends that while it is true that the paper writing is an admission upon his part of cruel treatment toward the plaintiff, she condoned all of his past acts at that time, and cannot now complain of them, and that this is likewise true of the acts of violence which resulted in his conviction of assault and battery upon her, as above referred to. The condonation by the terms of the writing was conditioned, however, upon his future good conduct, and, of course, if his contention is true that his conduct has since been reasonably free from adverse criticism, then no cause of action would exist here, but the fact that he now denies that he ever was in any wise cruel or brutal in his treatment of the plaintiff, contradicted as it is by a writing over his own signature, convinces us that his testimony as to his subsequent conduct is entitled to little weight. There is no doubt, nor is it questioned, that if the defendant has been guilty of the assaults upon the plaintiff, and of the conduct toward her of which she complains, and as to which she testifies, she is entitled to the relief for which she prays. Such acts clearly bring the case within the rule laid down by this court justifying divorce upon the ground of cruel and inhuman treatment. Goff v. Goff, 60 W. Va. 9, 53 S. E. 769, 9 Ann. Cas. 1083; Maxwell v. Maxwell, 69 W. Va. 414, 71 S. E. 571.

[2, 4] The only question is whether or not the evidence proves that the defendant was guilty of the conduct charged against him. It is true the court below has found in his favor, and while great weight will be given to the conclusions and findings of the chancellor in a case like this, still when we find that there is a fair preponderance of the evidence in favor of the cause of action alleged, we will not refuse to give relief. In this case we are of opinion that the circumstances which we have above pointed out are of such controlling force, and so fully corroborate the oral testimony of the plaintiff, that they compel us to hold that the defendant's denials, inconsistent therewith, are not effective to bar the relief prayed for. While it may be true that the acts of cruelty and inhumanity of which the defendant was guilty prior to the execution of the writing of June, 1915, and which were condoned conditionally by that writing, of themselves would not be cause for divorce, but as we said in Deusenberry v. Deusenberry, 82 W. Va. 135, 95 S. E. 665, the condonation was only conditional, the condition being that the defendant's conduct would be good in the future, and upon his failure to comply with this condition the plaintiff's condonation can no longer be relied upon by him as excusing these acts. Then, too, even though his former conduct had been unequivocally condoned, still it would be admissible in evidence as characterizing his later conduct, of which complaint could be properly made, and would be an instructive aid to the court in interpreting subsequent acts which the conflicting testimony might render equivocal.

The defendant insists that his efforts at reconciliation, both before and since the institution of this suit, have an important bearing. The plaintiff had repeatedly yielded to such offers in the past, but notwithstanding defendant's promises of reformation there seems to have been little difference in his manner of treating his wife. He evidently believed that because he was the head of the household—

"Therefore God's universal law
Gave the man despotic power
Over his female in due awe,
Not from that right to part an hour,
Smile she or lour."

Even if we concede that his attempts at reconciliation were in entire good faith, she was under no obligation to condone his transgressions. She had repeatedly done so in the past, and it would seem that the point had been reached where forgiveness ceases to be a virtue. If his conduct gave her ground for divorce, she could stand upon it and reject any proposals coming from him, the acceptance of which, as indicated by past experience, would only result in her further humiliation and ill treatment.

Our conclusion is that the plaintiff has shown herself entitled to relief, and we will reverse the decree of the circuit court, and enter a decree of divorce from bed and board.

[5] But how about the prayer for alimony? The circuit court has not yet considered this question. Ordinarily the question of what alimony is to be allowed is one resting in the sound discretion of the trial court, which will not be reviewed unless it appear that injustice has been done to one or other of the parties. That the plaintiff is entitled to alimony there can be no doubt. Kittle v. Kittle, 102 S. E. 799. Ordinarily, however, this court will not pass upon a question upon appeal which has not been passed upon by the court below, but will remand the cause for the purpose of having such question determined, with the right, of course, to either of the parties to review by appellate process such determination, should they conceive themselves to be aggrieved thereby. Nuzum v. Nuzum, 77 W. Va. 202, 87 S. E. 463.

For the purpose of entering a decree for alimony which will do justice between the parties, we will remand the cause to the circuit court.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Reformation of Instruments \S 29, 45(4)—Deed will not be reformed unless mistake was mutual; denied if rights of bona fide purchaser have intervened.

Equity will not reform and correct a deed on account of a mistake unless it is shown by clear, convincing, and unequivocal evidence that the mistake was mutual; but, if the rights of an innocent bona fide purchaser for value have intervened, the reformation and correction will not be made.

2. Reformation of Instruments \S 29—Deed may be reformed as to one not a "bona fide purchaser," but who has knowledge of mistake.

A purchaser of land who has knowledge of a mistake in the deed of his grantor, and of the true intent and design thereof, is not a bona fide purchaser for value, and stands in no better position than the original parties. The deed may be reformed as to him.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Bona Fide Purchaser.]

3. Appeal and error \S 1011(1)—Decree on conflicting evidence not reversed.

A decree of a circuit court based on conflicting evidence will not be reversed by this court, unless it is clear that the finding of the lower court is unwarranted by the facts.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Randolph County.

Action by Thomas B. Stickley against W. R. Thorn and others. Decree for plaintiff, and defendant named appeals. Affirmed.

A. M. Cunningham and James A. Bent, both of Elkins, for appellant.

W. B. Maxwell and H. G. Kump, both of Elkins, for appellee.

LIVELY, J. This appeal and supersedeas, obtained by W. R. Thorn, brings here for review a decree of the circuit court of Randolph county, entered on June 1, 1920, reforming and correcting a deed from T. B. Stickley and wife to A. P. and Virginia Flanagan, dated December 7, 1916, and estopping W. R. Thorn from claiming any of the land described in a deed from said Flanagans to him, dated September 27, 1917, except such as is described in the deed from Stickley to the Flanagans as reformed and corrected, and enjoining Thorn from trespassing upon the lands of Stickley east of the eastern line of the deed from Stickley to the Flanagans, as reformed and corrected.

Thomas B. Stickley owned about 44 acres of land in Randolph county near the city of Elkins, and on December 7, 1916, conveyed to Virginia and A. P. Flanagan 4 acres and 158 poles lying in the interior of the 44-acre tract. A survey was made and stakes set in the presence of vendor and vendee at three corners of the land. There are only four corners, and the northwestern corner was on a hickory, about which there is no dispute. Afterwards Purkey, the surveyor, prepared the deed, and in drawing it made the mistakes complained of by the plaintiff. Some time prior to this transaction Stickley had made a deed to a portion of his lands lying on the south of the Flanagan lot to E. J. Evans. In surveying the Flanagan lot, prior to the making of the deed to him, Stickley, Flanagan, and the surveyor began, as the southwest corner of the Flanagan lot, at a stake 16½ feet from and north of the line of the Evans land, and ran a line parallel to the Evans tract and 16½ feet therefrom easterly 27.32 poles to a stake 16½ feet north of the Evans line; thence a northerly course 35.35 poles to a stake 1.9 rods west of a maple at the Stickley boundary line; thence northwest 27.7 poles to a hickory; thence southwest to the beginning. In drawing the deed, which he says he drew from memory, Purkey began at a stone, a corner in the Evans line; thence southeast and running with the Evans line 27 poles to a stone 16½ feet from Thorn's line; thence northeast 35.85 poles to a stone, a corner one rod west of a maple, a corner in Stickley's boundary line; thence with said line west 29.7 poles to a hickory; thence southwest 25 poles to the beginning. This deed granted to Flanagan a right of way over and through the grantor's lands to the land then conveyed. On September 27, 1917, the Flanagans deeded the land to Thorn, using the same calls in the deed made to them by Stickley. At the maple corner and running along the northern boundary of the Flanagan tract a roadway had been procured and opened by Stickley, leading to the city of Elkins, after he had sold to the Flanagans; and some time after Thorn had purchased the lot he began opening a road from the maple corner south along his eastern line, evidently for the purpose of having a road to the east of his eastern line to connect with the Stickley-Nestor road on the north at the maple corner, and to connect with another opened road which extended to the southern portion of his lot along the eastern boundary of the Evans land, and known as the Stickley road. This work of opening the road consisted of cutting the brush and timber, and, if extended south as started, would have taken and destroyed a "potato patch" on the land in the possession of and claimed by appellee. Stickley then, on May 16, 1919, presented his bill to the judge of the circuit court, supported by affidavits, asking for a reformation and correction of his deed to the Flanagans and for an injunction against Thorn to prevent trespass and irreparable damage. The potato patch seems to have been the "proximate cause" of the litigation. The bill set out the mistakes in the calls of the deed to the Flanagans and how they occurred, that said mistakes were mutual, and all the facts leading thereto, charged that Thorn knew of the mistakes fully before the purchase by him from the Flanagans, that he was shown the boundary lines and stakes set, marking the corners, and all knew the circumstances under which the mistakes occurred, and Thorn was not, therefore, an innocent purchaser, that he (Thorn) was committing trespass on plaintiff's land, destroying his timber, potatoes, etc., and causing irreparable loss, etc., and prayed for a reformation and correction of the deed to the Flanagans, and for an injunction against Thorn, and for general relief. The Flanagans and Thorn were made defendants; and the Flanagans answered on July 7, 1919, admitting the mutual mistake in the deed to them, corroborated the allegations of the bill, and admitted that the provision for right of way given in the deed had been performed and accepted by the opening of the Stickley-Nestor road on the northern boundary by Stickley, and that Thorn was so informed when he purchased from the Flanagans, and that there was no road or right of way along the eastern line of the lot at any time before or after his purchase. Thorn demurred to and answered the bill on August 2, 1919. The answer denies all of the material allegations of the bill, and sets up a claim of right of way along the eastern line of the lot purchased by him from the Flanagans down to the Stickley-Nestor road, under the provision in the deed from Stickley to the Flanagans reading:

"Said Stickley hereby grants unto said Flanagans a right of way over and through his lands to the land herein conveyed."

On September 3, 1919, plaintiff filed an amended bill, setting out that it was the intention and agreement when the Flanagan deed was made that the beginning corner (the southwest corner) should begin $16\frac{1}{2}$ feet north of the Evans line, and that there should be a strip $16\frac{1}{2}$ feet wide between the northern line of the Evans tract and the southern line of the Flanagan tract, but that the scrivener in making the deed had made the mistake of beginning at a stone on the Evans line; that the mistake was not noticed by either party and was mutual; and that Thorn, when he purchased, was fully advised of the true boundary, and knew of the mistake in the calls of the deed when he purchased. Thorn demurred to and answered the amended bill. Flanagan answered, and general replications were made. Upon this state of the pleadings the parties went to proof.

The lower court properly overruled Thorn's demurrer to both the original and amended bill. The bill shows that Stickley could neither read nor write. He and the Flanagans and Purkey, the surveyor, went on the land, and by actual survey measured the land and set stakes at each of the three corners; that in drawing the deed the scrivener made the mistakes complained of, and the mistakes were unknown to both the plaintiff and the Flanagans, and were mutual mistakes between them; and that the deed did not therefore carry out the true intent and agreement of the parties. It is charged that Thorn, before he purchased, was fully advised of these mistakes in the deed to the Flanagans. The amended bill seeks to correct and reform another line in the same deed for the same reasons. It was not foreign to the matters set out in the original bill, in fact, is closely and intimately linked therewith, and cannot be considered as a new suit. These bills allege facts sufficient for reformation of a deed for mistake of the scrivener, and as not conforming to the actual agreement of the parties. Smith v. Owens, 63 W. Va. 60, 59 S. E. 762. The bills being sufficient, it is at once apparent from the pleadings that the case depends upon the proof.

[1] There can be no question that equity has jurisdiction to reform and correct a deed so as to make it conform to the agreement of the parties, where the scrivener in writing the deed has made a mistake. Melott v. West, 76 W. Va. 739, 86 S. E. 759; Hertzog v. Riley, 71 W. Va. 851, 77 S. E. 138; Knowlton v. Campbell, 48 W. Va. 294, 37 S. E. 581. Nor can it be questioned that a writing will not be reformed and corrected so as to express the true agreement and intent of the parties unless the proof that it does not do so is conclusive and unequivocal; for the writing itself is evidence so strong that only direct, positive, convincing, and unequivocal evidence will be sufficient to reform it. Jarrell v. Jarrell, 27 W. Va. 743; Robinson v. Braiden, 44 W. Va. 183, 28 S. E. 798. Has the plaintiff met these strict requirements of the law? Purkey, the surveyor, Stickley, and Flanagan all swear positively that they began at a stake $16\frac{1}{2}$ feet from the Earle corner; thence to a stake 1.9 rods west of a maple, still standing; thence in a northwestern direction to the hickory; thence to the stake at the beginning corner. They also say that the deed was to be made to the land within these stakes and hickory corner, and this was understood and agreed to by all of them before the deed was made. This is not disputed. Purkey says he made the mistakes in drawing the deeds, giving as an excuse therefor that he drew the deed from memory; that he did not refer to his field notes, which showed the true corners as agreed upon by all (the field notes were in evidence); that in drawing deeds he usually called for a stone where there was no fixed monument. These three witnesses also testify that it was the intention and agreement that a strip 16½ feet wide was to be left between the lot to be conveyed to the Flanagans and the Evans lot. The stakes were actually placed at the corners as surveyed, and many witnesses testify that the stake placed at the corner 1.9 rods west of the maple was still standing within three or four months before their depositions were taken. The suit was begun in May, and the depositions were taken in September. Other witnesses testify to seeing the stakes at the corners after the sale to the Flanagans. In short, there is no conflicting evidence as to the true boundary of this land and of the intention and agreement in that regard between Stickley and the Flanagans. The proof is clear, unequivocal, and convincing, and meets the strictest test of the law. As between Stickley and the Flanagans there could be no hesitancy in reforming the deed. If they were the only parties concerned, there would be no lawsuit. They agree. But the rights of Thorn have intervened, and, if he is an innocent bona fide purchaser for value, the deed cannot be reformed so as to affect him. Is he an innocent purchaser? Are there any equities between him and Stickley?

The rights of a purchaser depend upon whether he has had notice, and one purchasing land with knowledge of a mistake in the deed stands in no better position than if he had been one of the parties to the deed.

"A bona fide purchaser of land is one who purchases for a valuable consideration, paid or parted with, without notice of any suspicious circumstances to put him upon inquiry." Carpenter Paper Co. v. Wilcox, 50 Neb. 659, 70 N. W. 228.

Mistakes in the description of land may always be corrected against a party who buys with full knowledge of another's prior purchase of land from the same grantor.

"One who purchases with full knowledge of prior equitable or legal rights is not a purchaser in good faith." Smith v. Schweigerer, 129 Ind. 363, 28 N. E. 696.

"A. bought two lots of land, a larger and a smaller, from B., but, by mistake, the deed conveyed only the large lot. C., knowing that A. had bought the two lots, and that the deed to him had not been recorded, took a deed from B. of the small lot, and put it on record before A. recorded his deed. Held, that A. could maintain a bill in equity against B. and C. to have the mistake in the deed to him corrected." Rumrill v. Shay, 110 Mass. 170.

"It is sufficient to authorize the reformation of a deed for a mistake as against a subsequent grantee that he had notice of the first deed, and the fact that by a mistake it failed properly to describe the land will not aid such subsequent purchaser, and he will not be allowed to profit by the mistake." Preston v. Williams, 81 Ill. 176; Haynes v. Seachrest, 13 Iowa, 455; Adams v. Stevens, 49 Me. 363.

[2, 3] We have examined the evidence touching the notice to Thorn of the mistakes in the Flanagan deed before he purchased from the Flanagans, and have come to the conclusion that he is not an innocent purchaser, and that he had sufficient notice to put him upon strict inquiry and investigation. The learned judge of the lower court analyzed the evidence on this point, and it may not be amiss to quote his summary here:

"Different witnesses say that defendant Thorn had been shown the lines and stakes which marked the boundaries of the lot sold by Stickley to Flanagan, before he (Thorn) became a purchaser. Several witnesses say they showed him the stake 1.9 rods from the maple, and others say that they showed him the stakes along the Evans line, and that they told him that a road 16½ feet was intended to be reserved along the Evans line. Thorn denies all this, but we think the proof is overwhelming that he did have such knowledge. There is an answer in Mr. Thorn's own testimony which we think shows he had been informed that a road was to be reserved along the Evans line, and which shows that he had been shown all the corners, just as Flanagan, his grantors swears he did. On page 91 of his testimony he was asked: 'Q. I want to know whether or not before you purchased this tract of land you had any talk with the plaintiff, T. B. Stickley, as to the roadway to and from that land and adjoining about it. Just state whether you had or not. A. Had not at that time. You see I want to explain it. I stated it was before the talk I met him. When I came to buy this land, Mr. Flanagan came to me in the winter and wanted to sell this tract of land, and he said that Mr. Stickley told him that I had land adjoining it and that I might buy this land. Mr. Flanagan brought me the deed the same evening. No; Flanagan went and (1) showed me the corners, and I told him to bring me the deed, and (2) he showed me the roadway that was in the deed and showed me the corners of the tract, and I asked him to bring me the deed, and when he brought me the deed, I saw there was (3) no reservation for a road given—that is, saying where there was to be a road.'

"This answer upon analysis shows:

"(1) That Thorn had been shown the corners to the land before he bought from Flanagan.

"(2) That he had been shown the road 'that was in the deed,' meaning the right of way to and from the land granted by Stickley to Flanagan.

"(3) When Flanagan brought Thorn the deed, he 'saw there was no reservation for a road given—that is, saying where there was to be a road.' And his seeing there 'was no reservation for a road given in the deed' implies knowledge on his part that such a reservation was claimed on the part of Stickley, and Flanagan says he told Thorn that such a right existed in favor of Stickley.

"Counsel suggested to Thorn, when he made the above answer, that he was getting ahead of his question, that he did not believe witness intended to state that (as contained in the answer), and then witness in response to a question states that neither Flanagan or Stickley nor any one else told him about the right of way along the Evans line. But the answer above quoted was made after plaintiff's amended bill was filed particularly alleging that there should be a right of way along the Evans line, and when the deed was brought to defendant he states that there was no reservation for a road given. This undoubtedly had reference to right of way along the Evans line. That Thorn was looking at the deed to ascertain whether a road was reserved is plain from his answer, because he admits he had been shown the lines by Flanagan, and is not disputed that the stakes showing the line along the Evans land stood 16½ feet away from the Evans fence. This Thorn could plainly see, but he evidently wanted to know what the deed contained in this respect, and after inspecting the deed he says, 'There was no reservation for a road given.' Evidently he was looking for reservations in the deed, and not for grants. That clause which says, 'Said Stickley hereby grants unto the said Flanagan a right of way over and through his lands to the land herein conveyed,' could have no reference to a reservation of a road in favor of the grantor. Thorn repeats in his answer above quoted that Flanagan showed him the corners to the land. This evidence shows that defendant Thorn had been shown the corners before he purchased, that he had been told that a roadway was intended to be reserved along the Evans line, and after having seen the deed from Stickley to Flanagan it was easy with the knowledge he had for him to discover the mistake, and with such knowledge he cannot stand upon the deed made to him; it would be inequitable to permit this to be done.

"While the evidence to reform a deed must be established by evidence clear, convincing, and free from doubt, and not conflicting, relief will not be denied in a clear case made out by overwhelming evidence simply because one of the parties in his evidence controverts the fact of the mistake. Melott v. West, 76 W. Va. 739, 86 S. E. 759. Here in the present case the testimony of other witnesses, together with the admission of the defendant, show he had notice of the real boundaries of this tract before he purchased. Under such circumstances, he is not an innocent purchaser such as would allow him to rely strictly upon the calls in his deed. Besides, this evidence clearly shows that Thorn requested Flanagan to make the deed to him with the exact calls in it as were contained in the deed from Stickley to Flanagan, and Flanagan swears that he told Thorn before his purchase that Stickley had excepted 'a strip up there,' meaning a road along the Evans line. Stickley distinctly stated that he also told Thorn before he purchased that he had excepted a road along the Evans land. See Holland v. Vaughan, 120 Va. 324, 91 S. E. 122."

We do not find that Thorn has established his claim to a right of way along the eastern boundary of the Flanagan lot out to the Stickley-Nestor road. Counsel for Thorn insist that the decree vested in Stickley exclusive use, title, and control of the strip of land one rod wide along the Evans line and between the defendant's lot as reformed and corrected, and that the court erred in enjoining appellant from entry on or use of it as a roadway. We do not so understand the decree.

On consideration of the petition for rehearing, which insists that Thorn should be expressly given the right to use the strip of land one rod wide between the Evans line and the line of Thorn lot 2 as reformed, in order to reach the Stickley road, and which insists that the decree of June 1, 1920, prevents him from so doing, we have again examined the record, and do not find that the use of this strip by Thorn is in controversy. Thorn averred, and sought to prove, that no such strip was intended to be reserved or that a mistake was made by the scrivener in drawing the deed. He asked no affirmative relief, if perchance he failed in his contention and the deed should be reformed and corrected. The decree does not enjoin Thorn from the use of this strip. It prohibits him from trespassing on lands of Stickley "east of a line beginning at a stake 16½ feet north of E. J. Evans line and 16½ feet from a parcel of land conveyed to W. R. Thorn by L. D. Wees and wife; thence north 14° 45' E. 35.35 poles to a stake 1.9 rods west of a maple, a corner in said Stickley's boundary line." This prohibition has no reference either by terms or implication to the one rod wide strip north of the Evans line and south of the Thorn lot 2 as reformed, and surely Thorn would not be in contempt of this decree, as intimated, if he should use that strip. We repeat that we do not so understand or construe the decree. It is stated by counsel for Thorn that he (Thorn) has the right to use this strip, and that the plaintiff, Stickley, his counsel, and the court admit that he has. If that be true, there is no controversy over the use, and no basis for litigation concerning it.

We affirm the decree of the lower court entered on the 1st day of June, 1920.

Decree affirmed.

GIBSON v. STALNAKER. (No. 4075.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Feb. 15, 1921. Rehearing Denied
March 29, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Frauds, statute of §72(3)—Sale of growing trees must be in writing.

Growing trees are part of the realty, and a sale of them, to be valid under the statute of frauds, must be in writing.

2. Frauds, statute of §129(3)—Oral sale of growing timber unenforceable except in so far as executed.

An oral sale of growing timber, in the absence of equitable considerations justifying removal of the bar of the statute, is unenforceable and revocable at the option of the vendor; but in so far as the contract has been executed, prior to revocation, by severance of the timber, the lumber so cut and removed belongs to the purchaser.

3. Frauds, statute of §129(3) — Part performance must be clearly shown to entitle purchaser of growing timber to relief.

To entitle a purchase to relief under a parol sale of growing timber, within the statute of frauds, the right sought to be enforced or safeguarded must be clear and definite, and evidenced by such part performance as will justify a court of equity in deviating from the strict statutory bar.

4. Frauds, statute of §129(5)—Payment of purchase money not part performance as to sale of growing timber.

The payment of purchase money is not of itself such part performance as will take the case out of the statute of frauds.

5. Frauds, statute of §129(4)—When possession sufficient to constitute part performance stated.

Possession, in order to constitute part performance, must be taken under and by virtue of the contract, and must be referable solely to such contract; possession that is not exclusive and does not indicate the existence of the contract or agreement sought to be enforced is not sufficient.

6. Frauds, statute of §129(4) — Defective possession may amount to part performance in connection with improvements.

Possession which is defective in this regard may, when accompanied by valuable and permanent improvements in reliance on such contract, amount to part performance.

7. Frauds, statute of §129(8)—Slight and temporary improvements insufficient to aid defective possession as part performance.

Improvements that are merely temporary, of relatively slight value, and of little substantial benefit to the property, are not valuable improvements in this sense.

8. Frauds, statute of §143(3)—Second valid sale held a repudiation of former invalid sale, so that subsequent purchaser may invoke statute.

When a vendor of property by a contract unenforceable because of the statute of frauds makes a subsequent valid sale to a third person, he thereby repudiates and avoids the former contract, and the subsequent purchaser may invoke the statute for his own protection.

9. Frauds, statute of §143(3)—Notice of unenforceable contract held not to avoid subsequent valid purchase.

Notice, actual or constructive, of a contract which is unenforceable under the statute of frauds, will not prevent the person having such notice from becoming a purchaser of the property from the original owner unincumbered by the invalid contract.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Randolph County.

Suit by John Alexander Gibson against French Stalnaker for an injunction. From a decree dissolving an injunction, plaintiff appeals. Reversed, injunction reinstated and perpetuated, and cause remanded.

W. B. & E. L. Maxwell, of Elkins, for appellant.

A. M. Cunningham, of Parsons, for appellee.

LYNCH, J. Complaining of a decree dissolving an injunction, theretofore awarded, restraining defendant from cutting certain timber on plaintiff's lands, the latter seeks reversal of that order and reinstatement of the injunction. On May 24, 1918, plaintiff, John Alexander Gibson, by deed purchased from Virginia S. Gibson and her husband, John Alonzo Gibson, a tract of land containing about 220 acres, known as the Varner place, the right to the timber on said tract being the question now in dispute. About a quarter of a mile distant from the Varner tract, and separated from it by a 400-acre farm, ownership of which is not disclosed by the record, is a second parcel known as the Parsons place, also owned by the grantors. Defendant, Stalnaker, the son-in-law of Virginia S. and John Alonzo Gibson claims to have purchased from them, by verbal contract, during the fall of 1916, all the timber on both tracts of land, for which he agreed to pay $1,500 in cash and in addition to cut therefrom and furnish to his grantors from 12,000 to 15,000 feet of lumber for their own use, they to pay some of the expenses connected with the latter. Stalnaker and his wife had formerly resided on the Varner tract, but about a year prior to entering into the alleged agreement they had moved onto the Parsons place, where he was engaged in cutting and logging lumber for his father-in-law. It was while they were living on the latter tract that the verbal agreement of sale was entered into. Shortly thereafter defendant commenced cutting the timber on the Varner tract, and in the spring of 1917 they moved back into the house which they had formerly occupied on that tract. The cutting and logging continued thereafter without serious interruption, and was in progress in May, 1918, when plaintiff purchased the tract.

The deed from the Gibsons to him makes no reference to the prior oral sale of the timber thereon to defendant, but it is admitted by plaintiff and established by abundant testimony that his grantors informed him thereof at the time of or prior to the date of his purchase. He claims, however, that they assured him the agreement of sale expressly excluded the locust timber on the tract which is sufficient to furnish posts to be used in fencing the land, and for which purpose plaintiff now desires to use it. The Gibsons support him in this statement, but defendant and several witnesses introduced by him testify that it included all the timber on both tracts, irrespective of kind or quality.

Defendant continued to remove the timber from the Varner tract until August, 1918, when, owing to an extremely dry summer and the resulting inability to obtain water to run his mill, he removed his plant from that tract to another, where operating conditions were more favorable. Before leaving, however, he notified plaintiff of his intention to return and complete the removal of the timber on that tract when conditions should improve.

Up to this time defendant had not cut any of the locust timber on either parcel, a fact tending to support plaintiff's construction and understanding of the oral agreement, and, indeed, not until receipt of a letter dated November 11, 1918, did plaintiff know that Stalnaker was asserting any claim to it. The following spring when defendant was about to return to the Varner tract to cut what little timber remained, plaintiff filed a bill in equity, praying that an injunction should issue to restrain him from cutting and removing any of the locust trees, but expressing a willingness that he should remove all other kinds, upon the giving of a bond conditioned to protect plaintiff against injuries to his farm and stock resulting from defendant's operations. A preliminary injunction was awarded by the court, but later was dissolved upon final hearing of the cause.

[1] We deem it unnecessary to review the conflicting testimony with regard to the inclusion of the locust timber within the terms of the oral sale to Stalnaker, for under either construction the agreement is unenforceable. Growing trees are part of the realty on which they stand, and a sale of them must be in writing under the sixth clause of the statute of frauds, found in chapter 98 of the Code. Ftuharty v. Mills, 49 W. Va. 446, 38 S. E. 521; Brown v. Gray, 68 W. Va. 555, 70 S. E. 276, 2 Page on Contracts, § 1276. There is no dispute as to this principle of law, but defendant contends that there has been such performance of the oral agreement as to remove it from the terms of the statute. The consideration promised by him has been almost, if not wholly, paid. He was permitted to enter into possession of the Varner tract, and in reliance upon the agreement constructed a mill and proceeded to cut the timber. Down to the date of cessation of work in August, 1918, he had removed about 500,000 feet of timber from the tract, leaving thereon yet to be cut from 50,000 to 75,000 feet, other than locust.

The statute of frauds was founded in wisdom and sound policy. Its main purpose was to prevent the setting up of pretended agreements and supporting them by perjured testimony. The importance of recording in written form contracts affecting real estate and interests therein, as well as those relating to other forms of property, is emphasized by the frequency with which valuable rights of that character are lost as a result of misunderstanding, uncertainty, mistake, and unprincipled and vicious conduct, when the only evidence available to establish and support such rights consists of oral testimony. The wisdom of any departure or deviation from the strict rule expressed by the statute has frequently been questioned, but courts of equity, nevertheless at times depart therefrom in attempts to do justice between litigants, in order that a law designed to prevent fraud shall not itself become an instrument of fraud. Wright v. Pucket, 22 Grat. (Va.) 370.

[3] The first and most essential prerequisite justifying and warranting such deviation is that the terms of the alleged agreement be clearly proven. Gallagher v. Gallagher, 81 W. Va. 9, 5 S. E. 297; Smith v. Peterson, 71 W. Va. 364, 76 S. E. 804. The right sought to be enforced or safeguarded must be clear and certain. Meadows v. Meadows, 60 W. Va. 34, 53 S. E. 718. Such is not the state of the testimony with regard to the locust timber on the Varner tract. The conflict is irreconcilable, and it is difficult to say that a preponderance favors either contention, though it must be recognized that the failure of defendant to cut any locust timber during the entire period he was engaged at work on the tract tends strongly to support the position of plaintiff and the Gibsons in that regard. In other words, the uncertainty of the agreement is such as to warrant a court of equity in declining to depart from the statute by way of enforcing defendant's claim to the locust timber.

[4, 5] Of course, the mere payment of the purchase money by the vendee is not sufficient part performance to take the case outside the statute. Gallagher v. Gallagher, cited; Summers v. Hively, 78 W. Va. 53, 88 S. E. 608. Nor are the taking of possession by the vendee and his construction of a mill on the premises sufficient of themselves in that regard. Possession and other acts relied on as constituting part performance must be taken under and by virtue of the contract and referable solely to the existence of such an agreement. Gallagher v. Gallagher, cited; 2 Page on Contracts, §§ 1381-1383. Defendant's intimate family relations with the Gibsons at that time presuppose a wide latitude of privileged access to their lands. He and his wife resided on the Varner tract until they moved to the Parsons place to log lumber for the latter's parents, and a year later, after making the oral agreement of sale, they returned to the Varner place to cut and remove the timber thereon under their contract. The timber thus verbally sold covers both parcels, both owned by the Gibsons, one of which defendant already was in possession of, and had been in possession of the other only a year before. Indeed, the ease of access and communication between the two, and defendant's position in the family as son-in-law, make his re-entry upon the Varner tract under the oral agreement of 1916 in effect one of retention of possession, which under the authorities cited is not sufficient. Ellison v. Torpin, 44 W. Va. 414, 422, 30 S. E. 183; 1 Williston on Contracts, § 494. He already was, and for a long time prior thereto had been, living on portions of the property owned by his wife's parents, and cutting and logging timber thereon for them, and his return to the Varner tract to continue the same character of employment cannot therefore be said to be explainable solely upon the theory of some contract existing between him and the Gibsons, for it could easily be interpreted as a return under the same conditions as a year previous when there was no contract involved. Nor was his possession sufficiently exclusive of that of the Gibsons to create an inference of an independent agreement with them. Though the latter did not reside on the Varner tract at that time, but lived near the city of Elkins, yet defendant's wife admits that her father spent most of his time upon the tract while the cutting was in progress, doubtless exercising concurrent control over it. Possession, to avail under the statute of frauds, must be exclusive of that of the vendor. Gallagher v. Gallagher, cited; 2 Page on Contracts, § 1383.

[6, 7] Moreover, defendant made no such permanent and valuable improvements as, taken and considered in conjunction with his possession, justify setting aside the bar of the statute. Gallagher v. Gallagher, cited; 2 Page on Contracts, § 1384. He built no home or residence in which to live, but continued to reside in the house already on the tract. Though he constructed a mill for the cutting of the timber, it apparently was only a portable one, which he removed in August, 1918, when he left to cut on another parcel until working conditions should improve at the Varner place. There was nothing permanent or essentially valuable added to the premises; no improvements of any other character made, so far as the evidence discloses. He already has removed all but a minor portion of the timber, and hence there are no independent equities warranting violence to the plain letter of the statute. For these reasons we are of opinion that the contract falls within its terms and is therefore unenforceable.

[2] But can plaintiff, who was not a party to the oral agreement of 1916, assert its unenforceability under the statute? We think he can. Until the execution of the deed of May 24, 1918, conveying the land to plaintiff, the prior verbal contract of sale of the timber thereon was merely unenforceable, not void. The operation of the statute of frauds goes only to the remedy; it voids not the contract. The vendor may consent to be bound thereby. If so, acts done voluntarily thereunder pursuant to its terms are valid and of as full force and effect as if the agreement had been one specifically enforceable. Hence such timber as defendant has already cut and removed was validly severed and lawfully taken away. Fluharty v. Mills, 49 W. Va. 446, 38 S. E. 521.

[8, 9] However, although the contract still subsists, the vendor may elect to rescind and annul it and pass title to the subject-matter thereof to another not a party to or interested in the prior agreement. For when the owner lawfully may refuse to perform the contract, he may lawfully sell and convey to another, and by so doing repudiate the same. That the new grantee had notice of the prior verbal agreement creates no legal objection to the second conveyance, for there were no enforceable equities attaching under the former contract. Van Cloostere v. Logan, 149 Ill. 588, 36 N. E. 946; Pickerell v. Morss, 97 Ill. 220; Asher v. Brock, 95 Ky. 270, 24 S. W. 1070; 1 Williston on Contracts, § 529. He is protected by the statute to the same extent as his vendor. In Shelton v. Thompson, 96 Mo. App. 327, 70 S. W. 256 the defense was raised that, as the statute of frauds affected only the remedy of the parties, its benefits could not be invoked by one who was not a party to the contract; but the court said:

"We hold that the defendants are not within the above rule, for the reason that their vendor * * * voided the contract in the first instance by refusing to let plaintiffs have the hogs in dispute. It would be illogical to hold that after a vendor had repudiated an oral contract like the one in question, he could not thereafter sell the goods and give good title. That is to say, that thereafter he must keep the goods because a purchaser could not be found, for the reason that they could be taken from him by the original vendee, which would destroy their character as articles of merchandise. But it is plain that when the vendor voids a sale under said statute and retains the goods, his title is as if no such sale had ever been made, and he can resell and give as good a title as his own to the purchaser, who can, at a suit by the first vendee for the same goods, plead the action of the vendor, as a bar to such suit."

See, also, First National Bank v. Blair State Bank, 80 Neb. 400, 114 N. W. 409, and valuable monographic notes annotating that and similar cases in 127 Am. St. Rep. 756, 772, et seq., and 16 Ann. Cas. 412; Collins v. Lackey, 31 Okl. 776, 123 Pac. 1118, and note 40 L. R. A. (N. S.) 883, Ann. Cas. 1913E, 507; Hunter v. Bales, 24 Ind. 299; Ugland v. Bank, 23 N. D. 536, 187 N. W. 572; 25 R. O. L. title, Statute of Frauds, § 383. It follows, then, that plaintiff has succeeded to the full rights and privileges of his vendors in and to the Varner tract.

Our order, therefore, will reverse the decree of the court below, reinstate and perpetuate the injunction, and remand the cause.

REES et al. v. EMMONS COAL MINING CO. OF WEST VIRGINIA. (No. 4171.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Feb. 22, 1921. Rehearing Denied
March 29, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Equity §273—Rule as to amendments of bill stated.

The rule of equity pleading, inhibiting departure from the subject of an original bill in an amended bill, does not forbid the introduction by amendment of what are technically known as cases or causes of action different from that set up in the original bill, but it does preclude introduction of causes of action foreign to the subject-matter of the original bill, or the act, agreement, or transaction out of which it arose. Causes of action clearly germane to the subject-matter of the original bill may be introduced or added by way of amendment.

2. Equity §273 — Right to accounting held germane to bill for injunction to restrain trespass.

Right to an accounting for coal or other minerals, taken from land to which a plaintiff has good title by a trespasser, is germane to the subject-matter of a bill seeking an injunction to restrain such trespass, and may be united with the cause of action stated in the original bill, by an amendment thereof.

3. Equity §273—Amendment of bill praying accounting for minerals removed and showing pendency of action of assumpsit therefor not demurrable.

Even though an action of assumpsit is pending in a court of law for recovery of the value of the mineral so removed, an amendment to such bill, praying an accounting therefor in such suit, is permissible, and an admission in the amended bill of the pendency of such action is not tenable ground of demurrer.

4. Abatement and revival §5—Pendency of action at law for cause asserted in equity may not be set up in the equity court.

Pendency of an action at law for a cause of action asserted in a court of equity cannot be set up by plea or otherwise, either in bar or in abatement of the equity suit. It merely affords ground of requirement of an election in such suit, as to which proceeding the plaintiff will dismiss.

5. Equity §232—If bill in equity justifies any relief sought thereby, general demurrer properly overruled.

If a bill in equity is sufficient for any relief sought thereby, it is proper to overrule a general demurrer to it.

6. Appeal and error §171(3) — Demurrer, treated as general in trial court, will be so treated on appeal.

If a demurrer to a bill states several grounds or reasons for insufficiency of the bill, specifying some of its parts as being objectionable, and has been disposed of by the trial court, as a general demurrer going to the bill as a whole, without objection, it will be regarded as such a demurrer in the appellate court on an appeal.

7. Injunction §36(2)—Question of title does not justify exclusion from court of equity.

A controversy involving a claim of equitable title to real estate cannot be excluded from a court of equity merely because it involves a question of title.

8. Mines and minerals §62(1)—Right to remove coal held not title to coal in place.

Right to mine and remove coal from a tract of land, on payment therefor at an agreed price per ton, without limit, restriction, or obligation as to quantities or duration, is not title to the coal in place, legal or equitable.

9. Mines and minerals §63—Miner of coal on land of another held a tenant from year to year.

If, under such an arrangement effected by a verbal agreement between the owner of a tract of land and the party upon whom such right is conferred, mining operations are conducted on the land and royalties paid at the stipulated rate for several years, the possessor of such right and occupant of the mine is a tenant thereof from year to year, and cannot be prevented from proper mining in the land, by injunction or otherwise, at the instance of the landlord, until after termination of the tenancy, in some way.

10. Landlord and tenant §74, 79(2)—Tenancy from year to year assignable.

A tenancy from year to year, not terminated in any of the ways authorized by law, is assignable, and an assignee thereof has the same estate and right therein as his assignor had.

11. Landlord and tenant §116(2)—Statutory notice necessary to terminate tenancy from year to year.

In the absence of an agreement dispensing with the requirement of notice, provided by section 5 of chapter 93 of the Code (sec. 4131), a landlord cannot terminate such a tenancy against the will of the tenant otherwise than by the giving of such notice, which must be in writing and antedate expiration of the tenancy year, by at least three months, and express intention to terminate it at the end of such year.

12. Landlord and tenant §109(1, 2)—Proof of termination of tenancy by surrender must be clear; unexecuted agreement held not a surrender by operation of law.

To establish termination of such a tenancy by surrender in fact, the proof must be clear and unequivocal. An agreement to surrender, not executed, does not effect a surrender by operation of law.

13. Appeal and error \Rightarrow 1175(7)—On reversal of decree for injunction and accounting for coal mined, bill dismissed with right to bring other actions.

A bill and an amended bill seeking an injunction restraining the mining of coal and an accounting for coal mined, on the theory of total lack of right in the defendant to mine the coal, and prosecuted to a decree in favor of the plaintiff, settling the principles of the cause, will be dismissed, on reversal of the decree, upon a finding that the defendant had right, as tenant of the plaintiff, to mine the coal and still has it, with a saving of right in the plaintiff to prosecute any proper suit at law or in equity, to obtain compensation for coal mined and not paid for, at the agreed price per ton.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Mineral County.

Suit by George S. Rees and others against the Emmons Coal Mining Company of West Virginia for an injunction and an accounting. Decree for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Reversed, injunction dissolved, and bill dismissed.

L. J. Forman, of Petersburg, Wm. MacDonald, of Keyser, and Conlen, Brinton & Acker and J. T. Manning, Jr., all of Philadelphia, Pa., for appellant.

Chas. N. Finnell and Taylor Morrison, both of Keyser, for appellees.

POFFENBARGER, J. The decree brought up for review by this appeal, as one settling the principles of the cause, is predicated, for the most part, on an amended bill to which a demurrer was interposed on the ground that the matter set up in it constituted a departure from the original bill and the further ground that such matter constituted a cause of action set up in an action of assumpsit previously instituted against the defendant and pending at the date of the amendment. Other incidental or collateral allegations thereof were relied upon as grounds of demurrer. There was also a demurrer to the original bill. Overruling the demurrers, at the hearing on answers, replications, and evidence, the court entered a decree affirming the right of the plaintiff to the relief sought, and referred the cause to a commissioner for the taking of an account.

The litigation involves claims and contentions respecting title to the coal in a tract of land and mining rights therein. On the original bill, a temporary injunction was sought and obtained, inhibiting, restraining, and enjoining the defendant from mining the coal. At or about the date of the filing of that bill and the award of the injunction thereon, the plaintiff instituted an action of assumpsit for the recovery of the value of coal mined, removed, and sold. About seven months later, the defendant moved the court for a modification of the injunction order, permitting it to enter the mines and remove therefrom the rails, spikes, ties, electric wires, and other property it had placed and installed therein for mining purposes. At the same time, the plaintiffs tendered and were permitted to file the amended bill, and the defendant filed its demurrer thereto. The motion was overruled and the cause continued, but the plaintiffs were required to execute an injunction bond in the penalty of $2,000, in addition to the bond previously given in the penalty of $1,000. Answers to both the original and amended bills were filed, depositions taken, the cause submitted upon the bills, answers, replications, motions to modify the injunction and to dissolve it, and depositions taken, filed by both parties, and a decree entered as above stated.

Sufficiency of the original bill is apparent, and it may be conceded in the argument submitted, which is general and does not seem to be limited in any instance to that bill standing alone. The bill alleges perfect and complete title in the plaintiffs and a mere verbal license in the defendant to mine coal from the property, and revocation of such license, in conformity with the agreement under which it was granted. It then alleges that, notwithstanding the revocation, the defendant had continued its mining operations in the land. All of these facts, the demurrer concedes for its purposes, and no authority need be cited for the elementary and universally recognized proposition that equity will enjoin acts of trespass, working injury to the inheritance, and destruction thereof. In such cases, the legal remedy is wholly inadequate.

[1] In so far as the demurrer to the amended bill is based upon the theory of a departure from the original bill or the making of a new case, it was properly overruled. The purposes of the two bills are closely allied. They pertain to the same general subject-matter. Each seeks vindication of the right of the plaintiffs to the coal in the particular tract of land in question. The original bill invokes a measure of protection against the severance and removal thereof. Its purpose is conservation and preservation of the remaining rights of the plaintiffs. The amended bill pursues the same general purpose. It seeks compensation for the coal already taken out. Both pleadings have the same basis or foundation, the right of the plaintiffs to the coal in question. The rule against departure in equity pleading does not preclude the introduction of a new cause of action in the technical sense of the term. Stated with fair and reasonable accuracy, it forbids only the introduction of foreign causes of action. A cause of action different from that originally set up, but allied with it and closely related to it, in subject-matter, may be added or introduced by way of amendment. Belton v.

Apperson, 26 Grat. (Va.) 207, a leading case on the subject, clearly propounds this doctrine. In the opinion delivered in that case, Judge Staples, after having reviewed a number of English and American decisions, tersely stated his conclusion in the following terms:

"If these cases do not show that the plaintiff is permitted to make a new case, they at least show that he may by his amendment so alter the frame and structure of his bill as to obtain an entirely different relief from that asked for originally. This is founded upon good reason. Why should the plaintiff be put to a new bill for different relief upon the same transaction when the object can be accomplished by an amendment? If there is danger that the defendant will be injuriously affected by the amendment, it will be refused, and the suit will be considered as pending only from the time of the amendment."

In Lamb v. Cecil, 25 W. Va. 288, the bill stated one cause of action and the proof disclosed an entirely different one, but closely related to that stated in the bill, and the plaintiff was permitted to amend his bill so as to make the cause of action therein stated conform to that proved. In Doonan v. Glynn, 26 W. Va. 225, the rule is stated thus:

"But if in such case the proofs show that the plaintiff has a cause which entitles him to relief, that it is of a similar nature to that alleged in his bill, and such as might be made available by proper amendments of his bill, the court on the hearing should not dismiss his bill without giving him an opportunity to amend within a reasonable time."

That the rule precludes the introduction of foreign causes of action rather than merely different ones is asserted in Tidball v. Shendoah National Bank, 100 Va. 741, 42 S. E. 867, in these terms:

"If the amendment seeks to assert rights and to enforce claims arising out of the same transaction, act, agreement, or obligation, however great may be the difference in the form of liability as contained in the amendment from that stated in the original bill, it will not be regarded as for a new cause of action."

To limit the right of amendment to the case or the cause of action stated in the original bill would give it a scope much narrower than our decisions have accorded it. Exclusion of matters merely foreign to the general subject-matter of the original pleading affords room for amendment, and yet does not permit the litigation to spread beyond reasonable bounds. "Case" and "cause of action" have technical meanings, and the right of amendment goes beyond them. Procedure in one suit, for an injunction to prevent extraction of minerals and for an accounting for minerals already taken out, is both permissible and usual. Williamson v. Jones, 39 W. Va. 231, 19 S. E. 436, 25 L. R. A. 222; 43 W. Va., 562, 27 S. E. 411, 38 L. R. A. 604, 64

Am. St. Rep. 891; South Penn Oil Co. v. Haight, 71 W. Va. 720, 78 S. E. 759.

[2, 3] Our conclusion that the subject-matter of the amended bill is germane to that of the original bill has important bearing upon another ground of demurrer, namely, that the amended bill sets up a cause of action for which an action at law is pending. This is not the case of an effort merely to transfer from a law court to an equity court a cause of action for a legal demand. If it were, it would be necessary to allege the necessity and indispensability of discovery to the maintenance of the action. Dudley v. Niswander, 65 W. Va. 461, 64 S. E. 745; Prewett v. Bank, 66 W. Va. 184, 66 S. E. 231, 135 Am. St. Rep. 1019; Thompson v. Whitaker Iron Co., 41 W. Va. 574, 23 S. E. 795. In such case, the necessity and indispensability of discovery constitute the only ground upon which the cause of action, after assertion thereof in the law court, can be transferred to and prosecuted in the equity court. Here the situation is different; there is an equitable cause of action pending in the equity court, and the additional cause of action set up by the amended bill is germane thereto. In other words, the parties are already in litigation in a court of equity, concerning the general subject-matter of the two causes of action. The amendment is not tantamount to the institution of a new suit, nor does it amount to a transfer of a single cause of action from one court into another, by way of election. The transaction amounts only to a permissible broadening of the scope of a suit pending in a court of equity.

[4] Though the amended bill discloses the pendency of an action at law for the principal cause of action therein set up, it is not ground of demurrer. At law, the pendency of a former action for the same cause of action and between the same parties, both actions being at law, is matter of abatement, and, to be available, must be pleaded in abatement. Foley v. Ruley, 43 W. Va. 513, 27 S. E. 268; Riley v. Jarvis, 43 W. Va. 43, 26 S. E. 366; McAllister v. Harman, 97 Va. 543, 34 S. E. 474. But the rule is different when one suit is at law and the other in equity. The pendency of an action at law for the same cause of action as that set up in a suit in equity does not abate the latter. It merely affords the defendant ground for an application to the court for a rule against the plaintiff requiring him to elect whether he will prosecute the action at law, or the suit in equity. Williamson v. Paxton, 18 Grat. (Va.) 475; Priddy v. Hartsook, 81 Va. 67; Warwick v. Norvell, 1 Rob. (Va.) 308. Actions at law and suits in equity are so dissimilar in character that the pendency of one cannot be pleaded either in abatement or in bar of the other. Risher v. Wheeling Roofing & Cornice Co., 57 W. Va. 149, 49 S. E. 1016; Williamson v. Paxton, cited.

[6, 8] Other grounds of demurrer relied upon in the argument submitted are prayers for discovery and for a mandatory injunction to require the defendant to permit the plaintiff to enter the mine, through and over its property, for the purpose of ascertaining, by measurement, the quantity of coal taken from the mine, and to aid in such work, by the running of its fan to supply fresh air throughout the workings. Lack of merit in these grounds is perfectly obvious, if the demurrer is general, going to the whole of the amended bill. In such case, it is only necessary to ascertain that the pleading demurred to sets up sufficient ground for some relief. If it is sufficient in one respect, it is immaterial that it may not be good in others. City of Wheeling v. Chesapeake & Potomac Telephone Co., 82 W. Va. 208, 95 S. E. 653; Trough v. Trough, 59 W. Va. 464, 53 S. E. 630, 4 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1185, 115 Am. St. Rep. 940, 8 Ann. Cas. 837; Miller v. Hare, 43 W. Va. 647, 28 S. E. 722, 39 L. R. A. 491; Shoe Co. v. Haught, 41 W. Va. 279, 23 S. E. 553; Gay v. Skeen, 36 W. Va. 582, 15 S. E. 64. We have already demonstrated its sufficiency for an accounting. In the written demurrer filed, there is no expression of intention to challenge the sufficiency of any particular part of the bill and eliminate it. Without objection, it was treated as a general demurrer in the order disposing of it. It specifies objectionable purposes and prayers of the amended bill, but only by way of criticism of the pleading in its entirety. The references to the prayer for a mandatory injunction and the allegation of right to discovery are mere statements of grounds of a general demurrer.

[7] Equity jurisdiction of the cause as developed by the pleadings and evidence is denied on the ground of dispute or controversy as to the title to the coal in question, under principles enunciated in Freer v. Davis, 52 W. Va. 1, 43 S. E. 164, 59 L. R. A. 556, 94 Am. St. Rep. 895, and subsequent decisions adhering to the doctrine of that case. The defendant is the successor in title of another corporation known as the Buffalo Creek-Cumberland Coal Company. At some past date not disclosed, mining operations were started on what is known as the Hatfield-Hilles property at Bayard, W. Va. Prior to the year 1917, the Buffalo Creek-Cumberland Coal Company owned and operated the property which was composed of the Hubbard tract and the James B. Rees tract, or one of them. It did not own the adjoining Job Aronhalt tract, which is the tract here involved, but it had a verbal arrangement with the owners thereof, George S. Rees and David A. Arnold, the plaintiffs in this cause, under which they were mining in that tract and paying the owners thereof 7 cents per ton for the coal mined and taken therefrom. The defendant, directly or indirectly, took over the properties from the Buffalo Creek-Cumberland Coal Company early in the year 1917, by a conveyance thereof and an assignment of all of the stock of the latter company. On or about the date of the defendant's acquisition of the property, which seems to have been in February, 1917, negotiations were opened between it and the plaintiffs for a lease or purchase of their coal in the Aronhalt tract, and also for the coal in another tract known as the Woods land, on which the plaintiffs claim to have had a lease. Pending these negotiations, which finally failed, the defendant continued its mining operations in the Aronhalt tract with the consent of the plaintiffs. After the failure of the negotiations as to the Aronhalt tract and the Woods tract, the plaintiffs, according to their pleadings and evidence, revoked this permission, on the 15th day of October 1917, by a notice served upon the defendant, and they say it agreed to stop its operation after that date, and for a long time they supposed the mining had ceased. But some time in the year 1919, prior to the month of August, they discovered that the defendant had never discontinued its operations, but had continued its mining of the coal, without having ever rendered any account thereof or paid for it. The answers do not deny the legal title of the plaintiffs. On the contrary, they impliedly, if not expressly, admit it. They expressly aver a contract of purchase of the coal from the plaintiffs and a breach of the contract on the part of the latter. There is no claim that it was ever conveyed to the defendant. In view of this situation, it is hardly necessary to observe that the decision in Freer v. Davis, which merely excludes from equity jurisdiction issues of fact as to legal title, has no application. Upon its own showing, the defendant could have had nothing more than an equitable title.

[8, 9] The adjudication of equitable as well as legal title in the plaintiffs upon the pleadings and evidence is challenged. The Buffalo Creek-Cumberland Coal Company, owned and managed by Hatfield and Hilles, mined the coal under a verbal agreement, permit, or license for a period of years, probably three, four, or five, paying a royalty of 7 cents per ton. They were under no obligation or restriction as to the quantity to be mined yearly or otherwise. There is no proof of any written contract, memorandum, or permit signed by the owners. They say they verbally assented to a loose proposition made to them by Hatfield and Hilles or their company. Under it, the mining commenced and the royalties were paid. Admitting this in substance, but calling their right a lease, Hatfield and Hilles say, however, they engaged in the mining and incurred the expense of preparation and equipment, under the belief that they were purchasers of all the coal in the tract, or lessees with right to take all of it out, and would not have done so, except for such belief, and that, in their sale of the Buffalo Creek Company's property, they included such right as they or it had in the Aronhalt land. The Emmons, acting for their company, claim likewise that they understood the sale included such right, and that it amounted to title to the coal. The contract between the Buffalo Creek-Cumberland Coal Company and J. Grey Emmons does not specifically mention the coal in the Aronhalt tract. It specifies leasehold interests acquired from the McCullough Coal & Coke Company and the Rees Coal Company a seven-acre tract of land owned in fee by the vendor, its mining plant, contracts for the sale of coal, certain accounts receivable, and then adds "all other property real and personal belonging to it," except certain accounts receivable. The Emmons deny that they took a mere verbal permit from the plaintiffs to continue mining in the tract of land in question, pending negotiations for a formal lease or a conveyance of the coal. They say no objection to continuance of the mining was made, but that negotiations were suggested or started for sale of the coal to them at a flat price per acre, and that, pending such negotiations, they continued to mine as of right; and that, believing their title to be indefeasible, they installed better and more expensive equipment in the mine. The testimony of the plaintiffs to the effect that there were negotiations respecting a lease, soon after the Emmons Coal Company took charge of the mining operations, has some support, however, in correspondence. Letters dated in July, 1917, and written on behalf of that company, admit the advisability of some kind of a contract, and suggest a lease at 7 cents per ton, without a minimum royalty. Plaintiffs say they stood for that rate with a minimum royalty, and that they rejected a counter proposition for a 6-cent rate with such a royalty. These negotiations ended about October, 1917, when the notice to cease mining was given. As to whether the defendant agreed to quit, there is square contradiction in the evidence. After that, if not before, there were negotiations for purchase of the property by the defendant, and a formal contract of sale of the coal in the Aronhalt and Woods tracts, bearing date August 2, 1919, was prepared but not executed, and the temporary injunction was obtained August 9, 1919.

[10] Some of the more important claims and contentions made on each side, respecting the substantive rights of the parties, are wholly untenable, and have a decided tendency to obscure and conceal the real merits of the controversy. Neither the defendant nor its predecessor in right ever had any title, legal or equitable, to the coal in the Aronhalt tract of land. The plaintiffs clearly have both. But it does not necessarily follow that the defendant was a tenant at will or a trespasser after October 15, 1917. Upon the admitted facts, the law pronounces the defendant's predecessor a tenant from year to year, and it suffices, without argument, to give the authorities so holding. Drake v. O'Brien, 83 W. Va. 678, 99 S. E. 280; Sheets v. Allen, 89 Pa. 47; Moore v. Miller, 8 Pa. 272; Ganter v. Atkinson, 35 Wis. 48. One of the incidents or qualities of that tenancy was assignability, and the defendant took it over by its contract and stood in the shoes of the Buffalo Creek Company. Austin v. Thomson, 45 N. H. 113; Cody v. Quarterman, 12 Ga. 386; Pleasants v. Benson, 14 East. 234; 18 Am. & Eng. Ency. L. 207.

[11] Unless the tenancy has been terminated in some one of the modes provided by law, it still continues, and the defendant is in no sense a trespasser, and cannot be enjoined from further operation, until it has been terminated. Drake v. O'Brien, cited. Neither the verbal notice, given October 12, 1917, for immediate cessation, or cessation October 15, 1917, nor the written notice later mailed, was sufficient to terminate it, since the statute requires notice in writing to be given three months prior to the end of the tenancy year. Coffman v. Sammons, 76 W. Va. 13, 84 S. E. 1061; Arbenz v. Exley, Watkins & Co., 57 W. Va. 580, 50 S. E. 813, 4 Ann. Cas. 625.

[12] Nor was it terminated by surrender. While the evidence is conflicting as to what was said, October 12, 1917, about cessation of mining, that of the plaintiffs is indefinite. It does not say the tenant offered to surrender its term, and the offer was accepted. The purport of it is that there was a verbal notice to quit, acquiesced in by the defendant, and that the plaintiffs did not rely upon that alone. They deemed it advisable to give a written notice and did. Moreover, they were not dealing with the tenancy as one from year to year. They regarded it as a tenancy at will, wherefore they could not have treated the transaction as a surrender of a tenancy for a year. The law of surrender by agreement is strict. To comply with it, there must be an actual surrender in present. An agreement to surrender does not effect it. National Union Bldg. Ass'n v. Brewer, 41 Ill. App. 223; Donahoe v. Rich, 2 Ind. App. 540, 28 N. E. 1001. This conversation occurred in Philadelphia, and the mining was then going on in West Virginia. If there was a mere agreement to quit three days later, as seems to have been the case, there was no surrender in fact. Of course, there was none by operation of law, for the defendant never vacated the mine nor ceased to operate it.

[13] From this conclusion, it results that the plaintiffs have entirely misconceived their rights and remedies. They are not entitled to enjoin further operation until they shall have terminated the tenancy of the defendant. Their right to compensation and an accounting arises under the contract of tenancy, the former being limited to 7 cents per ton, and not out of a trespass. For that they may or may not have an adequate remedy at law, if it shall become necessary for them to invoke any remedy. Now that the basic rights of the parties have been determined and fixed, there may be a settlement without further litigation. At any rate, the rights of the plaintiffs stand upon a basis entirely different from that set up in their bills. Presumptively, there will be no occasion for resort to a court of equity. Under these circumstances, we deem it proper to reverse the decree complained of, dissolve the injunction, and dismiss both the original and amended bills, without prejudice to the right of the plaintiffs hereafter to prosecute any proper suit, either at law or in equity, to recover the unpaid royalties on the coal mined by the defendant from the Aronhalt tract of land, and a decree will be here entered accordingly. Costs in the court below, as well as in this court will be decreed to the appellant.

NORMAN v. WILLIS. (No. 4184.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
March 1, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Attachment \S 250 — Motion to dismiss properly overruled after attachment and order of publication against defendant quashed.

First point in the syllabus in Danser v. Mallonee, 77 W. Va. 28, 86 S. E. 895, reaffirmed and applied.

2. Attachment \S 103—Affidavit held sufficient to state nature of plaintiff's claim.

An attachment affidavit, which states that plaintiff and defendant entered into an agreement, jointly with others, on a given date, for drilling certain oil and gas leases in Pleasants county, by which each person was to share in the profits and bear the expenses according to his interest in the leases, that the defendant had a one-eighth interest, and became liable by reason of the operations being unsuccessful and of his agreement to pay $338.60 (a one-eighth part of the aggregate expense) and being so liable, requested the plaintiff to pay said sum for him, promising to repay, and the plaintiff did on that day pay off and discharge said indebtedness for defendant, which sum constitutes plaintiff's claim and which defendant refuses and fails to pay, and which affidavit also details the time, place, and circumstances surrounding the contraction of said debt, sufficiently states the nature of plaintiff's claim under section 1, chap. 106 (sec. 4455), of the Code.

Error to Circuit Court, Roane County.

Action by W. H. Norman against W. C. Willis. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Pendleton, Mathews & Bell, of Spencer, for plaintiff in error.

Harper & Baker, of Spencer, for defendant in error.

LIVELY, J. W. H. Norman, plaintiff below, and W. C. Willis, defendant below, became jointly interested with others in sinking a test well for oil and gas in "wild cat" territory leased by them, and in the transaction Willis became indebted to Norman in the sum of $338.60 as of the 17th day of March, 1914. The latter instituted action in assumpsit on March 13, 1919, in the circuit court of Roane county, and process thereon was returned by the sheriff on that day indorsed, "Not found in my bailiwick." On March 15, following, Norman filed affidavit for attachment with the clerk on the ground that Willis was a nonresident of the state, and thereupon an order of attachment was issued and levied upon certain oil and gas interests of the defendant in lands in Roane county, and an order of publication, notifying Willis of the object of the suit and requiring him to appear and protect his interests, was issued at the April rules and duly published. The declaration was filed at the following May rules. At the May term of court defendant appeared by counsel only for the purpose of moving, and did move, to quash the affidavit, and to dismiss the attachment, and the court sustained the motions. The plaintiff excepted, and upon motion of the plaintiff the case was remanded to rules for further process and the issuance of a new attachment. On June 10, 1919, another summons against the defendant was issued, returnable at July rules, another affidavit for attachment filed, and other attachment issued and levied on said real estate interests of the defendant, likewise followed by order of publication duly published. On September 25, 1919, defendant again appeared specially by counsel and moved to quash the new affidavit and dismiss the new attachment, which motions being overruled, and excepted to, he again appeared for the purpose of moving the court to strike the case from the docket because it had abated upon the return of "not found" or "no inhabitant" on the original process commencing the suit and the quashing of the original affidavit. He also objected to the trial of the case because it had not matured for trial. The court overruled the motion and objection. Thereupon the defendant pleaded the general issue and the statute of limitations. On May 27, 1920, the case went to trial, which trial resulted in a verdict of $464.45 for the plaintiff, on which judgment was that day entered. This writ of error brings up this judgment for review.

The main error relied upon is that the court could not remand the case to rules after the first affidavit was quashed and the attachment based thereon dismissed. It is asserted that the case went out of court when this affidavit was quashed, and all subsequent proceedings were void and of no effect. To sustain this proposition we are cited to Miller v. Zeigler, 44 W. Va. 484; 29 S. E. 981, 67 Am. St. Rep. 777; Millar v. Whittington, 77 W. Va. 142, 87 S. E. 164; Flint v. Coffin, 176 Fed. 872, 100 C. C. A. 342; and Wade on Attachments, § 161. The first two cases cited were equity suits for debts which were purely legal, and the first case for a debt that was not due. The only ground for equity jurisdiction in these cases was the attachment, and when that was dismissed the equity cause went with it. Frye v. Miley, 54 W. Va. 324, 46 S. E. 135; Hogg's Equity Prin. § 37; Lively v. Winton, 80 W. Va. 554, 4 S. E. 451. Section 161 of Wade on Attachment is on the subject of debts not due, to secure which attachments may be issued under statute. Flint v. Coffin, supra, was a proceeding under the North Carolina attachment statute, where there was a defective affidavit and process, which was the basis of a judgment and which the circuit court of appeals reversed because of these defects.

This suit is for a purely legal demand, in a law court of general jurisdiction, and is instituted under section 1 of chapter 123 of the Code (sec. 4734), which provides in part that any action at law may be brought in the circuit court of any county (4) "if it be against a nonresident of the state wherein he may be found, or may have estate or debts due him." If the defendant, being a nonresident, had no estate or debts due him in the county, then the case would be abated for want of jurisdiction, upon return of the process showing the nonresidence of the defendant. The attachment issued on March 15, 1919, was levied that day on property of the defendant in the county of Roane. This gave the court jurisdiction. If no property could have been found, and the summons was returned on the return day showing that the defendant was a nonresident and could not be found, no service on him, then the suit would have abated. Under section 8 of chapter 125 of the Code (sec. 4762), a suit against a nonresident cannot be maintained simply on the ground that the cause of action arose in the county. There must be some other ground, and if it appears that the nonresident defendant has property or debts in the county, then that fact is sufficient to maintain the jurisdiction. In order to make the jurisdiction effective, that property or those debts must be brought within the control of the court by proper process in order to respond to a judgment, if, perchance, a judgment be rendered. If the attachment be released because of a defective affidavit, it does not remove the property from the county, and a new attachment may be issued in the same suit upon a proper affidavit. Is not the return of the officer on the attachment, showing that he has found property or debts of the defendant in the county, sufficient to justify the pendency of the suit, the jurisdiction of the court, even though that particular attachment be released? The attachment and return thereon are still a part of the record. We held in Danser v. Mallonee, 77 W. Va. 26, 86 S. E. 895, that in an action at law to recover a debt by attachment, and on substituted process against a nonresident, where the attachment and process has been quashed by defendant's motion on special appearance, the plaintiff has the right to retain the case on the docket for new process and new attachment, if so advised, citing Park L. & I. Co. v. Lane, 106 Va. 304, 55 S. E. 690; Goolsby v. St. John, 25 Grat. (Va.) 146. In the case of Cooper v. Reynolds, 10 Wall. 308, 19 L. Ed. 931, the Supreme Court said:

"Now in this class of cases, on what does the jurisdiction of the court depend? It seems to us that the seizure of the property, or that which, in this case, is the same in effect, the levy of the writ of attachment on it, is the one essential requisite to jurisdiction, as it unquestionably is in proceedings purely in rem. Without this the court can proceed no further; with it the court can proceed to subject that property to the demand of plaintiff. If the writ of attachment is the lawful writ of the court, * * * and if it is by the proper officer levied upon the property liable to the attachment, when such a writ is returned into court, the power of the court over the res is established. The affidavit is the preliminary to issuing the writ. It may be a defective affidavit, or possibly the officer whose duty it is to issue the writ may have failed in some manner to observe all the requisite formalities; but the writ being issued and levied, the affidavit has served its purpose, and, though a revisory court might see in some such departure from the strict direction of the statute sufficient error to reverse the judgment, we are unable to see how that can deprive the court of jurisdiction acquired by the writ levied upon defendant's property."

The plaintiff filed his affidavit for attachment on March 15, 1920, before the return day of the summons, alleging the nonresidence of the debtor, and this, together with the return of the sheriff on the attachment showing property in the county, prevented the suit from being abated on the return day of the summons; although that return only disclosed that the defendant was "not found" in the county. Chapman v. Maitland, 22 W. Va. 329; Steele v. Harkness, 9 W. Va. 13.

[1] We conclude that plaintiff's case did not abate upon the order quashing his attachment on May 22, 1919, and that it was proper for him to retain the case on the docket for further process, "to have dismissed the action from the docket without according to him this right would have been error." Danser v. Mallonee, supra.

[2] Willis contends that the second affidavit for attachment, made and filed on June 10th, was void as not being filed in a pending suit, and besides that it is insufficient because it does not adequately state the nature of the plaintiff's claim. As the remedy by attachment is harsh and likely to be abused, purely statutory and summary, it is essential that the nature of the plaintiff's claim be so described that the court, as well as the debtor and all other persons interested, can see that the plaintiff has a just and valid claim against defendant. A careful inspection of this affidavit shows that plaintiff, defendant, and others entered into an agreement on August 23, 1913, to drill certain real estate in Pleasants county for oil and gas, each to pay his part of the expense and each to participate in the profits; that Willis owned a one-eighth interest; that the drilling proved unprofitable, and afterwards in March, 1914, was abandoned, when the aggregate expense amounted to $2,708.81, of which defendant owed $338.80. This he agreed to pay, but on March 17, 1914, requested plaintiff to pay said sum for him, which plaintiff then did, and which sum defendant then promised to repay to plaintiff. This he never did. The affidavit with minuteness details how the claim arose, and dates thereof, the amount, when and how contracted, and the promise to pay. Specific objection is made that the affidavit should have shown (but did not) the names of the others interested with plaintiff and defendant in the oil and gas explorations, as well as the persons to whom the sum of money became due by reason thereof, one-eighth of which sum the plaintiff paid at the instance and request of the defendant; also, that the boundaries of the oil and gas leases should have been shown, including the exact location of the lands. We cannot see how these facts can make clearer the "nature" of the plaintiff's claim. It would serve no purpose to set out the affidavit at large. The facts vary in each case, and it would likely be no precedent in other cases. We think the affidavit sufficiently states the nature of the plaintiff's claim. Surely neither the defendant nor any creditor could be misled. Upon the refusal of the court to strike the case from the docket, and to quash the second affidavit and dismiss the second attachment, defendant appeared generally, pleaded non assumpsit, the statute of limitations, and went to trial. It was held in Danser v. Mallonee, supra, that the entry of the motion to dismiss the case from the docket operated as a general appearance, and would sustain a personal judgment. That question is not material here. The only other question raised by the record is whether the plaintiff's debt was barred by limitation. There was no effort to bring the case within any of the exceptions contained in the statute; no special replication to the plea, and no proof offered. At the date when the defendant left the state and became a nonresident, the running of the statute stopped, but there was nothing to show when he departed, and no special replication on which such evidence could have been based. Laidley v. Smith, 32 W. Va. 387, 9 S. E. 209, 25 Am. St. Rep. 825. But it is clear from the evidence that the debt became due and payable on March 17, 1914, and as we decide that the suit began on March 13, 1919, and did not abate, the limitation had not expired. It was a live debt at the time of judgment.

There is no reversible error in the record, and we affirm the judgment.

Affirmed.

STATE v. HARRIS. (No. 4161.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
March 1, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Husband and wife §303—Indictment and information §2(4)—Criminal nonsupport statute not unconstitutional.

Properly construed, what is popularly known as the nonsupport statute, chapter 51, Acts 1917, secs. 16c(1)—16c(8), chapter 144, Barnes' Code, 1918 (Code Supp. 1918, c. 144, §§ 16e[1]—16e[8]), secs. 5179a—5179h, making it a criminal offense for a husband to desert, or willfully neglect or refuse to provide for the support and maintenance of, his wife in destitute or necessitous circumstances, does not contravene section 4 of article 3 of the Constitution of this state, nor the Fifth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States, and is not void by reason of anything in said constitutional provisions contained.

2. Husband and wife §303—Criminal nonsupport statute held not to vest jurisdiction to try offense on complaint therein authorized.

But said statute does not vest jurisdiction in any court to try, convict, or sentence any person accused of such offense, on the complaint therein prescribed and authorized.

3. Husband and wife §316—Complaint held sufficient to support award of support pendente lite.

Such complaint is sufficient process for an award of support to the wife, pendente lite, on a petition filed therefor and notice thereof to the accused.

4. Husband and wife §303—Motion to quash complaint under nonsupport statute held properly overruled.

A motion to quash a complaint filed under said statute and in the form prescribed by it, on the ground of conflict between the statute and the constitutional provisions above mentioned, is properly overruled.

5. Husband and wife §305—Defensive pleas to complaint under nonsupport statute held premature.

As such complaint is not a charge of the offense therein named, for the purposes of trial respecting it, but only for the purposes of such temporary support and preliminary examination and commitment or bail to answer an indictment for the offense, defensive pleas thereto are premature.

6. Husband and wife \S 316—Order for payments to wife under nonsupport statute without petition and notice held erroneous.

An order requiring the husband to make monthly payments to the wife, entered in such a proceeding without a petition therefor and without notice of an application therefor, after trial and conviction on such a complaint, and incorporated in the judgment rendered, is not an order providing for support pendente lite, authorized by section 3 of said act (Code Supp. 1918, c. 144, \S 16e[3], sec. 5179c), and, even though it might be within the jurisdiction of the court, and, if properly made, might stand as such an order, on reversal of the judgment and finding in other respects, it is at least erroneous, and will be reversed and set aside, along with the judgment and the finding of guilt of the offense.

7. Husband and wife \S 320—On reversal of conviction under nonsupport statute case may be remanded.

Upon such reversal, it is proper to remand the case for such procedure on the complaint and warrant, within the scope and limits of the statute, as may be available to the complainant.

Error to Circuit Court, Mason County.

Proceedings by the State against Z. L. Harris for nonsupport of complainant wife. Judgment requiring defendant to pay complainant a monthly sum and committing him to the county jail in default of a recognizance for personal appearance and for compliance with the order for support, and he brings error. Reversed except in so far as it overruled the motion to quash the complaint, and remanded for further proceedings.

Musgrave & Blessing and J. E. Beller, all of Point Pleasant, for plaintiff in error.

E. T. England, Atty. Gen., R. Dennis Steed, Asst. Atty. Gen., and Somerville & Somerville and B. H. Blagg, all of Point Pleasant, for the State.

POFFENBARGER, J. The judgment complained of on this writ of error was rendered in a proceeding by a wife against her husband, on the ground of nonsupport, under the provisions of sections 16c(1) to 16c(8) of chapter 144 of Barnes' Code of 1918 (Code Supp. 1918, c. 144, $\S\S$ 16e[1]–16e[8], secs. 5179a–5179h), and, in addition to a requirement that the defendant pay the complainant \$15 per month, for her support, until the further order of the court, it committed him to the custody of the sheriff and imposed upon him a sentence of imprisonment in the county jail with hard labor on the public roads, for a period of one year, unless he should enter into a recognizance in the penalty of \$800 with good and sufficient sureties, to make his personal appearance in court, when ordered so to do, and to comply with the terms of the order respecting support and any subsequent modification thereof.

[1] An argument founded upon section 4 of art. 3 of the Constitution of this state and the Fifth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and submitted in support of one of the assignments of error, assails the validity of the statute on which the proceeding is based. Properly construed and applied, it does not conflict with any constitutional provision. It was carefully examined and analyzed with reference to the constitutional inhibition of prosecution for major offenses, otherwise than upon presentment or indictment, and its validity affirmed, in Fisher v. Sommerville, 83 W. Va. 160, 98 S. E. 87.

[2] It was held in that case, however, that the complaint by which the proceeding is initiated performs a double function. For enforcement of the duty to render support; it suffices as process. Its sufficiency in that sense for the purposes of prosecution for the offense created by the statute was not necessarily intended. The Legislature could have intended to make it operate only for purposes of arrest and preliminary examination and commitment, in respect of the criminal offense; and we held that it had so intended, and therefore had not attempted to vest power and jurisdiction in any court, to entertain a prosecution for the offense, otherwise than upon presentment or indictment.

In its procedure on the complaint and warrant, the trial court has gone beyond what we so held could have been and was intended by the Legislature and done what that body did not necessarily intend to vest jurisdiction to do. It tried and convicted the accused on the complaint and without a presentment or indictment. If such jurisdiction could have been vested, the trial and conviction are void, under the interpretation put upon the statute in Fisher v. Sommerville, because it did not vest it. If, on the other hand, the Legislature had not power to vest it, by reason of constitutional limitations, but nevertheless attempted to do so, the trial and conviction are void.

It is unnecessary to inquire whether the limitation of the Constitution of the state, saying, "No person shall be held to answer for treason, felony or other crime, not cognizable by a justice, unless on presentment or indictment of a grand jury," is to be tested, in respect of its scope, by the jurisdiction of justices as it was at the date of the adoption of the Constitution, or by such jurisdiction as has been or may be subsequently fixed and determined by legislative action. The offense here involved did not exist at the date of the adoption of the organic law and it is not now cognizable by a justice. It was first created by chapter 13, Acts 1901, which made it an offense cognizable by a justice. That act was repealed by chapter 51, Acts 1917 (Code Supp. 1918, c. 144, §§ 16e[1]-16e[8], secs. 5179a-5179h), which vested the jurisdiction of the offense in the juvenile, circuit, intermediate, and criminal courts.

The interpretation put upon the statute by the trial court cannot be sustained. As so interpreted, it would be manifestly unconstitutional, because it would attempt to do what the Constitution expressly forbids. The clearly permissible construction put upon it in Fisher v. Sommerville avoids this consequence and effectuates the legislative purpose and intent. Repetition and elaboration of the reasoning upon which the conclusion expressed in that case is based are unnecessary. We perceive nothing of value that can be added.

It follows that, in so far as the order complained of finds the plaintiff in error guilty of an offense under the statute and sentences him to imprisonment and labor on the public roads, and provides for his release from such imprisonment and labor, by entry into a recognizance in the penalty and with the sureties and condition therein prescribed, it must be reversed, set aside, and annulled.

[3] The court had jurisdiction and power, however, to inquire, preliminarily, whether there was probable cause for holding the accused, by proper procedure, to answer an indictment for the offense, and to enter an order "providing for the support" of the complainant, "pendente lite." The procedure for accomplishment of the latter purpose includes a "petition of the complainant" and "notice to the defendant." Barnes' Code 1918, ch. 144, sec. 16c(3), Code Supp. 1918, c. 144, § 16e(3), sec. 5179c. But the order providing for support entered in this case, does not purport to be one for support "pendente lite." Although it requires payment of $15 per month, until changed or modified, it is carried into and made part of the judgment, and security of performance thereof is made a condition of release from the imprisonment and labor imposed by the judgment. Hence, it obviously provides for permanent support. Besides, the court made no inquiry as to the propriety of an order for mere temporary support. No petition therefor was filed nor was any notice of an application therefor served on the defendant. At any rate, the record discloses none. Two special pleas tendered by the defendant were rejected by the court, and his notice to quash the complaint overruled. Then issue was joined on his plea of not guilty, and he was tried and found guilty. The order for support followed all of this, wherefore it could not have been one for support "pendente lite." The litigation had come to a final order and judgment, when it was entered. It was part of the judgment.

Inasmuch as the judgment was void, the order might be within the jurisdiction of the court, since it heard the evidence relating to the status of the parties, and the complaint was sufficient to bring them into court, and has not been finally disposed of in the manner contemplated by law; but, if so, it was clearly erroneous, for lack of proper procedure, there having been no petition for it, no notice of an application for it, nor any inquiry as to the propriety of such an order.

[4] The motion to quash the complaint and warrant and special plea No. 1 were both founded upon the theory of unconstitutionality of the statute. A conclusion already stated sustains the overruling of the motion and rejection of that plea.

[5, 6] Special plea No. 2 would have set up an adjudication of permanent alimony payable monthly at the rate of $15 per month in favor of the complainant, by a court of the state of Arkansas. It was properly rejected. It did not aver payment of the alimony. If the complaint was true and the alimony not paid, disclosure of the judgment or decree was matter of aggravation rather than defense. A better ground of justification of its rejection, however, is that there was no indictment, no sufficient charge of an offense, for the purpose of trial, to which it could be interposed, if it would have been a proper plea to an indictment. Nor was there any petition for an order for support pendent lite to which it could have been interposed, if allowable in such case.

[7] Upon these principles and conclusions, the judgment complained of will be reversed, except in so far as it overruled the motion to quash the complaint, and the case remanded for such procedure on the complaint and warrant, within the scope and limits of the statute, as may be still available to the complainant, if she shall be advised to demand it.

BATES et al. v. BURDEN. (No. 2049.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. March 5, 1921.)

(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

1. Executors and administrators \S 199 — Where judgment setting aside year's support was void, infant, who did not ratify agreement, held entitled to recover undivided interest.

Where a judgment setting aside land as a year's support for the widow and minor children of a decedent insufficiently described the land, and it was subsequently agreed between the widow and children, two of whom were still minors, for whom the widow was guardian, that the proceeding should be amended, and a definite sum paid by the widow to each of the children, a minor, who received no part of the estate after his attainment of majority, and did no other act tending to ratify the acts of his mother, was entitled to recover an undivided interest in the part of the land which the mother had sold.

2. Appeal and error \S 1195(1)—Former decision is law of the case.

The decision on a former appeal is the law of the case.

Hill, J., dissenting.

Error from Superior Court, Elbert County; W. L. Hodges, Judge.

Suit by S. A. Burden against J. H. Bates and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Affirmed.

Geo. C. Grogan, of Elberton, for plaintiffs in error.

W. D. Tutt, of Elberton, for defendant in error.

ATKINSON, J. When this case was before the Supreme Court on a former occasion, the judgment refusing a new trial was reversed on account of error in rejecting an amendment to the answer. The decision rendered by this court was in the following language:

"Appraisers to set apart a year's support for a widow and minor children made a return, setting apart, among other things, 358 acres of insufficiently described land, and declaring that the widow should pay off specified debts of the deceased. She took possession of the property and paid off the debts. Subsequently the point was made by some of the children, after attaining majority, that the judgment setting apart the land as year's support was void on account of the failure to sufficiently describe the same. After obtaining legal advice, an agreement was entered into between the widow and all of the children, only two of whom were minors at the time (the widow having been appointed guardian for the minors), that proceedings be had in the court of ordinary for the purpose of amending the judgment, by adding an adequate description of the land. Accordingly proceedings were instituted, and an order was passed by the ordinary purporting to amend the judgment in accordance with the terms of the agreement. The agreement fixed a definite sum of money to be paid by the widow to each of the children, it being acknowledged that the widow was entitled to receive credit for the amount she had paid in settling the debts of the estate. For the purpose of obtaining the money to make the settlement with the children portions of the land were sold by the widow. On attaining his majority one of the minor children, the defendant in error, received property to the value of $150 under said settlement, and afterwards filed suit in ejectment against the purchasers of a portion of the land for a one-seventh undivided interest. The equitable amendment to the answer alleges that the sums of money agreed upon were accordingly paid to all of the children, the widow, as guardian for the minors, receiving the sums due them. The defendants, in addition to the general denial, offered an amendment setting out all of the facts above stated. The court rejected the amendment on the ground that the original judgment setting aside a year's support was void and could not be amended. After introduction of evidence by the plaintiff the court directed a verdict in his favor. The defendants filed pendente lite exceptions to the rejection of the amendment offered by them, and in the bill of exceptions assigned error thereon. They also moved for a new trial, and excepted as to the judgment overruling the motion. Held, that it was erroneous to reject the amendment. The rights of the parties rest upon the agreement between the widow and all of the children, and not upon the judgment. The parties owning the entire interest agreed that the mother should have all of the property upon payment of the debts and of a fixed sum to each child. This agreement was not attacked for fraud, and is binding upon all of the adult parties, and upon the defendant in error because of his ratification after attaining his majority. In this connection see Winn v. Lunsford, 130 Ga. 436, 442, 61 S. E. 9. The rejection of the amendment deprived the defendants of a defense, the evidence of which they were entitled to submit to a jury. The court erred in overruling the motion for a new trial." Bates v. Burden, 148 Ga. 157, 96 S. E. 178.

[1, 2] After the remittitur was made the judgment of the trial court, the defendants were allowed to amend their plea in accordance with the decision of the Supreme Court, and they introduced evidence in support of the plea as amended. The only evidence tending to show payment to the plaintiff for his part under the decision was payment to his mother as his guardian. There was no evidence that he received any part of the estate after his attainment of majority, or that he did any other act tending to ratify the act of his mother. There was no evidence that the widow elected to take a share of her deceased husband's estate as an heir at law. The decision by this court above set forth is the law of the case, and the judge did not err in directing the verdict for the plaintiff for an undivided one-seventh interest in the land.

Judgment affirmed.

All the Justices concur, except HILL, J., dissenting.

A grantee or alienee of property causing a nuisance is not liable for damages caused by its continued maintenance and accruing prior to a notice or request to abate.

Certiorari from Court of Appeals.

Suit by I. M. Roberts and others against the Georgia Railway & Power Company. A judgment for defendant was affirmed by the Court of Appeals (24 Ga. App. 664, 101 S. E. 813), and plaintiffs bring certiorari. Affirmed.

Vickery's creek, known also as "Big Creek," is a tributary to the Chattahoochee river, and approaches the river at the town of Roswell from the north side. The Laurel Mills Manufacturing Company owned several tracts of land forming one body at and near the confluence of the two streams. This body of land bordered the river above and below the mouth of the creek, and included the bed of the latter stream. On this land was a water power supplied by waters from the creek. In 1862 the Laurel Mills Manufacturing Company developed the water power, and erected and equipped a factory near the juncture of the two streams. As a part of the manufacturing plant there were certain buildings located along the river front and on both sides of the creek. The natural fall in the bed of the river was sufficient to carry the water off without overflow or injury to the buildings, machinery, or other property of the manufacturing plant or interference with its operation. In 1902 the Atlanta Water & Electric Power Company, a chartered public service corporation, constructed a dam across the river at Bull sluice, about three miles below the mouth of Vickery's creek, which was of such height and character as to elevate or cause back water in the river at and above the Laurel Mills property. Subsequently the Atlanta Water & Electric Power Company sold its property to the Georgia Railway & Power Company, another public service corporation, and executed a deed, dated March 8, 1912. The Georgia Railway & Power Company took possession under that deed, and continuously maintained the Bull sluice dam in carrying on the work for which it was incorporated. On August 5, 1911, I. M. Roberts, G. W. Wing, and J. P. Brooke became purchasers of the Laurel Mill property, and received a deed therefor from the trustee in bankruptcy of the Laurel Mill Company. Subsequently G. W. Wing sold his undivided interest in the property to his cotenants, and executed a deed to them, dated June 9, 1917. On June 28, 1917, I. M. Roberts and J. P. Brooke instituted an action for damages against the Georgia Railway & Power Company, on the basis of injury to their said property by a continuing nuisance. In stating the nuisance and its injurious effects, the petition alleged, among other things:

"On or about the year 1902, there was constructed a dam across the said Chattahoochee river approximately 50 feet high at a point known as Bull sluice about three miles below the properties above described, thereby creating a large reservoir which extends up to, alongside of, above, and beyond the properties of petitioners, and which is used by the defendant, in connection with its power house and machinery, in generating electricity. * * * That the erection of said dam and the creation of said reservoir, and the continued maintenance by the defendant of said dam and reservoir, has created a nuisance, and is a continuing nuisance, which has been a nuisance [since] the same was built and constructed, and which is now a nuisance, and has been maintained by the defendant since on or about March 6, 1912, and is now being maintained by the defendant as a permanent and continuing nuisance to the injury and damage to the petitioners to the amount herein alleged. * * * The defendant acquired title to said dam and reservoir on or about March 6, 1912, since which time defendant has continued to maintain, and is now maintaining, the same as a continuing nuisance as herein set out, and to the great injury and damage to the petitioners in the amounts specified herein. * * * The erection of said dam and the construction of said reservoir, and the continued maintenance of the same by the defendant, has been and is a continuing nuisance, for the reason that it has caused and is causing the waters in said river to pond up, and to deaden the flow and retard the velocity, and to back water up to, alongside of, above and beyond the properties of the petitioners, and into the railway and up to and into the power house, and over the turbine wheels used in driving the machinery in petitioners' factory, causing large deposits of sand, dirt, logs, rafts, drifts, and brush and [to?] accumulate and be deposited in the bed of said stream, forming in places islands consisting of several acres. * * * Said conditions have been gradually growing worse from year to year and from time to time, especially so since the acquisition of said property by the defendant, and are gradually continuing to grow worse all the time. * * * Since the erection of said dam and reservoir and its maintenance by the defendant, the bed of said stream, which was formerly rock, clear of sand, is now covered with mud and sand to a depth of several feet in places below petitioners' properties and alongside of petitioners' properties, and the water in said stream has been elevated and raised several feet, which is shown along the banks of petitioners' properties and the tailway of petitioners' power house, which said deposits of sand and mud and the elevation of said waters have checked and impeded the flow in said tailway and impaired the value and affected and injured petitioners' power plant and the properties of petitioners as herein set out."

Special damages attributable to the continuance of the nuisance, sustained by plaintiffs, were alleged to arise from reduction of power of plaintiff's water power, rendering it inefficient, and necessitating an abandonment of the operation of the factory; from flooding the factory and certain buildings along the river front in time of high water, causing injury to the factory machinery and the several buildings and depreciating their market value; from the creation of "foul odors and obnoxious stenches, causing miasma and malaria," thereby rendering certain houses uninhabitable and decreasing their market value; from enforced shutting down of the factory, causing certain houses occupied by employees of the factory to become useless and of less market value. The petition alleged a right of the plaintiffs to recover all such damages as flowed to them from the causes stated above, within the four years preceding the institution of the suit. It is also alleged that on the 8th day of June, 1917, petitioners gave written notice, as required in Civil Code, § 4458, to the Georgia Railway & Power Company, as owner by assignment of the Bull sluice dam and reservoir, to abate the same as a nuisance. No demurrer was filed, but the defendant answered. On the trial there was no evidence of damage on account of "foul odors" and "obnoxious stenches," but there was evidence tending to show title in the plaintiffs as alleged, and injury to their property as described in the petition; but there was no evidence to show any change in the dam after the defendant purchased the property, or any special damages or injury to the property during the 18 days intervening between the date of the notice and the date of the suit. There was evidence as to certain flashboards on top of the dam; but the deed to defendant shows that this equipment was part of the dam at the time of the purchase by it. At the conclusion of the plaintiffs' evidence, the judge granted a nonsuit. The plaintiffs excepted. The judgment of the trial court having been affirmed by the Court of Appeals, the case is here for decision on certiorari.

Richard B. Russell, of Atlanta, Richard B. Russell, Jr., of Winder, and Fred Morris and Campbell Wallace, both of Marietta, for plaintiffs in error.

Colquitt & Conyers, of Atlanta, for defendant in error.

ATKINSON, J. As shown by the allegations of the petition, the action is based on continuance of a nuisance created by the defendant's grantor in 1902. There is no allegation that the defendant made any change in the dam after its purchase. The evidence as to occasional use of certain flashboards on top of the dam did not show a change in the use of the dam, because the deed to the defendant shows that the flashboards constituted a part of the dam at the time of its purchase. Such being its character, the case is not one for application of the ruling in Middlebrooks v. Mayne, 96 Ga. 449, 23 S. E. 398, to the effect that a notice is not "essential to the maintenance of an action against the alienee for injuries occasioned by changes made by himself in the character or structure of the nuisance."

The controlling question in this case is whether the grantee or alienee of property causing a nuisance is liable for damages caused by its continued maintenance and accruing prior to a notice or request to abate the same. The cause of action in the case of Bonner v. Welborn, 7 Ga. 296, may be summarily stated thus: In 1843 Alfred Welborn erected a milldam on his own land, adjoining the property known as the "Meriwether Warm Springs," then the property of Seymour R. Bonner. In 1845 Seymour R. Bonner sold and conveyed this property to Robert Bonner. In 1847 Robert Bonner instituted an action for damages against Alfred Welborn on the basis that the millpond formed by constructing the dam across the stream was a nuisance, and that its continuance during the year 1846 had rendered the vicinity unhealthy, which injuriously affected the plaintiff's hotel business at Meriwether Warm Springs and caused him pecuniary loss. A verdict for the defendant was returned. The plaintiff excepted, assigning error on certain rulings of the court on the admissibility of evidence, and upon an excerpt from the charge to the jury. The judgment was reversed, one of the judges dissenting. Separate opinions were rendered by each of the three judges. The defendant Welborn was not an assignee, but was the original builder of the dam and the owner of the same when the action was brought; and consequently the exact case now for decision was not involved. However, the controlling question involved was learnedly discussed by each of the judges, and the seventh headnote of the opinion is as follows:

"The alienee of the person who erected the nuisance is liable for the continuance of the nuisance, but only on request to abate it."

After citing a number of English cases and enunciating certain pertinent principles, Judge Nisbet in his opinion said:

"The conclusion from these principles is irresistible that he who does hurt or damage to another in the use of his own property is liable without notice or request. There is but one exception to this rule, and that is where the assignee of him who erected the nuisance is sued. This exception, to my mind, is not altogether consistent with the principles upon which this kind of action is founded. The authorities, however, recognize it, as will appear, and I yield to authority."

Further he said:

"As to the exception, that request is necessary where the action is against the alienee of him who first erected the nuisance, I have to say that it is sustained in the case of Penruddock, 5 Coke, 100, also in 2 Greenl. Rep. 36. I do not question this rule on authority. The alienee is liable, because he continues the nuisance, which is the same as a new wrong."

Judge Lumpkin concurred in the general views and reasons of Judge Nisbet, and proceeded to deliver an elaborate opinion in the course of which he referred to the question of notice to abate. After discussing a number of English cases, he said:

"Up to this period, we find nothing in the books of notice, as between any parties. But Penruddock's Case (5 Coke, 101) established the doctrine that where suit is brought against the feoffee of the person who erected the nuisance a previous request to abate it was necessary; and from that time this distinction seems to have been generally followed, both in England and in this country."

After discussing other cases it was again said:

"Thus it is manifest that whenever and wherever the doctrine has been discussed the principle in Penruddock's Case has been constantly cited, and always adhered to, without variability or shadow of turning, which is, that in an action for a continuance of the nuisance, against the feoffee of the wrongdoer, whether at the instance of the original proprietor of the property injured or his assignee, request must first be made, but that as against him that committed the wrong, the original erector or promotor of the nuisance, no notice is necessary, no matter who sues. [Italics ours.] And, as was rightly said in Winsmore v. Greenbank, 'The law is certainly so, and the reason is obvious.' And hence we conclude that the present action is properly brought against Welborn, who erected the nuisance, and who continued to keep it up, without notice."

It thus appears that Judge Nisbet and Judge Lumpkin both were of the opinion that the principle announced in Penruddock's Case was the law. The reversal, under application of that principle, was on the ground that Welborn was the original constructor of the nuisance, and not entitled to notice, under the principle of Penruddock's Case. Judge Warner delivered an elaborate dissenting opinion, in the course of which he dealt with the same question. He also agreed that the principle announced in Penruddock's Case was the law, but, applying that principle, said in effect that, inasmuch as Robert Bonner did not own the Warm Springs property at the time Welborn constructed the dam, he was not injured by the original construction of the nuisance, and that relatively to him, an alienee acquiring the Warm Springs property to 1845, and suffering consequential damage to his business in 1846, Welborn could only be held liable on the basis of his being a continuor of the original nuisance, and that he would not be guilty of any wrong, as against Robert Bonner, until notice or request from him to abate. In the course of his discussion of this subject the judge said:

"When, in the eye of the law, could the defendant be considered as a wrongdoer, as against the rights of the plaintiff, with regard to the Warm Springs property? From the time he became the owner of the property, and notified him that his milldam was injurious to such property, and requested him to remove it."

It thus appears that the principle of Penruddock's Case was recognized by the entire bench of three judges, and that under application of that principle there was no disagreement as to the necessity of giving to an alienee notice to abate the nuisance, before such alienee would become responsible for injuries resulting from such nuisance. The only point of difference was as to the necessity of notice to abate, given to the creator of the nuisance, where the person injuriously affected was himself an alienee and did not own the property injured at the time the nuisance was created. The opinions rendered by the judges, sanctioning as authority the decision in Penruddock's Case, pronounced a principle declaring the responsibility of an alienee for continuing a nuisance created by another. These opinions cannot be read without reaching the conclusion that the judges rendering them contemplated that such responsibility of an alienee would commence with the giving of notice to abate the nuisance. More than 10 years after the rendition of that decision the first Civil Code of this state was adopted by the General Assembly, within which appeared the following section (Code of 1863, § 2943):

"The alienee of a person owning the property injured, may sue for a continuance of the nuisance; so the alienee of the property causing the nuisance is responsible for a continuance of the same. In the latter case, there must be a request to abate before action brought."

This language has appeared in every subsequent Civil Code of the state, and is now section 4458 of the Civil Code of 1910. This is a codification of the common law as interpreted in the decision of Bonner v. Welborn, supra; and it now has the force of statute law.

The great contention of the plaintiffs is that the words, "before action brought," as employed in the Code section, denote merely a remedial requirement that notice be given before institution of a suit, rather than that such notice is a requirement before responsibility for continuance of the nuisance will attach to the alienee of the nuisance. In support of such contention counsel cite and discuss the case of Penruddock and decisions of courts and text-writers that preceded and followed it, including the several opinions of the judges in Bonner v. Welborn, supra, and other decisions of this court. In Central Railroad v. English, 73 Ga. 366, it was held:

"Where one railroad company erected a nuisance, and was subsequently leased to another company, which continued to maintain such nuisance, if the owner of the property on which it was situated notified the president and officers of the lessee company of it, and his tenant also notified the section master of the company, this was sufficient notice and demand for abatement, and the tenant could bring an action for injuries resulting to him without more. Notice of the nuisance is sufficient."

This ruling that notice to the alienee of the existence of the nuisance is a sufficient compliance with the law is incompatible with the contention that the "request to abate," referred to in the Code section, is a mere remedial requirement.

In Southern Railway Co. v. Cook, 106 Ga. 450, 453, 32 S. E. 585, 586, it was said:

"If, however, a person come into possession of property upon which there is an existing nuisance, before an action can be maintained against such person for continuing the nuisance, it is essential that there should be a request to abate it before any liability for maintaining the same would arise"—citing Bonner v. Welborn, supra, 7 Ga. 314; W. & A. R. Co. v. Cox, 93 Ga. 561, 20 S. E. 68; Middlebrooks v. Mayne, supra.

So in Blackstock v. Southern Railway Co., 120 Ga. 414, 416, 47 S. E. 902, 903, it is said (immediately after quoting the Code section):

"If before an action can be brought against the alienee of the property causing the nuisance, there must be a request to abate the nuisance, then it is evident that no cause of action arises against such alienee until such request is made. The cause of action against him is continuing a nuisance after having been notified of its existence and requested to abate it."

What is quoted from the two last cases was necessarily said in showing the difference in the two causes of action under discussion, and therefore was not obiter, as counsel contends. See, also, 20 R. C. L. 392, § 16, and cases cited under note 8. The request to overrule Southern Railway Co. v. Cook and Blackstock v. Southern Railway Co., supra, is denied.

Giving to the Code section the construction that the notice to abate, therein referred to, is not merely remedial, but is a provision that must precede responsibility of such alienee, the Court of Appeals did not err in affirming the judgment granting a nonsuit. Judgment affirmed.

DUMAS et al. v. RIGDON, Tax Collector,
et al. (No. 2088.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. March 4, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Schools and school districts \S 107—Taxpayers not intervening in proceeding to validate bonds or suit to enjoin issuance not entitled to injunction against collection of tax.

This being an equitable petition to enjoin the collection of a tax to pay the principal and interest of bonds issued for the purpose of building a schoolhouse in a designated school district, and it appearing that the bonds, the legality of which had been attacked, had been duly validated, and after they had been validated a petition was brought by certain taxpayers to enjoin their issuance, and the petitioners in this case having failed to intervene either in the proceeding to validate the bonds or in the subsequent proceeding to enjoin their issuance, the petitioners will not now be heard to attack the legality of the bonds. The court did not err in refusing an injunction.

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

2. Schools and school districts \S 107—In suit to enjoin collection of tax to pay bonds, held, that it might be assumed that they had passed into hands of innocent purchasers.

Where school district bonds were validated in August, 1918, and in a suit to enjoin collection of a tax for their payment it is not alleged that they have not passed into the hands of innocent purchasers, it may be assumed, from the length of time since their issuance and the failure to deny the fact, that they have passed into the hands of innocent purchasers.

Error from Superior Court, Tift County; R. Eve, Judge.

Suit by B. F. Dumas and others against T. S. Rigdon, tax collector, and others. An injunction was refused, and plaintiffs bring error. Affirmed.

B. F. Dumas and others, citizens and taxpayers of the county of Tift, and who reside in and own property within that portion of said county which is alleged to be contained in the Chula school district, as defined by the county board of education, brought their petition against T. S. Rigdon, tax collector of the county, R. E. Hall and the other members of the board of commissioners of roads and revenues, J. D. Cook and others composing the board of education of the county, and A. J. Ammons, county superintendent of education, praying for injunction to restrain the enforcement of a tax levy made for the year 1918, for the purpose of paying the principal and interest upon a bond issue of the school district for the purpose of building and equipping a schoolhouse, and for other equitable relief. It is alleged that the levy of the tax referred to is illegal and void, because the Chula school district, within which the taxes were levied and which will be collected unless enjoined, is not now and has not been at any time heretofore a legally created school district within the meaning of the statutes relating to the subject of taxation for the purposes indicated; that the entire territory of Tift county has never been laid off into school districts, nor have the district lines been defined and marked as required by law, nor have the school districts been laid off according to law; but they have been laid off in disregard of the provisions of the statutes upon that subject; that no map of the county showing the school districts, as required by law, has been made; that certain specified lots were illegally transferred to the Chula school district; that several lots in the county were not in any school district, and that some four or five lots, containing an aggregate of some 2,000 acres of land, were illegally taken from the Chula district; that, upon other grounds specified, a division of the county into school districts, if ever made, was illegally made, without reference to best interest and the convenience of those who were included in and excluded from the district; that the territory from which the tax is to be collected is incapable of exact determination, never having been exactly laid out, marked, and defined, as required by law; that the board of commissioners of roads and revenues are without authority to levy and assess the tax complained of; and that for other reasons the levy is illegal. The defendants filed an answer and a demurrer and also a plea of res adjudicata. The court, after considering the case and the evidence submitted, refused the injunction.

Bussey & McNicholas, of Cordele, and R. L. Tipton, of Ashburn, for plaintiffs in error.

Fulwood & Hargrett, of Tifton, for defendants in error.

BECK, P. J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] Under the pleadings and the evidence in the case the court did not err in refusing the injunction. The bonds in question were duly validated in accordance with the provisions of the Civil Code 1910, § 445 et seq., relating to bonds and their validation. Questions of whether the law in regard to laying off the county into school districts had been complied with, and whether other steps were taken by the proper county authorities to make this laying off and division of the county into school districts conformable to law, as embodied in section 1531 et seq. of the Civil Code, upon the subject of school districts and local tax for public schools, could and should have been made in the proceedings to validate the bonds, the legality of which is now challenged.

The school district here in question was created in June, 1918. Shortly thereafter an election to determine whether bonds should be issued was held, and in due course the bonds were validated, the order validating the bonds having been passed on August 17, 1918. On June 13, 1919, A. W. Whiddon, a citizen and taxpayer of the Chula school district, filed his petition against I. M. H. Fletcher, L. W. Whiddon, and A. E. Whiddon, trustees of the district, in which the legality of the issuance of the bonds in question was attacked, alleging that they had not then been sold, but the trustees of the school district were then negotiating for their sale and were about to sell them, and praying for an injunction to prevent the sale. The judge refused the injunction. The petitioner sued out a writ of error to this court, and it was held, in deciding the case:

"Where an election, held to determine whether bonds should be issued for the purpose of building and equipping a schoolhouse in a local school district, resulted in favor of such issuance, and the bonds were duly validated in accordance with the terms of the Civil Code of 1910, § 445 et seq., a citizen and taxpayer of the district who could have made himself a party to the proceedings to validate the bonds, but failed to do so, was concluded by the judgment rendered, and could not thereafter enjoin the levy and collection of a tax to pay the interest and principal of the bonds, and the issuance and sale, on the ground that there had never been levied in said district as a unit, distinguished from other districts of said county and from the county itself, a local tax for school purposes as provided by the act of 1912, Acts 1912, p. 176; Park's Ann. Pol. Code, § 1545 (a)." Whiddon v. Fletcher, 150 Ga. 39, 102 S. E. 350.

[2] The illegality of the bonds in that case was urged upon different grounds, it is true, from that taken here; and the plaintiffs in error insist that it was a friendly suit. Nevertheless the petitioners could have joined in that suit and have raised the grounds of illegality here set forth, and could have carried on the litigation in a manner entirely serious and not open to the charge that it was a friendly suit. We do not rule that the suit of Whiddon v. Fletcher and the decision in that case would sustain the plea of res adjudicata; but it should be taken into consideration in passing upon the question as to whether the judge properly refused the injunction in the present case, and the decision rendered in the Whiddon Case is directly applicable to the question presented here. And it is not amiss to state here that there is no allegation that the bonds in question have not been passed into the hands of innocent purchasers. And that such is the case, the length of time since their issuance and the failure upon the part of the petitioners to make denial authorize us to assume.

Judgment affirmed.

LATIMER v. BRUCE. (No. 1844.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. March 5, 1921.)

(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

1. Ejectment \S 69—When land described in petition, answer describing it as "premises in dispute" held sufficient.

Where the petition, in an action to recover the possession of land, described the land minutely, an answer which, after responding to the allegations of the petition, set up an equitable title under a parol contract with plaintiff's remote grantor, sufficiently described the land as "the premises in dispute."

2. Ejectment \S 69—Answer held to allege contract for land on valuable consideration notwithstanding use of word "give."

In an action to recover land, an answer alleging a parol contract by plaintiff's remote grantor to give defendant the property if she would occupy the house and furnish him with table board for the rest of his life did not use the word "give" as denoting a technical gift, but alleged a contract on a valuable consideration.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Give.]

3. Ejectment \S 69 — Answer alleging parol contract of sale with plaintiff's grantor held not demurrable.

In an action to recover land, an answer alleging a parol agreement by plaintiff's remote grantor that, if defendant would occupy the house and furnish him with table board for the rest of his life, he would give her the property, to take effect immediately, was not subject to general demurrer.

4. Trial \S 191(3)—Instruction to determine what contract meant and whether it was meritorious held to assume its existence.

In an action to recover land in which defendant pleaded a parol agreement by plaintiff's remote grantor to give her the property if she would occupy it and board him for the rest of his life, an instruction to take the case and see what the truth was and see what the contract meant and whether it was meritorious and complied with, etc., was erroneous as assuming the existence of the contract, and thus intimating or expressing an opinion on the facts of the case.

5. Trial \S 236(1)—Instruction held inaccurate as requiring jury to believe witnesses unless discredited.

An instruction that, when a witness had not been attacked or impeached or his credibility impaired and had not been contradicted, the jury was authorized, and it was their duty to believe him, and that they could not capriciously disregard the testimony of a witness not contradicted, rebutted, impeached, or attacked according to law, was inaccurate as absolutely requiring the jury to believe the witness, if not discredited in one of the ways pointed out.

Error from Superior Court, Cobb County; Moses Wright, Judge.

Action by P. B. Latimer, Jr., against Marietta Bruce. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Mozley & Gann and Anderson & Roberts, all of Marietta, for plaintiff in error.

McElreath & Scott and Geo. F. Gober, all of Atlanta, and C. M. Dobbs, of Marietta, for defendant in error.

PER CURIAM. 1. In an action of complaint for land the petition, described the land minutely. The answer admitted that the defendant was in possession of the land, but denied that the plaintiff owned it. After responding to the allegations of the several paragraphs of the petition, the answer proceeded to set up an equitable title under a parol contract with the plaintiff's remote grantor. This part of the answer as amended described the land as "the premises in dispute." The alleged parol contract was, in substance, that if the defendant would occupy the house and furnish the plaintiff's grantor with table board for the rest of his life, he would give her the property, the gift to take effect immediately, and would himself continue to pay the taxes and insurance. Held:

[1] (a) Construing the answer as amended in connection with the allegations of the petition specifically describing the property in dispute, the answer sufficiently described the property.

[2] (b) The word "give," as employed in the answer, when considered in connection with the context, does not denote a technical gift. The answer alleges a contract upon a valuable consideration.

[3] (c) The court did not err in overruling the general demurrer to a part of the answer setting up the contract.

[4] 2. Upon the ground that it assumed the existence of "the contract," thereby intimating an expression of opinion by the court, error is assigned, in one ground of the motion for new trial, upon the following charge of the court:

"So, under the rules of law I have given you in charge, take this case and see what the truth is; see what the contract meant, whether it was meritorious and complied with, whether she has what we call in law an equity; and, if you find she has, you ought to find in favor of the defendant."

The exception to this charge is well founded. The existence of the contract is assumed, and this fact was a contested one involving a controlling question in the case; and under the positive provisions of the statute inhibiting an intimation or expression of opinion by the judge upon the facts of the case, the error requires the grant of a new trial. This necessarily results from the charge quoted; for it stands separate and distinct from those parts of the charge in which the court had properly submitted to the jury a question of fact to be determined by them, whether the contract had been made or not, and is in the last paragraph of the court's charge.

[5] 3. Error is also assigned upon the following charge of the court:

"I charge you, in connection with witnesses, that you can't capriciously disregard testimony. Where a witness has not been attacked or impeached, or his credibility impaired, and has not been contradicted by other evidence, the jury would be authorized and it becomes their duty to believe such witness. They can't capriciously disregard the testimony of a witness unless the same has been contradicted, rebutted, impeached, or attacked in some of the ways known to the law."

This charge is not entirely accurate, in that it absolutely requires the jury to believe a witness if he is not discredited in one of the ways pointed out in immediate connection with this requirement; but, when this charge is considered in connection with what preceded it, it will not in itself require the grant of a new trial.

4. No other assignment of error shows cause for the grant of a new trial, and the case is returned for another hearing upon the grounds indicated. No opinion is expressed as to the sufficiency of the evidence.

Judgment reversed.

THORNTON v. GERMANIA FIRE INS. CO.
(No. 1799.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. March 5, 1921.)

(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

Appeal and error \S 1123—Case returned without instructions, when court equally divided on question certified.

Where the Justices of the Supreme Court are evenly divided on a question certified by the Court of Appeals, the case will be returned to the Court of Appeals without instructions, under Const. art. 6, \S 2, par. 9 (Civ. Code 1910, \S 8506).

Certified Question from Court of Appeals.

Action by M. E. Thornton against the Germania Fire Insurance Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brought error to the Court of Appeals, which certified a question to the Supreme Court. Question not answered.

G. R. Nottingham, of Sylvester, and E. E. Cox, of Camilla, for plaintiff in error.

Passmore & Forehand, of Sylvester, and King & Spalding, of Atlanta, for defendant in error.

PER CURIAM. This case came before this court on a question certified by the Court of Appeals, as follows:

"The policy of fire insurance sued upon contained a provision that, subsequent to the burning of the property insured, the insured 'shall, if required, furnish a certificate of the magistrate or notary public (not interested in the claim as a creditor or otherwise, nor related to the insured) living nearest the place of fire, stating that he has examined the circumstances and believes the insured has honestly sustained loss to the amount that such magistrate or notary public shall certify.' Following this and other provisions, the policy contained the following stipulation: 'No suit or action on this policy for the recovery of any claim shall be sustainable in any court of law or equity until after full compliance by the insured with all the foregoing requirements, nor unless commenced within twelve months after the fire.' By an amendment to her petition the plaintiff admitted that before suit she did not furnish the required certificate of the magistrate or notary public referred to above, but in paragraph B of her amendment she set up the following reason why the certificate was not furnished: 'B. That the magistrate or notary public not interested in the claim as a creditor or otherwise nor related to the insured, living nearest the place of fire, was — Sheppard, and he, the said Sheppard, declined and refused to make any statement or furnish any certificate stating he had examined the circumstances and believed the insured had honestly sustained loss to the amount claimed by her or to any amount to be stated by such magistrate, for the reason, as given by him, that he had not seen the plaintiff's property that was so destroyed by fire as above set forth, that he knew no facts upon which he could base an opinion to be expressed in such certificate, and therefore declined to make any statement whatever concerning the same, though requested so to do by the plaintiff herein for the purpose of furnishing said certificate to the defendant herein. * * * The plaintiff further alleged in her amendment, in effect, that she made a bona fide effort to furnish the required certificate, but that, as the magistrate refused to give it when requested; it was impossible for her to comply with this provision of the policy, and that under such circumstances this provision is not binding upon her and should not operate to defeat her right to bring suit upon the policy. Under these circumstances did the court err in striking, on the motion of the defendant, paragraph B of the amendment to the petition, on the ground that it was irrelevant and immaterial, and afforded no valid excuse for the plaintiff's failure to furnish the required certificate?'"

The question certified being for decision by a full bench of six Justices, who are evenly divided in opinion, FISH, C. J., and HILL and GILBERT, JJ., being of the opinion that the court did not err in striking the amendment to plaintiff's petition, and BECK, P. J., and ATKINSON and GEORGE, JJ., being of the opinion that the court did err in striking the amendment to plaintiff's petition, it is considered and adjudged that the case be returned to the Court of Appeals without instructions, as provided in article 6, section 2, paragraph 9, of the Constitution (Civil Code, § 6506).

JONES v. JONES. (No. 2123.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. March 8, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Executors and administrators \S 544—Petition against one fraudulently representing herself as widow as executor de son tort held to state cause of action.

According to the principles ruled in Allen v. Hurst, 120 Ga. 763, 48 S. E. 341, the plaintiff's petition as amended set out a cause of action under Civ. Code 1910, § 3886, and accordingly the court did not err in overruling the general demurrer.

Error from Superior Court, Troup County; J. R. Terrell, Judge.

Suit by Mary Jones, for herself and as next friend of Bertha Jones, against Nancy Jones and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant named brings error. Affirmed.

Mary Jones, for herself and as next friend of her minor daughter, Bertha Jones, brought an equitable petition against Nancy Jones and La Grange Savings Bank, alleging that Mike Jones, the husband of Mary and father of Bertha Jones, died on December 10, 1918, owing no debts, and leaving an estate of the value of $2,000, consisting of cash on deposit in bank, wheat, corn, hogs, and other personal property; that he had deserted petitioners several years prior to his death, and they did not know of his death until some time after it occurred; that upon making inquiry they learned that Nancy Jones, fraudulently representing herself to be the widow of Mike Jones and the mother of two minor children by him, had procured from the court of ordinary of Troup county a judgment setting apart to her as year's support $700 in cash and all of the household and kitchen furniture; that petitioners were ignorant, uneducated negroes, residing outside of Troup county and in Carroll county, and they had no knowledge of the application for year's support until after the judgment had been entered; that the $700 in cash was withdrawn by Nancy Jones from La Grange National Bank and placed by her on deposit in La Grange Savings Bank; that Nancy Jones was never married to Mike Jones; that any children born to them were not born in lawful wedlock, and neither she nor they were entitled to inherit from him; that Nancy Jones had taken possession of and converted to her own use the entire estate, and was wasting and dissipating the same; that she was insolvent and unable to respond in damages upon any judgment which might be obtained against her; that there had been no administration on said estate, and no one had the legal right to take charge of the same; that Nancy Jones had fraudulently procured possession of the proceeds of a policy of insurance upon the life of Mike Jones, made payable to Bertha Jones; that Nancy Jones is an executrix de son tort, and as such liable in double the value of the property which she has wrongfully taken possession of and converted to her own use. The prayers are that Nancy Jones be enjoined from changing the status of the estate, from disposing of any of the property, and from withdrawing the money on deposit in La Grange Savings Bank, and that the bank be enjoined from paying the same out, that a receiver be appointed to take charge of the estate and collect the assets, for judgment, and for special lien on the funds on deposit with La Grange Savings Bank.

The defendant demurred to the petition on the grounds: (1) It does not entitle plaintiff to the relief prayed. (2) The cause of action, if any, vests only in the administrator of the deceased, and not the heirs at law. (3) The allegations of fraud are not sufficient to authorize a court of equity to set aside the judgment of the court of ordinary. (4) No cause of action is set forth. Exception is taken to the overruling of the demurrer.

M. U. Mooty, of La Grange, for plaintiff in error.

W. T. Tuggle, of La Grange, for defendant in error.

WELLS v. FIRST NAT. EXHIBITORS' CIRCUIT, Inc., et al. (No. 1959.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. March 4, 1921.)

(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

1. Contracts \S 323(1)—Between lessee of moving pictures and third person held not to show inability to perform obligations to lessor.

Where the evidence warranted a finding that plaintiff, under a contract with defendant leasing certain moving pictures, had an exclusive right to exhibit the pictures, contracts between plaintiff and a third party, by which plaintiff agreed to permit the third party to use the pictures so far as he was able to do so, and another contract providing that the third party agreed to give plaintiff the use of its theaters for the exhibition of the pictures held not to show as a matter of law such change in conditions as disabled plaintiff from complying with his obligations to defendant and waived performance by defendant of the contract.

2. Parties \S 59(2)—Amendment to substitute as plaintiff one obtaining interest in contract pending suit properly disallowed.

Where, pending a suit by a lessee having an exclusive right to exhibit moving pictures to prevent the exhibition of such pictures by others, plaintiff made contracts with a third party for the exhibition of the pictures in its theaters, proposed amendments to the petition, substituting such third party as plaintiff alone or jointly with the original plaintiff, held properly disallowed.

Hill, J., and Beck, P. J., dissenting.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; J. T. Pendleton, Judge.

Suit by Jake Wells against the First National Exhibitors' Circuit, Incorporated, and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

The basis of the litigation is a contract entered into between First National Exhibitors' Circuit, Incorporated, and Jake Wells, under which Wells claimed he had acquired the exclusive right to exhibit within the city of Atlanta, during a given period of time, certain moving pictures, and which contract he alleged the other party had breached by permitting the exhibition of one of the pictures by Criterion Theater Company, in Atlanta, during the period covered by his contract. A full statement of the contentions will be found in the report of the case when it was here previously. Wells v. First National Exhibitors' Circuit, 149 Ga. 200, 99 S. E. 615. The clause of the contract under which the plaintiff claimed the exclusive right to exhibit the pictures in question is as follows:

"Undersigned exhibitor hereby leases from First National Exhibitors' Exchange eight Charlie Chaplin special releases six days on each such release on — of each week, first week after release date, and agrees to keep and perform the terms herein provided and pay the amounts specified herein. Each subsequent release after the first to be used on the same day or days of the week at the same number of days after release date. Theater owner, Jake Wells. Theater name, —. Seating capacity, —. Street address, —. City of Atlanta. Population, 175,000. State, Georgia. Price of the entire series of eight releases, $2,000 to be paid in installments as per contract below and on reverse side."

Upon the final trial of the case the plaintiff introduced in evidence a contract made between himself and Carolina Amusement Company, dated December 12, 1919, as follows:

"Witnesseth: That whereas, Jake Wells has heretofore contracted with the First National Exhibitors' Circuit for certain moving picture films to be exhibited in the cities of Atlanta and Augusta, Georgia, especially one series known as the Charlie Chaplin releases, and several others; and whereas, litigation has been instituted by the said Jake Wells with the said First National Exhibitors' Circuit and the Criterion Theater Company, now pending in Fulton superior court; and whereas, the Carolina Amusement Company desires to obtain the use of such pictures as may have been contracted for by the said Jake Wells from the said First National Exhibitors' Circuit: Now, therefore, in consideration of the payment by said Carolina Amusement Company of the sum of four hundred ninety-one and $\frac{65}{100}$ (\$491.65) dollars, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, and the agreement on the part of said Carolina Amusement Company to pay all expenses of said litigation which may have been incurred, and which may hereafter be incurred, including court costs, and the further agreement of said Carolina Amusement Company to execute any and all bonds which may be required during the course of such litigation, and to hold the said Jake Wells harmless from any liability growing out of the execution of any such bonds, even if the said Wells be a party thereto, the said Jake Wells hereby agrees to permit, so far as he is able to do so, the Carolina Amusement Company to use such pictures as may be released to him under any and all said contracts pertaining to the cities of Atlanta and Augusta, the said Carolina Amusement Company paying to him the release price as provided in said contracts, and the said Wells further agrees that upon the termination of said litigation; or its settlement, which settlement shall be controlled by said Carolina Amusement Company, to execute transfers of such contracts, conveying any and all the interest that he may have therein to said Carolina Amusement Company, without recourse on him. It being distinctly understood and agreed that, until the final determination of said litigation, the title to said contracts and all rights thereunder shall remain in the said Jake Wells, except as herein stated. And the said Carolina Amusement Company further agrees to hold the said Jake Wells harmless against any claims growing out of said contracts, or the actions now pending or hereafter instituted, by any person or concern whatsoever."

He also introduced a subsequent contract made between the same parties on January 19, 1920, as follows:

"Whereas, the undersigned, Jake Wells and the Carolina Amusement Company, entered into a certain agreement dated the 12th day of December, 1919, covering the exhibition, etc., of certain films known as Charlie Chaplin releases, a copy of which contract is hereto attached and made a part hereof; and whereas, certain rights therein sought to be given by Jake Wells to the Carolina Amusement Company may be subject to objection by the owners or distributors of such films: Now, therefore, in order to obviate any possible objection of the parties to said agreement as aforesaid, for and in consideration of $5 each to the other in hand paid, do now mutually agree to this supplemental agreement, to wit: That in lieu of that part of the original agreement wherein Jake Wells agrees to permit, so far as he is able to do so, the Carolina Amusement Company to use such pictures as may be released to him under the contracts therein referred to, and the said Carolina Amusement Company agreeing to pay him the release price as provided in said contracts, the Carolina Amusement Company now agrees to give Jake Wells the use of the Forsyth or Rialto Theaters in Atlanta, Georgia, and the Augusta Theater in Augusta, Georgia, and Jake Wells agrees to use said theaters for the purpose of exhibiting any and all of the said Charlie Chaplin releases. The Carolina Amusement Company is to have and receive 66% per cent. of the net receipts arising from the exhibition of each of such pictures, and the balance of the net receipts to belong to Jake Wells, the said Wells to pay all charges of the First National Exhibitors' Circuit, Incorporated. It is further mutually agreed that the control of the litigation referred to in said original agreement shall be exclusively in Jake Wells, and that the title and all interests in said lease contracts shall remain in him."

At the conclusion of the introduction of the plaintiff's evidence, the Criterion Theater Company moved for the grant of a nonsuit on the ground that no conspiracy had been proved against it, which motion was overruled. It then moved for the grant of a nonsuit on the ground that under the contracts between Wells and Carolina Amusement Company, above set out:

"The plaintiff, having sold the contracts and his interest in the litigation, had no right to proceed in the case and was entitled to no remedy because of said contracts, and that there was no mutuality of remedy as between plaintiff and defendants."

Thereupon the plaintiff offered the following amendment to his petition:

"Plaintiff asks that said case proceed for the joint use of himself and of the Carolina Amusement Company, a corporation, for the reason that said Jake Wells has entered into contracts with the Carolina Amusement Company" —being the contracts set out above, which amendment having been disallowed, he offered the following amendment:

"Plaintiff asks that said case proceed for the use of Carolina Amusement Company, a corporation, for the reason that said Jake Wells has entered into contracts with Carolina Amusement Company"

—being the contracts above set out. This amendment was also disallowed, and a nonsuit was awarded. Exception is taken to the judgment disallowing the two amendments to the petition, and to the award of a nonsuit.

Dodd & Dodd and Rosser, Slaton, Phillips & Hopkins, all of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error.

J. A. Branch, Herbert J. Haas, E. A. Neely, and McDaniel & Black, all of Atlanta, for defendants in error.

PER CURIAM. 1. When this case was first before this court, the contract forming the basis of the suit was construed to be ambiguous, and it was held:

"Where the true meaning of such a contract is equivocal, the circumstances existing when the contract was made, as well as the existence of a custom so well known that the parties must have contracted with the intention that it would apply to their contract, may be shown by parol evidence."

2. It was also held:

"Where, on the interlocutory hearing of an equitable petition to enjoin a breach of a contract upon the ground that the damages which the plaintiff may suffer will be incapable of ready computation and ascertainment, the judge, upon conflicting evidence, reaches the conclusion that the plaintiff has established a right to an injunction, and accordingly grants the same, it is erroneous to allow the defendants to dissolve the injunction upon the giving of a bond to answer the final judgment."

3. The evidence on the interlocutory hearing was conflicting as to whether Wells was granted the right to the exclusive presentation of the pictures.

4. On final trial, as shown by the record now before us, the evidence was substantially the same as on the interlocutory hearing and would have authorized a verdict for Wells, finding that he was entitled to the exclusive privilege of exhibiting the films under the conditions named in the contract.

[1] 5. Under the evidence it was error for the court to award a nonsuit on the ground that as matter of law there had been such a change in conditions as to ownership, control, and character of the theaters as to show inability of Wells to comply with his obligations under the contract, and to constitute a waiver upon his part of performance by First National Exhibitors' Circuit, the other party to the contract.

[2] 6. The judgment disallowing amendments to the petition was not erroneous.

Judgment reversed.

All the Justices concur, except BECK, P. J., and HILL, J., who dissent.

HILL, J. (dissenting). In Tifton, Thomasville & Gulf Ry. Co. v. Bedgood, 116 Ga. 945, 43 S. E. 257, it was held:

"Contract rights coupled with liabilities, or involving a relation of personal confidence between the parties, cannot be transferred to a third person by one of the parties to the contract without the assent of the other."

Mr. Justice Little, in delivering the opinion of the court in that case, said:

"All choses in action arising under contract may be transferred. Executory contracts of a certain character may likewise be transferred. The rule universally recognized is that 'rights arising out of contract cannot be transferred, if they are coupled with liabilities, or if they involve a relation of personal confidence such that the party whose agreement conferred those rights must have intended them to be exercised only by him in whom he actually confided.' Pollock on Contracts (4th Ed.) 425, and authorities cited. Mr. Clark in his work on Contracts, (page 524), citing a number of authorities, declares that it is a settled rule that a person can not assign his liabilities under a contract, or, 'to put the matter from the point of view of the other party to the contract, a person cannot be compelled to accept performance of the contract from a person who was not originally a party to it.' The same author, in dealing with this subject, also says that a person 'may so assign with the consent of the other party to the contract; but this is, in effect, a rescission by agreement, and the substitution of a new contract.' All the modern text-writers, so far as we have been able to ascertain, recognize that the doctrine above cited from Mr. Pollock is fully established. See Hammond on Contracts, § 355, and note 48 of page 724; Hollingsworth on Contracts, 295; Harriman on Contracts, p. 228, § 382; Anson on Contracts, 287. Possibly the leading modern case in which the doctrine of the assignability of such contracts as this is most fully discussed and applied is that of Arkansas Smelting Co. v. Belden, 127 U. S. 379. In the course of the opinion in that case Mr. Justice Gray, who delivered it, in support of the ruling there made says: 'At the present day, no doubt, an agreement to pay money, or to deliver goods, may be assigned by the person to whom the money is to be paid or the goods are to be delivered, if there is nothing in the terms of the contract, whether by requiring something to be afterwards done by him, or by some other stipulation, which manifests the intention of the parties that it shall not be assignable. But every one has a right to select and determine with whom he will contract, and cannot have another person thrust upon him without his consent. In the familiar phrase of Lord Denman, 'You have the right to the benefit you anticipate from the character, credit, and substance of the party with whom you contract.'"

And see Taussig v. Corbin, 142 Fed. 660, 73 C. C. A. 656, where it was said:

"A contract by which complainant was given the exclusive right to sell in a specified territory certain patented articles to be sold to him by the other party as required, and by which he agreed to push the sale of the articles, the contract to continue so long as he did so, was in effect one for continuing the personal service on his part, which he could not specifically enforce in equity, for want of mutuality in the remedy."

See, also, Pomeroy's Eq. Jur. § 1405.

The contract in this case between Jake Wells and the First National Exhibitors' Circuit, Incorporated, provided that Wells leased eight Charlie Chaplin releases for six days on each release for the first week after the release date, and by the terms of the contract Wells agreed to keep and perform the terms of the contract and to pay the amounts specified therein, etc. Wells was designated as the owner of the theater in which the pictures were to be exhibited. Other portions of the contract refer to the prices to be paid and when payment shall be made, and the agreement is subject to the conditions on the back of the contract. One of the conditions on the back of the contract, which Wells agreed to, is that he is not to show the films leased in any other theater or theaters, or on any other dates than those specified, except with the consent of the lessor in writing. There are other agreements of minor importance.

In view of the authorities cited above, the provisions of the contract, and the evidence, I think that the contract between Wells and the First National Exhibitors' Circuit, Incorporated, is one which is not assignable without the consent of the First National Exhibitors' Circuit, and that consent is wanting, so far as the pleadings and the evidence disclose. The contract is an exclusive one, which could not be assigned by Wells, and although he offered in evidence an agreement between himself and the Carolina Amusement Company, in which he appears to have bought back the rights that he had sold, he is in the position of a purchaser from the third person to whom he had sold. He is not, therefore, in a position to assert that he had the exclusive right to exhibit the films in Atlanta, for the reason that he himself had violated the terms of the contract between himself and the First National Exhibitors' Circuit, which he claims was exclusive, and, this being a case in equity, before he can ask equity he must do equity. When Wells sold all of his theaters in Atlanta and his interest in the films to the Carolina Amusement Company, he put it beyond his power to perform his part of the contract with the First National Exhibitors' Circuit, and it could not, under such circumstances, compel specific performance from Wells. Where there is an absence of mutuality of remedy, specific performance cannot be enforced.

Nor could Wells remedy the situation in which he had placed himself by making a new contract, under the terms of which the Carolina Amusement Company was to permit Wells to use either the Forsyth or Rialto Theaters, which had formerly been owned or leased by Wells, and sold by him to the Carolina Amusement Company, for the reason, as stated above, that the First National Exhibitors' Circuit had the right to rely upon Wells performing the original contract as agreed, and the duties and liabilities imposed by the contract could not be carried out by exhibiting the films in a theater owned or leased by the Carolina Amusement Company, and conducted by that company and not by Wells. The First National Exhibitors' Circuit had the right to expect and to demand that the contract between it and Wells be carried out in good faith by Wells, and no one else, in a theater owned and conducted under his management, where whatever of reputation he had made in the moving picture world might be of benefit to the First National Exhibitors' Circuit. The contract between the First National Exhibitors' Circuit and Wells was made to the latter individually, and the very nature of the contract involved personal service and exhibiting the films in certain theaters which were then owned and conducted by Wells in Atlanta, and the contract was not, under the above authorities, assignable.

From what has been said, and the authorities cited, it follows as a matter of law, that the court did not err in disallowing the offered amendments to the petition, nor in awarding a nonsuit.

BARMORE et al. v. GILBERT. (No. 2057.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. March 4, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Life estates — Money, etc., should not be intrusted to life tenant without security, unless will so provides; life tenant held not entitled to possession without security, though remaindermen joined in her petition.

Where the subject-matter of a life estate is money or its equivalent, or is such property as must be converted into money before possession of the same shall be intrusted to the life tenant, security should be required to preserve the fund for the remainderman, unless a contrary intention of the testator appears in the will. Applying this ruling to the petition in this case, to require the executor to deliver to the life tenant, without security, the money and promissory notes belonging to the estate, the judge presiding without a jury did not err, in view of the provisions of the will, in refusing to grant the petition.

Error from Superior Court, Cobb County; D. W. Blair, Judge.

Proceeding by Mrs. J. F. Barmore and others against E. G. Gilbert, executor. Judgment in favor of the executor, and the petitioners bring error. Affirmed.

J. F. Barmore died testate. The provisions of his will (omitting the first item, relating to the payment of his debts) were as follows:

"Item Two. I will, devise, and bequeath to my beloved wife, Josephine Barmore, all the property, both real and personal, that I may die seized of, for and during her natural-life or widowhood.

"Item Three. I desire and direct that my wife shall use only the income from my property, and under no condition is she to encroach on the corpus as the income of money that I have now loaned out will be ample for her support and maintenance, she also having the use of my house.

"Item Four. At the death or marriage of my said wife, I will and direct that all of my property, or the proceeds thereof, be equally divided among my children.

"Item Five. If any of my children should die before the final division of my estate, leaving child or children, then said child or children shall take the share that the deceased parent would have taken had they been in life.

"Item Six. I hereby nominate and appoint my friend, E. G. Gilbert, as executor of this my last will and testament.

"This May 3, 1917."

After 12 months had elapsed from the qualifications of the executor, the widow and the five children of the testator cited the executor to an accounting in the court of ordinary, and in their petition prayed that he be required to deliver to the widow, the life tenant, the entire estate of the testator in his hands, without requiring bond or security from her. The executor answered, and the proceeding was appealed to the superior court, where by consent the case was tried by the judge without a jury. On the hearing it appeared that the estate of the testator consisted of both realty and personalty, the latter being a comparatively small amount of money, and a much larger proportion of promissory notes, which had been given to the testator by various persons; that most of the notes had been collected by the executor, and the money so received had been loaned by him on real estate securities; that he had turned over to the widow all of the real estate, and after the payment of debts of the testator the executor had paid to her the interest on the money and the notes in his hands. The only issue tried by the judge was whether the executor, upon the petition of the widow and the children of the testator, in view of the provisions of his will, should be required to deliver to the widow the money and promissory notes belonging to the estate in the hands of the executor in accordance with the prayers of the petition. The judge decided the issue against the petitioners, and they excepted.

Geo. F. Gober, of Atlanta, for plaintiffs in error.

Wm. Attaway and Anderson & Roberts, all of Marietta, for defendant in error.

FISH, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). As to the rights and liabilities of a tenant for life, Civil Code (1910) § 3666, declares:

"The tenant for life is entitled to the full use and enjoyment of the property, so that in such use he exercises the ordinary care of a prudent man for its preservation and protection and commits no acts tending to the permanent injury of the person entitled in remainder or reversion. For the want of such care, and the willful commission of such acts, he forfeits his interest to the remainderman, if he elects to claim immediate possession."

So in Bowman v. Long, 26 Ga. 142, it was held:

"The tenant for life in property is entitled to the possession of the 'corpus' of the property for his own use, subject to a right in the remaindermen to have the property in a state of security, to be forthcoming to them, on the termination of the life estate."

Because of this duty to preserve and protect the estate in remainder, the relation of the life tenant to the remainderman has been held to be, to a certain extent, a fiduciary one, and termed an implied or quasi trusteeship. 17 R. C. L. 626, note 10. In order to protect remaindermen, the early practice in England was to require security from the life tenant before allowing him to take possession of personal property of any character, to the use of which he had become entitled by bequest; but a distinction was drawn later between specific bequests of property and those of the residue of an estate, and some courts have held that, where specific articles are left to legatees for life, with remainder over, all that is required, in the absence of a showing of danger of loss or waste, is that an inventory thereof be indorsed by the life tenant, with acknowledgment that these were held for life only, with title in the remaindermen. Where, however, the property, for which the use for life is bequeathed is money or its equivalent, or is the residue of an estate which is money or its equivalent, or is such property as must be converted into money, a different rule obtains. As such property may be easily lost or wasted, the general rule, unless it is to be inferred from the language of the will that the life tenant is to have possession, is that he must give reasonable security to preserve the funds for the remaindermen. Where the testator has directed that the life tenant have possession of the funds, it has been held that even then the matter of exacting security is regarded as discretionary with the court; and if the testator has not seen fit to require such security, the court will not require it, unless it is shown that there is danger of loss, either because of the irresponsibility of the life tenant, his removal of the estate beyond the jurisdiction of the court, or some similar reason, since the requirement of security might impose on the life tenant a burden which he could not discharge, and thus the intention of the testator would be defeated. 17 R. C. L. 626, 627 (17). The matter of a life estate in money or its equivalent, and the rights of a life tenant in relation thereto, has been under consideration several times by this court. In Thornton v. Burch, 20 Ga. 791, it was held:

"Money, notes, and accounts may be limited over, after the determination of a life estate. * * * A gift over of his whole estate, real and personal, after the determination of an estate for life, is a bequest of the money, as well as other property."

In Chisholm v. Lee, 53 Ga. 612, it was held:

"Where money is bequeathed to the widow for life, and at her death to the heirs of the testator, it is the duty of the executor to invest the principal, and to pay over the interest to the widow, so as to preserve the former for the benefit of those ultimately entitled."

See same case, 56 Ga. 126.

In Phillips v. Crews, 65 Ga. 274, it was held:

"A life estate in money, with remainder over, may be created. Money may be lost, but it should not be destroyed in the use."

In the opinion is this language:

"But it is said that neither an estate in remainder, nor a limitation over, can be created in money, because it is such property as is destroyed in the use. Sometimes it is lost in the use, but it should never be so with trust money. He who undertakes to execute a trust is charged with the duty of seeing to it that it is not destroyed in the use; the income may be destroyed by its use, for it was so intended, but the corpus must be preserved for the remaindermen. A life estate may be created in money, and section 2253 of the Code [Civil Code of 1910, § 3664, declaring that an estate for life cannot be created in such property as is destroyed in the use] does not allude to money, but to such things as perish with the usage. In 20 Ga. 793, it is ruled that there can be as little doubt of the executor's liability to account to the remaindermen for the money and notes left by the testator as the other property."

In Crawford v. Clark, 110 Ga. 729, 36 S. E. 404, it was held:

"A remainder may be created in money; and an executory bequest of money, limited upon a definite failure of issue, is valid."

The will there involved directed that the executor should pay the money to the daughter, to whom the life estate was given, when she should arrive at 21 years of age or marry. The daughter married before her majority. It was said in the opinion:

"If the bequest had given her a separate estate, the will, which was the law for the executor in this case, expressly required the possession of the money to be given to her. In such event he could not hold the money and pay her only the income thereof. But as the bequest did not create a separate estate in the daughter, under the law as it then stood [1847] the marital rights of the husband attached."

The prior decisions of this court on the subject of a life estate in money, to which we have referred, were cited. In De Loney v. Hull, 128 Ga. 778, 58 S. E. 349, it was held:

"Where an executor holds certificates of stock or certificates of indebtedness issued by a railroad company, which, by the terms of the will, are bequeathed to a person, to go over to another in the event he dies 'without leaving a family,' and where, in a suit in chancery for an accounting and other relief, it is decreed that the executor 'shall at once turn over and deliver' to the legatee the property bequeathed to him to be held by him under the will, the executor has the right, before surrendering the certificates, to indorse thereon memoranda to the effect that the certificates are held by the legatee under the terms of the will."

In Thomas v. Owens, 131 Ga. 248, 62 S. E. 218, strongly relied on by counsel for plaintiffs in error, a part of the first item of the will was as follows:

"I devise and bequeath to my said sister [Margaret W. Thomas] for life my interest in Guinas plantation, Habersham county, Georgia, and on her death I devise and bequeath my said interest in said plantation to my niece, Mary B. Thomas, and her heirs."

The will then disposed of other properties of the testatrix. Mary W. Thomas and George W. Owens were appointed executors of the will, which authorized them, or either of them, to sell and dispose of the property of the testatrix at public or private sale as might be deemed best, and to reinvest the proceeds of the sale in such property as may be deemed to the best interest of the estate, without any order of court being applied for or had for such sales or investments. A codicil was in this language:

"I republish and reaffirm said will, save and except that I direct that my estate shall not be divided during the lifetime of my sister, Margaret W. Thomas, but shall be held together until her death. I bequeath to my said sister Margaret W. Thomas, the income from my estate during her life, and on her death direct that said estate be divided as devised and directed in my will last mentioned."

It was held:

"A life estate for Margaret W. Thomas was carved out of the estates devised to the other legatees. * * * There being no debts, Margaret W. Thomas is entitled to have possession of the estate of the testatrix from the executor. * * * Upon the death of Margaret W. Thomas, all the property not devised to her in fee is to be divided among the other legatees in the manner indicated in the will."

In the opinion it was said:

"Having come to the conclusion * * * that by force of the codicil Mrs. Thomas takes a life estate in the property devised to the other legatees, the next question is whether Mrs. Thomas is entitled to the possession of the estate, or should it remain with the executors until the death of Mrs. Thomas, and then be divided by them? There is no pretense that the estate owes any debts. Mrs. Thomas is sui juris and laboring under no disability. She is entitled to the full use and enjoyment of the property devised to her, unless restrained by the will and codicil. She is as much entitled to the possession of the estate devised for life as that devised in fee, if the will does not give possession to the executors until her death. A tenant for life is entitled to the full use and enjoyment of the property. Civil Code, § 3090. In this respect there is no difference between realty and personalty. As was said in Bowman v. Long, 26 Ga. 146: 'In a life estate the tenant is entitled to have the possession of the property for his own enjoyment; and all that the remainderman can require is that the "corpus" of the property shall be kept in preservation, to be delivered to him on the termination of the life estate. * * * Of course, this rule must be subordinate to the rule that the corpus is to be so kept that it shall be preserved for delivery to the remainderman, on the termination of the life estate. The law has ways by which it can effect this object, and yet not deprive the tenant for life of the use and profits of the property during his life. It can require him to give security for the forthcoming of the property at the termination of the life estate.' Crawford v. Clark, 110 Ga. 732, 36 S. E. 404; Brantley v. Porter, 111 Ga. 886, 36 S. E. 970; Walker v. Watson, 32 Ga. 264. We take it to be well settled therefore, that, unless otherwise provided in the will and codicil, Mrs. Thomas is entitled to the possession of the property devised to her, to the exclusion of the executor."

It is further said:

"It is emphasized that the testatrix directs that her estate shall not be divided during the lifetime of her sister, Mrs. Thomas, and shall be kept together until her death. This provision of the codicil emphasizes the testamentary intent that Mrs. Thomas should have undisturbed possession of the whole estate until her death, when the several estates in remainder are to become estates in possession. The executor is not a trustee for any of the legatees; he holds for neither Mrs. Thomas nor the remaindermen. The codicil is satisfied if the property is not divided until Mrs. Thomas's death; and the holding should be by her, in the absence of a contrary declaration by the testatrix."

This decision was in accord with the general rule announced in Civil Code, § 3886, hereinbefore quoted. The rulings in that case are not in conflict with those made in the prior cases to which we have referred, but the prior decisions collated in Crawford v. Clark, supra, are approvingly cited. The exact question whether, in the absence of intention of the testator, the life tenant should have the possession of the money or its equivalent, without giving security, for the protection of the remaindermen, was not presented or decided in the case of Thomas v. Owens.

In view of the provisions of the will here involved, the case falls squarely within the general rule (21 C. J. 986, cases in note 64), that, where the subject-matter of a life estate is money or its equivalent, or is such property as must be converted into money, before possession of the same shall be intrusted to the life tenant, security should be required, unless the will shows a contrary intention of the testator. There is nothing in the will indicating that the testator intended that the life tenant should have the possession of the money and promissory notes belonging to his estate, either with or without security, but the strong intimation is that she should not have possession at all; for he directs in item 3 that she shall use only the income from his property—

"and under no condition is she to encroach on the corpus, as the income on money that I have now loaned out will be ample for her support and maintenance, she also having the use of my house."

This provision, considered in connection with the entire will, seems to exhibit the purpose of the testator to be that, as the income on the money he had loaned out would be sufficient for her maintenance, she should not receive the corpus of the fund, even for its investment and management so as to make on it an income to which she would be entitled. The petition is that the executor be required to deliver to the widow, the life tenant, the possession of the entire estate in his hands, and that this be done without requiring any security to be given. The five children of the widow joined with her in the petition. If they are all the children, still they may not be all of the remaindermen who may be interested in the property of the testator under the provisions of the will. The living children of the testator who joined in the petition may now have children of their own. There is nothing in the record as to this. Or they may hereafter have children; and should the petitioning children, or some of them, die before the death or marriage of the life tenant, leaving children, then such last-named children would take the interest of their deceased parents. What may happen cannot be now known; and the only protection for the executor, in view of the contingencies that may arise, is to require security before so much of the estate of the testator as consists of money, or its equivalent, shall be delivered to the life tenant.

The only question presented for decision to the trial judge sitting without a jury was whether, under the petition, the executor should be required, in view of the provisions of the will, to deliver all the money and promissory notes belonging to the estate to the life tenant without requiring of her security. He refused to require the executor so to do, and we hold that he did not err.

Judgment affirmed.

CATO v. SOUTHERN RY. CO. (No. 1862.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. March 5, 1921.)

(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

1. Carriers ⇐241—Master and servant ⇐88
(6)—Pullman conductor not a "passenger" or "employee."

One in the employ of the Pullman Company as conductor, under a contract whereby he ratified a contract between his employer and the railroad company and agreed that he should not have the rights of a passenger, and that it should not be liable for any injuries sustained by him, was not an "employee" or a "passenger" of the railroad company, but sustained a special contractual relation; the liability for injuries to the Pullman company's employees, not pertaining to the public duty resting on the railroad company as a common carrier, but arising solely from the contract.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Employé; Passenger.]

2. Courts ⇐217—Questions whether contract is void and whether demurrer was properly sustained cannot be certified to Supreme Court.

Questions whether a contract between the Pullman Company and an employee was null and void, or barred the employee's right to recover for injuries, and whether the court erred in sustaining the demurrer and dismissing the petition, are not such questions as the Supreme Court is required or authorized to answer, when certified by the Court of Appeals.

Atkinson, J., dissenting in part.

Certified Questions from Court of Appeals.

Action by T. F. Cato against the Southern Railway Company. Judgment dismissing the petition, and plaintiff brought error to the Court of Appeals, which certified certain questions to the Supreme Court. Certain of the questions answered, as stated in the opinion, and others not answered.

Reuben R. Arnold, of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error.

Harris, Harris & Witman, of Macon, for defendant in error.

PER CURIAM. The Court of Appeals certified the following questions:

"T. F. Cato sued the Southern Railway Company, alleging, in part, that he was in the employment of the Pullman Company as conductor; that 'he, as said Pullman conductor, had no responsibility for the running of defendant's train, but only looked after the passengers in the Pullman car, and the plaintiff alleges that the defendant, under these circumstances, owed him the duty of extraordinary care'; that he was injured by a collision between two trains at Reids, on the line of said railway company between Jacksonville, Fla., and Atlanta, Ga.; that he was permanently injured, and the railway company was negligent in several particulars specified; and he prayed for damages. Plaintiff amended his petition, and attached thereto, as Exhibit A, a copy of an agreement signed by him and the Pullman Company, and prayed that 'the said instrument, in so far as the same may purport to relieve any corporation of its liability to plaintiff for its negligence, shall be declared by this court to be null and void.'

"The material portions of the contract, Exhibit A., signed by T. F. Cato, are as follows:

"Atlanta, Ga., July 6, 1907. Be it known, that I, the undersigned, hereby accept employment by, and enter into or continue from this date in the service of, the Pullman Company, upon the following express terms, conditions, and agreements, which, in consideration of such employment and the wages thereof, I do hereby make with the Pullman Company, to wit:

"First. So long as I shall remain in said employment and service, I will fully comply with all regulations, rules, and orders of said company or its agents, issued for the government of its employees, go wherever I may be required in said service, and well, faithfully, and honestly perform all duties assigned to me.

"Second. My wages shall at all times be calculated and paid at the monthly rate per day for the number of days I shall have been actually employed, and I may quit or resign, or may be suspended or discharged from such employment, at any time, or at any place, without previous notice. * * *

"Fourth. I assume all risks of accidents or casualties by railway travel, or otherwise, incident to such employment and service, and hereby, for myself, my heirs, executors, administrators, or legal representatives, forever release, acquit, and discharge the Pullman Company, and its officers or employees, from any and all claims for liability of any nature or character whatsoever, on account of any personal injury or death in such employment or service.

"Fifth. I am aware that the said Pullman Company secures the operation of its cars upon lines of railroad; hence my opportunity of employment, by means of contracts wherein said the Pullman Company agrees to indemnify the corporations or persons owning or controlling such lines of railroad against liability on their part to the employees of said the Pullman Company in cases provided for in such contracts; and I do hereby ratify all such contracts made or to be made by said the Pullman Company, and do agree to protect, indemnify, and hold harmless said the Pullman Company with respect to any and all sums of money it may be compelled, or liability it may be subject to, under any such contract, in consequence of any injury or death happening to me; and this agreement may be assigned to any such corporation or person and used in its defense.

"Sixth. I will obey all rules and regulations made or to be made for the government of their employees by the corporation or persons over whose lines of railroad the cars of said the Pullman Company may be operating while I am traveling over said lines in the employment or services of said the Pullman Company; and I expressly declare that while so traveling I shall not have the right of a passenger with reference to such corporations, or persons, which rights I do expressly renounce; and I hereby, for myself, my heirs, executors, administrators, or legal representatives, forever release and acquit or discharge any and all such corporations and persons from all claims for liability of any nature or character whatsoever, on account of any personal injury or death to me while in said employment or service.'

"To the petition as amended a demurrer was filed; and upon a hearing thereof the following order was passed: 'Demurrer sustained, and the plaintiff's petition dismissed.' To this order the plaintiff excepted. Copies of all the pleadings are in the record. The Court of Appeals wishes to know:

"(1) Under the contract, a copy of which is attached to the amended petition and marked Exhibit A: (a) What relation did the Pullman conductor sustain to the railway company? (b) What diligence did the railway company owe the Pullman conductor?

"(2) Is the said contract 'in its essence a contract between master and servant'?

"(3) Is the contract 'in effect a contract by which the carrier undertakes to relieve itself from the consequences of the negligence of itself and servants'?

"(4) Is said contract null and void, or is it a bar to the plaintiff's right to recover, under all of the allegations in the petition?

"(5) Did the court err in sustaining the demurrer and dismissing the plaintiff's petition?"

[1] 1. The Pullman conductor was not an employee or a passenger of the railway company. The relation he sustained to that company was entirely contractual, under the special terms of the contract. The special service which the railway company was, under the contract, to render to the Pullman Company, incident to which its conductor was to be carried in its cars while performing the services for which it employed him, did not pertain to the public duty resting upon the railway company as a common carrier, but arose solely from its contract with the Pullman Company, ratified by the conductor in his contract with the latter company. Baltimore & Ohio, etc., Ry. Co. v. Volgt, 176 U. S. 498, 20 Sup. Ct. 385, 44 L. Ed. 560, and cases cited; Denver, etc., R. Co. v. Whan, 39 Colo. 230, 89 Pac. 39, 11 L. R. A. (N. S.) 432, 12 Ann. Cas. 732, and numerous cases collated in the notes to the principal case in the last two reports); Hughson v. Richmond, R. Co., 2 App. D. C. 98.

[2] 2. The foregoing ruling covers in substance the questions certified by the Court of Appeals, except those numbered 4 and 5, which are not such as this court is required or authorized to answer under the law authorizing the Court of Appeals to certify questions to the Supreme Court, as was ruled in the case of English v. Rosenkrantz, 150 Ga. 817, 105 S. E. 613.

All the Justices concur, except ATKINSON, J., dissenting as to the first headnote (division of decision).

MOORE et al. v. McAFEE. (No. 2096.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. March 4, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. New trial §15—Exceptions to order making parties not proper ground.

Exceptions assigning error upon an order of court making parties cannot properly be made a ground of a motion for new trial.

2. Parties §53—Where motion was treated as amendment making a new defendant and he filed a disclaimer, he was a party.

Although no rule nisi issued against B. H. Ray, calling upon him to show cause why he should not be made a party defendant, where plaintiff's counsel filed a written motion that said Ray be made a defendant, and this application was treated as an amendment to the pleadings, and the amendment was allowed by order of the court, and the party named filed his pleadings disclaiming title, and in such disclaimer referred to himself as a party defendant, objections to evidence based upon the ground that the person named was not a party to the suit were properly overruled.

3. Deeds §38(1)—Not void for uncertainty because not giving district in which land is located.

A deed containing the description, "a parcel of land lying in Crawford county, on Deep creek, in the ——— district of said county, and known as the south half of lot 30 in a survey of said district and containing 101¼ acres," is not void for uncertainty merely because it does not set forth the district in which the lot specified is located. It would be competent to show by parol testimony, if such was the case, that there was only one lot 30 in that county on the creek named.

4. Evidence §332(1)—Order for sale of land and administrator's deed held admissible though order did not describe land and bill was lost.

The decree and order from the superior court, directing the administrator to sell the assets of the estate remaining in the hands of the administrator, and reciting that it was granted in a specified case which arose upon a bill to marshal assets, and that it appeared to the court from the bill that the only asset of the estate was the land described in the bill, was properly admitted in evidence over the objection that it did not describe the land in controversy, and did not furnish authority to the administrator to sell any land unless accompanied by the bill in which the land was described, as there was a presumption that the bill referred to was in existence at the time of the granting of the order, and its loss or destruction could not prevent the introduction in evidence of the order itself and the deed executed in pursuance thereof at the sale by the administrator.

5. Deeds §38(1) — Not void for uncertainty when describing land as lots and parts of lots but also giving name.

A deed containing the description, "lots 32 and 33 containing 202½ acres each, also lots and parts of lots 29 and 30 and 35 in the Sixth district of said county, containing 450 acres, more or less, with mill site and water privileges thereon, said tract being known as Old Grant Mill Place," was not void for uncertainty in the description of the land intended to be conveyed; for the identity of the tract of land known as Old Grant Mill Place could be shown by parol evidence.

6. Boundaries §35(2)—Evidence §274(7) —Boundaries of land may be established by reputation derived from ancient sources or declarations of deceased parties; evidence based on maps and statements of persons since deceased held admissible.

In locating land described in a deed as being composed of lots and parts of lots of land Nos. 29, 30, and 35 in the Sixth district of a named county, known as "Old Grant Mill Place," it is competent to establish its boundaries of traditional reputation in the neighborhood, derived from ancient sources or from the declarations of persons since deceased who had peculiar means of knowing what the reputation of the boundary was in an ancient day; but present-day reputation is not admissible. Under this ruling, evidence of the tradition as to there being a tract of land known as the Grant Mill Place, and what it consisted of, was admissible.

7. Trial §255(4), 259(1)—Acts and declarations of defendant is admissible, and other defendant should request limitation; written request that evidence be limited necessary.

Evidence of sayings and doings of B. H. Ray, some of them tending to show recognition upon his part of the plaintiff's claim of title and possession of the land, Ray being one of the parties defendant, was admissible, certainly to establish the plaintiff's case against Ray himself; and the evidence having been properly admitted, if the other defendant wished the effect of such evidence limited to one of the parties, a proper written request therefor should have been preferred. The court was not bound, in the absence of such written request, to deal with the special parts of the testimony in his charge, although counsel for such other defendant may have called the court's attention to the fact that the evidence could not be binding upon any one except Ray, and coupled with this suggestion a request that the court instruct the jury that the evidence was not binding upon the administrator of Mrs. Ray.

8. Ejectment §90(1) — Lease under which lessees had occupied part of land held admissible.

The lease from Colbert and McAfee, executors of J. G. Colbert, to one Powell, was admissible in evidence, there being some evidence to show that the lessee named had, through agents or employees, occupied a part of the land in controversy.

9. Trial §228(3)—Instruction stating law "if" plaintiff was making a certain claim held not erroneous.

While it is the duty of the court to determine the contentions of the parties to a case and not leave that to the determination of the jury, nevertheless it was not such an inaccuracy as to require the grant of a new trial that the court, in charging the jury in this case, said that, "if the plaintiff claims a right to recover upon his prior possession, the plaintiff must show actual possession before the defendant took possession, and that he had actual possession of the entire south half of lot 30," the lot in dispute. Here "if," beginning the part of the instructions quoted, may be regarded as equivalent to the word "where," for the court had already instructed the jury that the plaintiff was undertaking to show his title, that is, the title of the Colbert estate, by showing possession of the land in connection with certain deeds offered in evidence. Parts of the evidence in the case, with the deductions which the jury were authorized to draw therefrom, were sufficient foundation for this charge.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, If.]

10. Adverse possession §116(1) — Instructions held not contradictory.

The court instructed the jury that the plaintiff could not recover unless he showed by a preponderance of the evidence that there was a tract of land known as the Grant Mill Place containing approximately 450 acres, and that the boundaries of such tract should also be fixed by evidence; and, in the part of the charge immediately following such instructions, added: "I charge you that the deed is not such a deed upon which the plaintiff can recover in this case, unless it is shown by a preponderance of the evidence that the plaintiff, as executor of Colbert, or Colbert in his lifetime, was in the open, continuous, notorious, and exclusive possession for seven years, under the deed, of some part of the land embraced in the deed." It is insisted that these parts of the charge are contradictory, misleading, and not authorized by the evidence. There was some evidence to authorize the charge; nor were these parts of the charge contradictory. The first part placed upon the plaintiff the burden of showing by evidence that there was a tract or land known as the Grant Mill Place, containing a specified number of acres, and also of fixing the boundaries of the tract; and the other part, given in connection, meant merely that the deed alone, even if the plaintiff had carried the burden placed upon him by the first part of the charge, would not authorize a recovery, but that possession, such as prescribed by the statute, must also be shown.

11. New trial §26 — Remarks to counsel by court not sufficient ground when mistrial not moved for.

Remarks addressed to counsel in a colloquy between the court and counsel are not grounds for reversal of the judgment refusing a new trial, it appearing that the remarks were made upon the conclusion of the evidence and before the charge of the court to the jury was begun, and counsel had full opportunity of moving for a mistrial on the ground now taken in the motion for a new trial. Having failed to do this, the plaintiffs in error cannot, after the return of an adverse verdict, have that verdict set aside and a new trial granted.

12. Sufficiency of evidence.

Upon a review of the entire record we cannot say that there is no evidence to support the verdict.

Error from Superior Court, Crawford County; H. A. Mathews, Judge.

Ejectment by A. J. McAfee, executor, against L. D. Moore, administrator, and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Affirmed.

McAfee, executor of Colbert, brought ejectment to recover the south half of lot 30 in the Sixth district of Crawford county. The parties defendant were J. B. Spiller, Mrs. Nancy Newberry, executrix of M. J. Newberry, and L. D. Moore, administrator of the estate of Mrs. Emma M. Ray, deceased. When the case was called for trial and both parties announced ready, counsel for the plaintiff offered an amendment reciting that B. H. Ray was sole heir at law of Emma M. Ray; that he was claiming the land in dispute as sole heir, was actually defending the suit, and was a proper party defendant; that he claimed possession and right of possession of the land; and it was prayed that he be made a party and be required to set up a defense in this suit. This was signed by the plaintiff's counsel, and the court indorsed upon the amendment, "Amendment allowed, October 21, 1919," and then signed the same officially. After the evidence was closed by both parties, by agreement of counsel, upon suggestion of the judge, Mrs. Nancy Newberry, as executrix, etc., filed a disclaimer; and she as such executrix was then considered as eliminated from the case. J. B. Spiller filed a disclaimer at the same time. B. H. Ray also, through his attorney, filed a disclaimer, but was treated as a party defendant by the court and by the plaintiff. The jury returned a verdict finding for the plaintiff the premises in dispute, a verdict quando against the estate of Mrs. Emma M. Ray for mesne profits, and a verdict for mesne profits against B. H. Ray individually. Moore, administrator of Mrs. Ray, and B. H. Ray, individually, made a motion for new trial, which was overruled, and the movants excepted.

L. D. Moore, of Macon, for plaintiffs in error.

R. D. Feagin, of Macon, for defendant in error.

BECK, P. J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] 1. One ground of the motion for a new trial assigns error upon the granting by the court of an order making B. H. Ray a party defendant upon the trial of the case, without his consent and over the objection of the administrator of Mrs. Ray, and without notice or rule nisi to B. H. Ray. Objection to such an order should have been made the subject of direct exception; error upon the same cannot be properly assigned in a motion for new trial.

[4] 4. Error is assigned upon the ruling of the court in admitting in evidence an order appearing upon the minutes of Crawford superior court at September term, 1876, and which contains the recital that it was made in the case of Smith, Administrator of Culverhouse, v. Moore, being a bill to marshal assets; and the further recital that it appeared to the court from the bill that the only asset of the estate remaining was the land described in the bill, which recital was followed by an order of the court that the administrator sell the land at public outcry, after due advertisement, and bring the money into court for distribution. This order was objected to upon the ground that it did not describe the land in controversy nor describe any land, and did not furnish authority to the administrator to sell any land, unless it was accompanied by the bill of the administrator in which the land was described. The court did not err in admitting this evidence over the objection made. There is a presumption that the administrator acted upon the order in connection with the bill, and that the bill sufficiently described the land.

[6] 6. Exception is taken to the ruling of the court in permitting the plaintiff as a witness in the case to testify as follows:

"There was a general tradition in the neighborhood as to there being a Grant Mill Place and as to what the Grant Mill Place consisted of. It was in the southeastern part of this county in the Sixth district. Deep creek runs through part of it. Toteover runs between 30 and 35. I got this information to start with from maps, but mainly from Wiley Patterson. He gave me general information of the land, and Frank Mathews and Billie Mathews gave me the location and told me where the line was, and Mr. Becham and Mr. Nichols. Mr. Becham is dead; so is Nichols. Billie Mathews is dead. These were old settlers in that community. Billie Mathews lived on the west of lot 35, adjoining, I think, on the lot adjoining 35."

This testimony was objected to upon the grounds that a tradition cannot be proved in that way; that the evidence did not show a tradition as to the boundaries of the Grant Mill Place, did not specify any particular boundary or evidence of any boundary of any particular tract of land. The court refused to rule out any evidence, upon motion of movants, when the plaintiff closed his evidence. In deciding this case when it was formerly here it was said by this court:

"In locating land described in a deed as being composed of lots and parts of lots of land Nos. 29, 30, and 35 in the Sixth district of a named county, known as the 'old Grant Mill Place,' it is competent to establish its boundaries by proof of traditional reputation in the neighborhood, derived from ancient sources or from the declarations of persons since deceased who had peculiar means of knowing what the reputation of the boundary was in an ancient day; but present-day reputation is not admissible." McAfee v. Newberry, 144 Ga. 473, 87 S. E. 392.

Under that ruling the testimony quoted was admissible. Though the evidence may not have contained a complete description of the lands contained in the Grant Mill place, it did tend to show certain facts tending to establish the identity of the Grant Mill Place. Whether other evidence in the case completed the description, or not, is another question.

[11] 11. Another ground of the motion for new trial is based upon the contention that the court expressed an opinion in the presence of the jury upon certain evidence in the case. These remarks (the court addressing plaintiff's counsel) were:

"You have made Mr. Ray a party, and, so far as the evidence developed, he is in adverse possession against the administrator, and it is not disputed Newberry is not in possession or any claim to the property."

And addressing the administrator of Mrs. Emma M. Ray, the court stated:

"How about filing a disclaimer for Mrs. Ray's estate? You are not in possession and never have been."

The administrator replied: "The plaintiff never has been."

The Court: "But he is seeking to recover from the person who is in possession, and that seems to be B. H. Ray. He is trying to get possession, and you are not asking for possession." Reply by the administrator, Mr. Moore: "I am trying to make him let me alone. The plaintiff has not shown he was ever in possession of an inch of it in his life."

The Court: "I think I will have to submit that to the jury; the Supreme Court held that."

These remarks were made by the court to the counsel in a colloquy between the court and counsel for plaintiffs in error. It is unnecessary to go into the record and determine whether or not the opinion expressed by the court was upon any contested issue of fact. Plaintiffs in error cannot, in a motion for new trial, avail themselves of the remarks made by the court under the circumstances attending the use of the expressions complained of. Section 4863 of the Civil Code provides that a new trial shall be granted where the court expresses or intimates his opinion as to what has or has not been proved. But where the court makes such an expression of opinion in ascertaining the position or opinion of counsel as to what has or has not been proved, or the effect of certain evidence, and does so before beginning his charge to the jury, and where the remarks made are entirely disconnected from the charge, as they were here, a party will not be permitted to allow the remarks to pass unchallenged until after the case has been submitted to the jury and a verdict adverse to him returned, and then seek to avail himself of them in a reviewing court. While remarks addressed to counsel in this way may be cause for a new trial, as provided in the statute just referred to, nevertheless counsel himself should take some steps to avoid the hurtful effect, by making a motion for a mistrial or asking the court to instruct the jury to disregard the remarks; but a party cannot remain quiescent until after verdict and then avail himself of the remarks made by the court in a motion for new trial, where the verdict is adverse. Of course, if the expression or intimation of the court's opinion occurs during his charge to the jury, while they may have no more hurtful effect than if they had been made in a colloquy between the court and counsel, nevertheless, as counsel could not well, in the midst of the charge, except to the remarks and move for a mistrial, he may avail himself of the remarks made in the course of the charge in his motion by making it one of the grounds thereof although no motion for a mistrial was made. There are cases in our reports where it has been held that certain remarks complained of as containing an expression of opinion by the court were not ground for a motion for new trial because not used in a charge to the jury but were made in the course of a colloquy between the court and counsel; and while it is not expressly said in any of these cases that if the remarks were hurtful a motion for a mistrial should have been made, the conclusion reached by the court must have been based upon the principle above announced.

EASTMAN COTTON MILLS et al. v. CITIZENS' & SOUTHERN BANK.
(No. 1860.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. March 5, 1921.)

(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

1. Mortgages \S 298(3)—Receipt of less than is due under insurance policy does not prevent sale under power from passing title.

The receipt by a mortgagee of a less amount than was due on the mortgage under an insurance policy payable to it as its interest might appear did not destroy the vitality of a power of sale in the mortgage, or prevent a sale under the power from passing legal title to the mortgagee, which purchased at the sale.

2. Mortgages \S 544(1) — Right of creditor to have amount of insurance policy compromised by mortgagee applied on mortgage must be set up in pleadings.

Where a mortgagee, holding as collateral security an insurance policy payable to it as its interest might appear, compromised a claim against the insurer and sold the premises under a power of sale, becoming the purchaser, and a creditor sold the same premises under execution, if the creditor, in a suit against it for possession of the premises, was entitled to have the full amount of the policy applied on the mortgage, pleadings setting up the facts entitling it to such equitable remedy should have been filed, and a mere oral statement of counsel could not take the place of proper pleadings.

Error from Superior Court, Laurens County; E. D. Graham, Judge.

Action by the Citizens' & Southern Bank, trustee, against the Eastman Cotton Mills and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Affirmed.

W. M. Clements, of Eastman, Burch & Daley, of Dublin, and Jno. R. L. Smith and Grady C. Harris, both of Macon, for plaintiffs in error.

Adams & Adams, of Savannah, and J. S. Adams, of Dublin, for defendant in error.

HILL, J. The Citizens' & Southern Bank was the holder, as trustee, of certain bonds amounting in the aggregate to $85,000, which had been issued by the Oconee River Mills, a manufacturing corporation. A policy of fire insurance was issued to the Oconee River Mills, which was deposited with the trustee as collateral and made payable as its interest might appear. The Oconee River Mills subsequently became insolvent, ceased to operate, and vacated the premises for a space of time that was in violation of a clause that was in the insurance policy, which provided that the policy should be void "if the subject of insurance be a manufacturing establishment and it be operated in whole or in part at night later than ten o'clock, or if it cease to be operated for more than ten consecutive days." The buildings constituting the manufacturing plant, the property insured, were destroyed by fire. The trustee brought suit against the insurance company on the policy referred to, the insured being a joint plaintiff with the trustee. Pending the suit the trustee made a settlement with the insurance company in the nature of a compromise of the claim for an amount less than the amount of the policy and less than the debt represented by the bonds; and the case was dismissed by the plaintiffs' attorneys. Then, in the exercise of the power of sale contained in the mortgage executed by the Oconee River Mills to secure the payment of the bonds, the trustee brought to sale the land upon which the manufacturing establishment had stood, conformably to the provisions of the power of sale, and became the purchaser at the sale, as it was expressly authorized in the mortgage to do, a deed being duly executed conveying the property to it as purchaser. Subsequently to the sale the Eastman Cotton Mills, a creditor of the Oconee River Mills, brought suit upon a claim against the latter, reduced the same to judgment, and had an execution issued on this judgment, which was levied upon the lot of land upon which the mill had formerly stood, and that lot was sold under the execution, the plaintiff in fi. fa. being the purchaser at the same, and receiving a sheriff's deed duly executed. The purchaser at the execution sale went into possession of the property. The present suit, complaint for land, was instituted by the Citizens' & Southern Bank as trustee, the grantee in the first conveyance referred to, against the Eastman Cotton Mills. The defendant filed a plea and an answer, general in its nature, asserting that it had title to the land, and that the plaintiff did not have such title. During the trial counsel for the defendant made a statement to the court, setting up in substance the facts in regard to the pledge of the policy, the compromise, the fact that the policy was greater in amount than the aggregate amount due on the bonds, and their contention that this amounted to a payment of the mortgage given to secure the bonds, that the mortgage therefore was paid off and discharged, that the power of sale was no longer of force, and that the sale to the plaintiff was inoperative and no title was passed thereunder, although the deed referred to was executed. After hearing this statement and the evidence that was introduced, the court directed a verdict for the plaintiff.

[1, 2] A verdict for the plaintiff was demanded under the facts submitted to the court, and therefore the court properly so directed. The receipt by the bank of a less amount than the amount of the mortgage was not in law a payment and discharge of the mortgage; it left a balance still due, and therefore the vitality of the power of sale was not destroyed, and a sale held under the power conformably to its provisions passed legal title to the bank; and the only question involved under the pleadings in this case was whether the plaintiff had legal title, its deed being older than the defendant's deed; and, that being true, a verdict in its favor necessarily followed under the pleadings and the evidence submitted to support them. If, upon the application of equitable principles to the facts of the case, the defendant desired and was entitled to have the full amount of the policy applied to the mortgage held by the trustee, pleadings setting up the facts entitling it to this equitable remedy should have been filed, and the power of the court to make the application thereby invoked. The mere oral statement of counsel of their insistence could not take the place of proper pleadings.

Judgment affirmed.

THOMPSON v. STATE. (No. 2189.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. March 16, 1921.)

(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

1. Criminal law \S 1206(4)—Statute providing for punishment of felonies as misdemeanors not repealed by Indeterminate Sentence Law.

The Indeterminate Sentence Act did not repeal Pen. Code 1910, \S 1062, providing that on recommendation of the jury approved by the presiding judge the punishment for a felony other than those enumerated therein shall be as provided for misdemeanors.

2. Criminal law \S 797—Failure to charge that jury could recommend punishment as for misdemeanor held error.

On a trial for assault with intent to murder, the failure to charge that in case of conviction, the jury could recommend, if they saw fit, that defendant be punished as for a misdemeanor, was error.

Certiorari from Court of Appeals.

Lewis Thompson was convicted of assault with intent to murder, and the conviction was affirmed by the Court of Appeals (103 S. E. 731), and he brings certiorari. Reversed.

Richard B. Russell and H. H. Chandler, both of Atlanta, and J. P. Brooke, of Alpharetta, for plaintiff in error.

Jno. T. Dorsey, Sol. Gen., of Marietta, for the State.

FISH, C. J. [1] 1. The Indeterminate Sentence Act (Acts 1919, p. 387) did not repeal section 1062 of the Penal Code of 1910, which provides that on the recommendation of the jury trying the case, when such recommendation is approved by the presiding judge, the punishment of a felony other than one of those enumerated in such section shall be as provided for misdemeanors.

[2] 2. It was error requiring the grant of a new trial for the court to fail to charge the jury, on the trial of one charged with the offense of assault with intent to murder, that in the event of conviction they could recommend, if they saw fit, that the defendant be punished as for a misdemeanor. Moore v. State, 150 Ga. 679, 104 S. E. 907.

MIMS v. MIMS. (No. 2223.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. March 16, 1921.)

(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

1. Appeal and error ⇐303—Authentication of grounds of motion for new trial should be unconditional.

Special grounds of a motion for a new trial, complaining of recited charges, should be approved or disapproved by the judge, and not approved in a conditional manner, requiring the Supreme Court to examine the entire charge, to ascertain whether the charges set out in the motion are correctly stated.

2. Appeal and error ⇐303—Approval of grounds of motion for new trial with explanatory note held disapproval, preventing consideration.

The trial judge's approval of the grounds of a motion for a new trial, with an explanatory note, referring to the brief of the evidence and the charge for the evidence and charges, was not an approval without qualification, but amounted to a disapproval, preventing the Supreme Court from passing on grounds of the motion dependent on the evidence and charges.

3. Appeal and error ⇐303—Act regarding sufficiency of approval of grounds of motion for new trial held inapplicable to conditional approval, amounting to disapproval.

Act Aug. 21, 1911 (Acts 1911, p. 150) § 8, providing that, when the judge has passed on the merits of a motion for a new trial and no question has been raised as to the sufficiency of the approval of the grounds of such motion, no such question shall be entertained by the reviewing court, did not apply, where the court approved the grounds with a qualification which amounted to a disapproval.

Branch & Howard, of Atlanta, for defendant in error.

HILL, J. [1] Where the special grounds of a motion for new trial complain of certain recited charges of the court to the jury, it is the duty of the judges either to approve or to disapprove these grounds, and not to approve them in a conditional manner, so as to require the Supreme Court to examine the entire charge to ascertain whether the charges set out in the grounds of the motion are correctly stated or not. Landrum v. Landrum, 145 Ga. 307, 89 S. E. 201; Louisville & Nashville R. Co. v. Ogles, 146 Ga. 20, 90 S. E. 476; McLean v. Mann, 148 Ga. 114, 95 S. E. 985.

[2] (a) Where the trial judge approved the grounds of the motion for new trial in the following language:

"The recitals of the facts, contained in the above and foregoing motion for new trial and the amendments thereto, as modified by the court, are hereby approved as true and correct"

—and where, on the motion, the judge entered explanatory notes as follows: "As to what the evidence was, see brief of evidence," and as to what the charge was "reference is made to charge of the court," such approval was not unconditional, and under the rule laid down above the court did not approve the amended grounds of the motion for new trial as correct without qualification, but such action on the part of the judge amounted to a disapproval of the grounds as stated, leaving it to the Supreme Court, by comparing the evidence stated in the motion with the brief of the evidence, and the charges set out in the motion with the general charge, to ascertain whether such grounds contained correct excerpts from the brief of evidence and the charge of the court, and under such an entry this court cannot undertake to pass upon the grounds of the motion dependent upon such alleged evidence and charges.

[3] (b) This character of entry does not fall within section 3 of the act of August 21, 1911 (Acts 1911, p. 149). Here there was not a mere failure to approve the grounds of the motion, as provided for in the act of 1911, but an entry which amounted to a disapproval.

FLOYD COUNTY v. SALMON. (No. 1985.)
(Supreme Court of Georgia. March 5, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Statutes \S 250—Taxation \S 549(4)—Effective from date of passage when so provided; tax receivers entitled to compensation at increased rate from passage of act of 1918.

The act of the General Assembly, approved August 17, 1918 (Acts 1918, p. 110), amending section 1202 of the Civil Code of 1910, relating to the compensation of tax receivers in this state, went into effect from and after the date of its passage, and "from and after that date" (for so much of the year as remained) receivers were entitled to compensation at the rate fixed by the act.

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

2. Statutes \S 255—Becomes effective from approval, etc., unless otherwise provided by Constitution or statute.

As a general rule, in the absence of constitutional or general statutory provision governing the matter, or a provision to the contrary in the statute itself, a statute becomes effective on the day of its approval by the Governor, or of its passage over his veto, or by his nonaction within the time specified for the return of the bill.

3. Statutes \S 250—May prescribe time of taking effect.

A statute may fix the day or time when it shall take effect.

4. Constitutional law \S 48—Plain language cannot be changed to avoid invalidity.

When an act is capable of two constructions, one making it violative of the Constitution and the other making it consonant therewith, the court must adopt the latter construction; but the mere fact that the plain, positive, and unambiguous language of the act brings it in conflict with the Constitution will not enable the court to declare the legislative meaning to be other than that clearly, concisely, and positively expressed.

5. Statutes \S 190—Unambiguous statute cannot be construed according to supposed intention.

When an act is plain, unambiguous, and positive, and not capable of two constructions, the court is not authorized to construe it according to the supposed intention of the Legislature.

George, J., dissenting in part.

Certiorari from Court of Appeals.

Action by J. Z. Salmon against Floyd County. A judgment for defendant was reversed by the Court of Appeals (24 Ga. App. 796, 102 S. E. 384), and defendant brings certiorari. Affirmed, with directions.

Maddox & Doyal, of Rome, for defendant in error.

GEORGE, J. [1] Civil Code (1910). \S 1202, provides that—

"The county shall pay the receiver one-half of what the collector gets for collecting the county tax."

By an act of the General Assembly, approved August 17, 1918 (Acts 1918, p. 110), section 1202 of the Civil Code of 1910 was so amended as to be read as follows:

"The county shall pay the receiver the same compensation the collector gets for collecting the county tax."

J. Z. Salmon, tax receiver of Floyd county, claimed as such receiver, for the year 1918, the same compensation allowed the tax collector for collecting the county tax. The county paid him one-half of the compensation allowed the collector for collecting the county taxes, without prejudice to the rights of the receiver to proceed to collect the balance alleged to be due him. Accordingly the receiver filed suit against the county, and alleged that under the act approved August 17, 1918, he was entitled to recover the same compensation allowed the tax collector. To the petition the county filed a general demurrer. The demurrer was sustained, and the receiver sued out a writ of error to the Court of Appeals. That court reversed the judgment of the trial court, and the county brought by certiorari the decision of the Court of Appeals to the Supreme Court for review. The county does not by its demurrer question the constitutionality of the act of 1918, but insists that inasmuch as the duties of the receiver for the year 1918 were performed, or practically performed, prior to the passage and approval of the act, the compensation of the receiver for the year in question is to be governed entirely by the old law as contained in Civil Code, \S 1202, and not by the act approved August 17, 1918.

With respect to the time when statutes are to take effect, the old English rule was that if the act was not directed to operate from any particular time, it took effect from the first day of the session at which it was passed. This legal fiction and this extraordinary application of the doctrine of relation was acted upon by the English courts until the statute of 33 Geo. III, c. 18, which statute declared that laws shall operate from the time of receiving the royal assent. Sedgwick on Construction of Statutes (2d Ed.) 65.

"Under Constitutions which, by providing in effect that no bill shall become a law until it shall have received the approval of the chief executive or shall have been passed over his refusal to approve, make the executive a necessary constituent of the law-making power, an act becomes a law, not when it is passed by the two houses of the Legislature, but when it is approved by the executive, unless it becomes a law by the lapse of time specified for the return of a bill to the Legislature or by being passed by the Legislature notwithstanding the disapproval of the executive." 25 R. C. L. 797.

Cf. article 5, § 1, par. 16, of the Constitution of this state (Civil Code, § 6485); Green v. Hall, 36 Ga. 538; Epstin v. Levenson, 79 Ga. 718 (2), 4 S. E. 328.

[2, 3] The general rule followed in the United States is that, in the absence of constitutional or general statutory provision governing the matter, the statute becomes effective on the day of its passage; that is to say, on the day of its approval by the chief executive, or its passage over his veto, or by his nonaction within the time specified in the Constitution for the return of the bill to the Legislature, unless the time for the going into effect of the statute is fixed by the statute itself. It is elementary that the statute itself may fix the day or time when it shall take effect; and it has been held that a statute providing that it shall take effect "from and after" a day named takes effect on the day following the one named. State v. Roney, 82 Ohio St. 376, 92 N. E. 486, 19 Ann. Cas. 918. The act approved August 17, 1918, provides "that from and after the passage of this act" section 1202 of the Civil Code (1910) shall read as in the act provided. By its plain terms the act repealed all laws in conflict therewith, and went into effect from and after its passage.

[4, 5] It is contended that this ruling will necessarily invalidate the act, in view of certain constitutional provisions and inhibitions pointed out in the brief of counsel for the county. While we do not concede the soundness of the conclusion, the act is plain, susceptible to but one construction. When an act is capable of two constructions, one making it violative of the Constitution and the other making it consonant therewith, it is the duty of the court to adopt the latter construction. Park v. Candler, 113 Ga. 647 (3), 39 S. E. 89. Where the act is plain, unambiguous, and positive, and is not capable of two constructions, the court is not authorized to construe the act according to the supposed intention of the Legislature. Unless adequate grounds are found in the act itself, in its context, or in the absurd consequences and results which would necessarily follow from its literal interpretation, the mere fact that the plain, positive, and unambiguous language of the act would bring it in conflict with some constitutional provision is not of itself sufficient to enable the court, in the exercise of its proper function, to declare the legislative meaning to be other than that clearly, concisely, and positively expressed in the act. We are of the opinion that the act went into effect from and after its passage. The Court of Appeals, therefore, correctly held that the petition was not subject to general demurrer.

Whether the receiver's compensation is to be apportioned, that is, whether he is to be paid for his services at the rate fixed in the old law up to August 17, 1918, and at the rate provided in the act approved August 17, 1918, thereafter to the end of the year (and for subsequent years), is not expressly dealt with by the act. The time when compensation is to be paid to tax receivers or collectors is not fixed by statute. As matter of common knowledge, receivers and collectors are paid in the fall of the year after the taxes are due and collected. The tax collector receives for his services commissions, as provided in Civil Code, § 1234. The majority of the court are of the opinion that while the compensation of the collector is not in a strict sense salary, it is analogous to salary. The view of the majority of the court is that the standard by which the compensation is to be measured is, since the passage of the act of 1918, the full amount paid the collector; prior to the passage of that act, one-half of the amount paid the collector; and that the plaintiff in this case is entitled to be paid for his services at the rate fixed in the old law until August 17, 1918, and at the rate provided in the act thereafter to the end of the year. In support of this view, it is suggested that both under the old law and under the act of 1918 the receiver is compensated for his entire services; that his services for 1918 had not been fully performed by August 17, 1918, the date of the approval of the act; and that, since the receiver is entitled to no specific part of his compensation for any particular service, there is no legal difficulty in apportioning the compensation of the receiver for the year 1918, treating the compensation to be paid him in the nature of salary for his entire services for the year. In this view the writer does not concur, but is of the opinion that the act, the validity of which has not been challenged, should be given literal application, for the reasons stated in the opinion.

Judgment affirmed, with direction.

All the Justices concur except

GEORGE, J., who dissents from the ruling that the compensation of the tax receiver for the year 1918 should be apportioned, as ruled by the majority.

RAILROAD COMMISSION OF GEORGIA v. MACON RY. & LIGHT CO. (No. 2033.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. March 4, 1921.)

*(Syllabus by the Court.)1. Street railroads — §66 — Railroad Commission cannot determine right to abandon part of line.

The Railroad Commission of Georgia has no express or implied statutory power to determine whether a chartered street railroad company may entirely discontinue or abandon service upon a line, or part thereof, voluntarily constructed by it and devoted to the public use.

*(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)2. Evidence — §22(1) — Judicial notice taken that street railroad was chartered by secretary of state and subsequently changed name.

Under Civ. Code 1910, § 5734, relative to judicial notice, the court takes cognizance that the Macon Consolidated Street Railroad Company was originally chartered by the secretary of state, and that its name was subsequently changed to the Macon Railway & Light Company.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; Geo. L. Bell, Judge.

Mandamus by the Macon Railway & Light Company against the Railroad Commission of Georgia. Judgment granting the writ, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

James K. Hines, of Atlanta (Hall, Grice & Bloch, of Macon, representing parties at interest, not parties to the record), for plaintiff in error.

John R. L. Smith, Grady C. Harris, and Wallace Miller, all of Macon, for defendant in error.

GEORGE, J. [1] The Macon Railway & Light Company filed its petition with the Railroad Commission of Georgia, "asking permission to abandon service on the Rivoli extension, between Lundy Road and the end of the line." From its petition it appears that the extension "was placed in service in September, 1912, and consists of 1.87 miles of single track, extending from Lundy Road, which is a point 4.04 miles from the center of the city of Macon and 1.9 miles from the nearest point of the city of Macon to the end of the line." The reasons upon which the company based its application were fully set forth in the petition. The company prayed that the Commission take jurisdiction of the matter, and, after final hearing, that the company be granted "the privilege of suspending service on this line." The Commission held that it was without jurisdiction in the premises, and the company applied for a mandamus to compel the Commission to exercise its jurisdiction, to hear evidence on the merits of the application, and to determine whether or not the applicant should be allowed to discontinue service on said extension as prayed. The mandamus was granted, and the Commission excepted.

[2] The court will take cognizance that the Macon Consolidated Street Railroad Company was originally chartered by the secretary of state. Its name was subsequently changed to the Macon Railway & Light Company. Civil Code (1910) § 5734; Atlanta, etc., R. Co. v. A., B. & A. R. Co., 124 Ga. 125, 52 S. E. 320. The question is whether the Railroad Commission of Georgia has jurisdiction to permit a street railroad company chartered by the secretary of state to discontinue service upon a line voluntarily constructed by it and devoted to the public use. The powers of the Commission are defined by our statutes. It is conceded that the power to permit a chartered street railroad company to abandon altogether its duties to the public is not expressly conferred upon the Railroad Commission. Coming directly to the question presented by this record, it is also conceded that the power to permit a chartered street railroad company to abandon or discontinue service to the public on a particular portion or part of its line is not expressly conferred upon the Commission. Our statute provides that—

"The Railroad Commission shall have and exercise all the power and authority heretofore conferred upon it by law, and shall have the general supervision of all common carriers, * * * street railroads * * * within this state, * * * and * * * is authorized * * * to require all common carriers and other public service companies under their supervision to establish and maintain such public service and facilities as may be reasonable and just, either by general rules or by special orders in particular cases." Civil Code (1910) § 2663; Ga. Laws 1907, p. 75, § 6.

The street railway company contends that the Commission has power to determine whether it is reasonable and just that it should be required to continue service upon the extension named, under given facts and circumstances, and taking into consideration the extent to which the particular extension is used by the public, the purpose for which it is used, the loss it entails upon the company, the extent to which that loss impairs the efficiency of more useful portions of the system, and all matters relevant to the general question; that the power of "general supervision" of the company, and the power "to require" the company under supervision "to maintain such public service and facilities as may be reasonable and just," not merely imply, but include, the power to determine what is reasonable and just and the power to not require such as is not reasonable and just; and that the Commission has power to grant the privilege of suspending service on the particular extension permanently or for the present, if it concludes that reason and justice to the company and the public do not require the operation of it. It is argued that the Commission has authority to determine what service is just and reasonable, and therefore to determine that a particular service is not just and not reasonable. It is to be noted, however, that the company does not seek merely to have it determined whether the service on the particular extension is just and reasonable, but it seeks the sanction of the Commission to the discontinuance or abandonment of the particular extension.

In the view we take of the matter, the question involves the power and jurisdiction of the Commission to determine the extent of the legal obligation resting upon the company under its charter. Since the Commission has no express power under our statutes to permit the abandonment of service upon a particular line voluntarily constructed by it and devoted to the use of the public, the power to permit such abandonment cannot be implied. The implied powers of the Commission are such as are reasonably necessary to execute the powers expressly conferred upon it. It may be true that the power of the Commission (if such power be conceded) to permit the company to abandon service upon a particular line, or portion thereof, cannot be held to confer the power upon the Commission to permit the company to abandon all service and the discharge of all duties to the public, if the rendering of such service becomes unreasonable and unjust. But where can the line be drawn? The power to permit a street railroad company to discontinue or abandon service upon a particular line, or upon a particular part of its system, is so extraordinary as to preclude the idea that the General Assembly would have left such power to implication merely. It is more reasonable to assume that the General Assembly would have given such power in express terms.

The power of the Commission to reduce service and facilities, short of actual suspension of all service, cannot be questioned; but, as we have indicated, the power to reduce service and facilities is quite different from the power to determine the extent of the legal obligation resting upon the company under its charter. The distinction must be borne in mind, although the Commission is asked to permit the discontinuance or abandonment of service upon ever so short a portion of its system. While the Commission has power, under our statute (Civil Code 1910, § 2664), to permit a carrier to remove spur tracks and side tracks, it must not be left out of view that the maintenance of a particular spur track or side track is merely one of the incidents of service, and that the power to dispense with one incident of service merely does not imply or include the power to discontinue the whole, even on a portion of the carrier's line.

The conclusion here reached is in harmony with the ruling of the New York Public Service Commission (1st Dist.) in Re Long Island R. Co., P. U. R. 1919E, 275. See, also, In re Lake Erie, etc., Ry. Co. (Ohio Pub. Util. Com.) P. U. R. 1916F, 553, and In re Eastern Wisconsin Elec. Co. (Wis. Com.) P. U. R. 1918E, 748. It is conceded that the foregoing rulings were based upon facts different from the facts here involved. It is also true that a majority of the Commissions of other states have held that the power of general supervision and the power to regulate service necessarily include and imply the power to permit public utilities to abandon service. The same has been held by the courts of last resort in some of the states. See Railroad Commission v. Kansas City So. R. Co., 111 La. 139, 35 South. 487; *State ex rel. Tate v. WILLIAMS et al. v. MITCHEM.MITCHEM v. WILLIAMS.

(No. 2053.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. March 3, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Pleading \S 204(2)—Petition held to state cause of action as to crop already harvested.

The petition in an action of trover, instituted to recover possession of "one bale of cotton in seed, gathered," and other "crops not gathered," set forth a cause of action for recovery of the bale of cotton, and was not subject to the general demurrer, which was directed against the petition in its entirety.

2. Landlord and tenant \S 323, 326(5, 6)—Cropper converts crop by selling and applying proceeds to his own use; contract held to create relation of "landlord and cropper."

It is a conversion for a "cropper," as defined in the Civ. Code 1910, \S 3707, without consent of the landlord, to gather and sell a part of the crop and apply the proceeds to his own use. The contract between the plaintiff and defendant created the relation of "landlord and cropper," as defined in section 3707.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, Second Series, Landlord and Cropper.]

3. Landlord and tenant \S 331(3) — Nonsuit improper when evidence authorizes recovery of one bale of cotton though other crops un-gathered.

The evidence was sufficient to authorize a verdict for the plaintiff for recovery of one bale of cotton, and it was erroneous to grant a nonsuit.

4. Replevin \S 4—Will not lie by landlord to recover possession of unharvested crops from cropper; "personalty."

Agricultural crops raised by a "cropper" do not become personalty until they are detached from the soil; and the owner of the land cannot employ the remedy provided in the Civ. Code 1910, \S 4483, generally applicable for the recovery of the possession of personalty, for the purpose of recovering from the "cropper" possession of the crops raised by him, while they remain attached to the soil.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Personal Property.]

5. Assignments not passed on.

It is unnecessary to rule upon certain assignments of error on the admission of evidence, as the same questions will not likely arise on a further trial of the case.

6. Bonds \S 35 — Replevin \S 126 — Summary judgment on bond not authorized when part of property was realty; bond held good as common law bond; "statutory bond."

A suit was brought by a landlord against his "cropper," to recover possession of crops raised by the latter, some part of which had been converted into personalty and the balance remained attached to the soil; in connection with such suit the plaintiff made and filed an affidavit as to the value of all the property, etc., for the purpose of requiring bail under the provisions of the Civ. Code 1910, \S 5150; the defendant refused to execute bond; the plaintiff, in order to obtain possession of the property, executed a bond payable to the defendant in double the value of all the property, for the forthcoming of such personalty and realty to answer the judgment or decree that may be rendered in the case, and upon execution of such bond received possession of all of the property sued for. Held, that such bond so executed by the plaintiff was not a statutory bond, within the meaning of the Civil Code 1910, \S 5150-5152, upon which the judge could summarily enter a judgment for the defendant against the principal and sureties named in the bond, on nonsuit or dismissal of the case.

(a) The bond is a sufficient common-law bond, upon which a separate action could be instituted.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Statutory Bond.]

George, J., dissenting in part.

Certiorari from Court of Appeals.

Action by T. J. Williams and another against C. E. Mitchem. A judgment for defendant was affirmed by the Court of Appeals (102 S. E. 870), and plaintiffs bring certiorari. Reversed.

On August 30, 1918, T. J. Williams and Y. D. McCollum instituted an action against C. E. Mitchem in the city court of Morgan, Calhoun county. The petition alleged:

That the defendant was in possession of "all of the crops of cotton, cotton seed, corn and fodder, peanuts, grown during the year 1918" on a described plantation, "there being (30) thirty bales of cotton, mature, in the field un-gathered, and one bale of cotton in seed, gathered, (4,000) four thousand bushels of peanuts, in the field un-gathered, but mature and ripe for gathering, and (1,500) fifteen hundred bushels of corn, and all fodder in stacks, mature, standing in field un-gathered, * * * and said property being of the aggregate value of ($10,000) ten thousand dollars." That the said defendant refuses to deliver the above-described property to petitioner or to pay them the profits thereof, though petitioners have made such demand for same upon him. That the yearly value of said property is $2,000. Wherefore petitioners pray that process may issue," etc.

The petition was subsequently amended by alleging that "petitioners claim title to said property," and by inserting in paragraph 2 of the petition the words "more or less" following the words "30 bales of cotton" and "4,000 bushels of peanuts" and "1,500 bushels of corn," as employed in that paragraph.

On the day the petition was filed, one of the plaintiffs made an affidavit before the clerk of the court, in which, among other things, it was said that plaintiffs had instituted the suit above mentioned to recover the property. The property was described in the same language as above set forth in the petition. After describing the property it was said:

"That deponent has reason to apprehend that said property will be eloiigned and moved away and will not be forthcoming to answer the judgment that may be made in said case, and said property is in the possession, custody of defendant, C. M. Mitchem, and that said firm does verily and bona fide claim said described property."

On September 2, 1918, the plaintiffs as principals and named persons as sureties executed a bond payable to the defendant in the sum of $20,000. The property was described in the bond by the same language as employed in the petition. It was stated in the bond that the plaintiffs had instituted the suit above mentioned; that plaintiffs had "required bail" of the defendant; that the sheriff had seized the property; that defendant had failed to give the bond "required by law in such cases provided"; and that plaintiffs desired to take the property in their possession. The condition of the bond was that should the plaintiffs "produce or cause to be produced and forthcoming the said property to answer the judgment that may be entered in said case, and shall well and truly pay the condemnation money, whatever it may be, then this bond to be void."

The defendant filed a general demurrer to the petition at the first term, which being overruled he filed exceptions pendente lite, which were allowed. The defendant also filed an answer admitting possession of the property, but alleging that it was of the value of $20,000, and that the title and right of possession of the property was in himself. The answer was amended at the trial term by alleging, among other things, the following in substance: "that on or about" February 23, 1918, the defendant undertook to purchase from the plaintiffs the plantation on which the crops were produced, which was then in possession of "one C. A. Sauls" under a contract of employment with the plaintiffs, the terms of which were unknown to defendant, but, being unable to agree on terms of "an immediate purchase and sale," plaintiffs as parties of the first part and defendant as party of the second part entered into a written contract, which omitting formal parts was as follows:

"Witnesseth that the parties of the first part hereby agree to rent, for the year 1918, that certain farm of 1,325 acres, more or less, in the Third land district of Calhoun county, Georgia, known as the Daniel home place, to the party of the second part, on a share-crop basis, that is, the said second party is to farm and operate said place, raising the usual crops suitable to the land, one-half of which is to be paid to the parties of the first part as rental of land, which the second party agrees to do. Parties of the first part agree to furnish the second party the farm implements necessary to make the crop, now on said place, also the live stock with which to work the farm, as now on said place, or such substitution of the same as may be agreed upon, and further agree to furnish feed for the stock. It is further agreed that the second party is to care for the stock and land to the very best advantage, watching the interest of the first parties at all times; and the parties of the first part further agree that they will sell and convey the said farm to the second party for a consideration of $86,000.00, provided said option of purchase is exercised on or before November 1, 1918; and in the event the second party should make purchase and pay said sum, then in that event only the first parties waive the payment to them of any rent or share of crop for the year 1918. It is also understood and agreed that second party is to make satisfactory agreement and trade with the party now on said farm, without cost or expense to first parties, before this contract is of any value and effect, as first parties are not to be responsible to second party hereto unless he first trades with the party now in possession for the occupancy of said farm for the year 1918."

After execution of the contract defendant made an arrangement with C. A. Sauls, whereby Sauls relinquished possession of the place to the defendant, and he immediately entered possession under the written contract with the plaintiffs. Defendant employed labor to put the lands in cultivation and to put in operation a "13-horse farm" on the place, in the course of which he rented "a 2-horse crop" to one Sam Favors, and employed "5 share-croppers to work 6 plows," and operated "5 plows with wages-hands." Under the terms of the contract the plaintiffs did not retain title to the crops, and the "relation of landlord and cropper" did not exist between plaintiffs and defendant, and plaintiffs had no title or right of possession of the crops, but the same was in defendant and his only obligation as to rental was to pay the plaintiffs one-half of the crops grown on the place for the year 1918, in the event that he did not exercise his option to purchase the place.

At the trial the plaintiffs offered an amendment to the so-called replevy bond, so as to add the words "more or less" immediately following the words "30 bales of cotton" and "4,000 bushels of peanuts" and the words "1,500 bushels of corn," as contained in the original bond. The amendment was disallowed, and the plaintiffs excepted.

The plaintiffs introduced testimony in substance as follows: Having recently purchased the land, they entered into the written contract with the defendant as copied above, furnished him all the things enumerated, and in addition furnished him "guano" with which to make the crop and money to meet the monthly pay rolls to his hands for labor, amounting in all to about $1,944.50. Defendant was to pay for half the guano. He employed all the labor that he used in operating the place. He had supervision of the entire place. Plaintiffs had nothing to do with the hiring or managing the labor "nor with the planting of crops, what kind, when or how much." Defendant did not pay for any of the supplies furnished him, and did not exercise the option to buy the place. Shortly before institution of the suit the labor on the place became demoralized, and the crops were about to go to waste. Plaintiffs demanded possession, which demand was refused. The defendant sold one bale of cotton for $191, and also carried some corn off the place and sold it. Such sale occurred prior to institution of the suit. Practically all other crops were in the field ungathered. The suit was instituted and bail required; and after the defendant's refusal to give bail, plaintiffs made bond and took possession of the crops in order to market them. An agent employed by the plaintiffs harvested and marketed all the crops, keeping an accurate account of all the farm products and their market value. The values amounted to $5,573.08. In addition to the parol evidence, the plaintiffs introduced the written contract and closed.

At the conclusion of the evidence the judge granted a nonsuit and dismissed the case. Afterward and on the same day the judge summarily entered judgment on the bond as follows:

"The plaintiffs having been nonsuited in the above-stated case, and said case dismissed by order of the court, and it appearing to the court that the property sued for in said case was replevied by the plaintiffs (the defendant having failed to replevy the same) by said plaintiffs giving the within bond and taking possession of said property, and the defendant having elected to take a money judgment for the value of said property instead of a writ of restitution, and it appearing to the court that the plaintiffs have placed a value of $10,000 on said property by their affidavit to obtain bail, and counsel for defendant having moved the court to be allowed to enter up judgment on said bond against the principals thereon and their sureties for said sum of $10,000 and interest thereon: It is thereupon considered, ordered, and adjudged by the court that the defendant, O. B. Mitchem, do have and recover of and from Williams & McCollum and T. J. Williams, as principals, and D. A. Smith, K. S. Worthy, G. A. Dozier, and J. M. Clements, as sureties, the sum of $10,000 principal, with interest thereon from September 2, 1918, at 7 per cent. per annum, and $—— costs."

The plaintiffs excepted to the judgment of nonsuit, and to the judgment on the bond.

In the bill of exceptions error was assigned on the exceptions pendente lite, relating to rejection of the amendment to the replevy bond, and on certain rulings as to the admissibility of evidence, which have not been set forth. The defendant filed a cross-bill of exceptions assigning error upon the judgment overruling the demurrer to the petition; also upon the judgment allowing the amendment to the petition; also upon the ruling of the court in permitting witnesses to testify as to the amount and value of the crops produced on the place, over the objection that it was irrelevant. On review in the Court of Appeals the judgment of the trial court was affirmed on the main bill, and the cross-bill of exceptions was dismissed. 102 S. E. 870. The case is here for decision upon writ of certiorari to the judgment of the Court of Appeals, on the main bill of exceptions.

R. R. Jones, of Dawson, Pottle & Hofmayer, of Albany, and O. J. Taylor, of Valdosta, for plaintiffs in error.

B. W. Fortson, or Arlington, for defendant in error.

ATKINSON, J. [1] 1. The petition as amended alleged that the defendant was in possession of described property of stated value, to which the plaintiffs in good faith claimed title; and that he refused to surrender such possession on demand by plaintiffs. Included among the several properties so described in the petition was "one bale of cotton in seed, gathered." This part of the property was personality; and relatively to that, the petition set forth a cause of action under the Civil Code, § 4483, which declares:

"In actions to recover the possession of chattels, an alternative verdict in damages to be discharged on delivery of the property may be taken; but it shall not be necessary to prove any conversion of the property where the defendant is in possession when the action is brought."

It was not erroneous to overrule the general demurrer, which was addressed to the petition in its entirety, and merely complained that the petition "sets forth no cause of action," that "the allegations of the petition are not sufficient to support a recovery of the property sued for by the plaintiff," and that "no title or right of title or right of possession of the property sued for is shown in the plaintiff."

[2] 2. The burden was upon the plaintiffs to show title to the property. It is declared in the Civil Code, § 3707:

"Where one is employed to work for part of the crop, the relation of landlord and tenant does not arise. The title to the crop, subject to the interest of the cropper therein, and the possession of the land remain in the owner."

In section 3705 it is declared:

"Whenever the relation of landlord and cropper exists, the title to and right to control and possess the crops grown and raised upon the lands of the landlord by the cropper shall be vested in the landlord until he has received his part of the crops so raised, and is fully paid for all advances made to the cropper in the year said crops were raised to aid in making said crops."

In Hancock v. Boggus, 111 Ga. 884, 36 S. E. 970, it is said:

"When it is shown that a landowner entered into a contract with another person, by the terms of which the owner was to furnish the land, stock, tools, and supplies to make a crop, and the other person was to do the work and receive a part of the crop so made, the legal relation which existed between them was that of landlord and cropper."

See, also, Hackney v. State, 101 Ga. 512, 516, 517, 28 S. E. 1007.

The contract between the plaintiffs and the defendant is set out in the statement of facts, and need not be repeated. It established the relation between the parties, and, properly construed, created the relation of landlord and cropper, as defined in the Civil Code, § 3707. Such being the relation between the parties, legal title and the right to control and possess all the crops raised on the place by the defendant was vested in the plaintiffs until they received their part of the crops and were fully paid for all advances made to the cropper during the year to aid in making the crops. The defendant, without consent of the owners, could not gather, carry away, and sell a portion of the crop and convert the proceeds to his own use, without being guilty of a wrongful conversion.

[3] 3. The plaintiffs introduced evidence to the effect that of the property described in the petition the defendant carried away and sold one bale of cotton for $191, before the suit was instituted. This was sufficient basis for a verdict for the plaintiffs, relatively to that part of the property; and it was erroneous to grant a nonsuit and dismiss the entire action.

[4] 4. The greater part of the property sought to be recovered consisted of crops attached to the soil, most of which was mature. The Court of Appeals ruled that such crops were a part of the realty, and therefore that the plaintiffs could not invoke the remedy provided in the Civil Code, § 4483, which applies only to actions for recovery of personalty. That ruling is consonant with the decision of this court in the case of Newton County v. Boyd, 148 Ga. 761, 98 S. E. 347, where it was held:

"A crop of corn not detached from the soil, whether mature or immature, is a part of the realty, and passes by sale of the land without contractual reservation of the crop. Civil Code, § 3617; Pitts v. Hendrix, 6 Ga. 452; Frost v. Render, 65 Ga. 15; Bagley v. Columbus Southern Ry. Co., 98 Ga. 626 (25 S. E. 638, 34 L. R. A. 286, 58 Am. St. R. 835). See, also, 8 R. C. L. 360, 371, §§ 6, 16; Cobb's Law of the Farm, 13."

As to this part of the property, trover would not lie, but that would not afford ground for nonsuiting the entire action; the plaintiffs having alleged and proved a case for recovery as to some part of the property, as heretofore indicated.

[5] 5. In the light of the several rulings in the preceding divisions, it is unnecessary to rule on the assignments of error on the admission of evidence. The same questions will not likely arise when the case is returned to the trial court.

[6] 6. Another assignment of error challenges the correctness of the judgment on the bond. The Civil Code, § 5150, declares:

"Where any person who is about to commence an action for the recovery of personal property shall require bail, such person, his agent, or attorney shall make affidavit that the property is in the possession, custody, or control of the defendant, and that he has reason to apprehend that the said personal property has been or will be eligned or moved away, or will not be forthcoming to answer the judgment, execution, or decree that shall be made in the case; and shall also state in his affidavit the value of the same, and the amount of hire claimed, if any, and add that he does verily and bona fide claim said personal property, or some valuable interest therein."

Section 5151 declares:

"When such affidavit is made as prescribed in the preceding section, it shall be filed in the clerk's office of the court to which said petition, bill, or other process may be returnable, and a copy thereof affixed to the original petition, or process, and to the copy or copies thereof, and it shall be the duty of the sheriff, or other lawful officer serving such petition or other process, to take a recognizance payable to the plaintiff or complainant, with good security, in double the amount sworn to, for the forthcoming of such personal property to answer such judgment, execution, or decree as may be rendered or issued in the case, and such security shall be bound for the payment of the eventual condemnation money, for which judgment may be signed up against the defendant and said security, and execution had thereon without further proceeding."

In section 5152 it is provided:

"And upon defendant failing to give such security, whether the affidavit be made at the commencement of the suit or pending the same, the property shall be seized and taken by the sheriff or other lawful officer, and delivered over to the plaintiff or complainant, his agent or attorney, upon his entering into like recognizance with security."

These sections are to be construed in connection with section 4483, quoted in the first division, and apply only in actions for the recovery of personalty. If the action had been called trover but was for recovery of a tract of land, palpably it would not have been the kind of action contemplated by the statute, and a so-called "forthcoming bond" for the production of the property to answer the judgment of the court would not be a statutory bond, within the meaning of the law. So also, where the action is for recovery both of personalty and realty, a forthcoming bond given for all the property at twice its value is not the bond contemplated by the statute. In the latter case there is no authority of law for bail relatively to the realty. Bond is required by the statute relatively to personality, but in such case the amount of the bond is twice the value of the personality. Where a "forthcoming bond" is given for both realty and personality, the court can no more render a summary judgment under the Civil Code, § 5151, against the principal and sureties on the bond, than it could, in an action of trover under the Civil Code, § 4483, render judgment for recovery of the realty. Roney v. McCall, 128 Ga. 249, 57 S. E. 503; Fitzgerald Band v. Colony Bank, 115 Ga. 790, 42 S. E. 70. In the case of Glover v. Gore, 74 Ga. 680, it appears that an action was instituted to recover certain crops grown on specified land, some of which had been gathered and some was still attached to the soil. The plaintiff sued out bail in trover under the statute which is now in Civil Code, §§ 5151, 5152. The defendants refused to give bail, and thereupon the plaintiff gave bond and took possession of and gathered the crops. The plaintiff having been nonsuited, the court did not, as in the present case, enter summary judgment against the plaintiff and his sureties on the forthcoming bond; but the defendants proceeded with this common-law remedy by separate action on the bond, and were allowed to recover. See Stephens v. Crawford, 3 Ga. 499 (3); Justices v. Ennis, 5 Ga. 569; Wall v. Mount, 121 Ga. 831, 834, 49 S. E. 778, and citations; Mount v. Wall, 127 Ga. 211, 56 S. E. 298; Spooner v. Smith, 134 Ga. 323, 67 S. E. 813.

It was erroneous for the trial judge, after nonsuiting the plaintiffs, to enter summary judgment against the principals and sureties on the bond, for an amount alleged in the affidavit for bail to be the value of the realty and personality. Should the defendant bring a separate action on the bond on the basis that the principal obtained possession of all the property under the bond, and that it was valid as a common-law bond, the rights and equities of all parties involved in the crops which were taken possession of by the principals named in the bond could be adjusted.

The case differs on its facts from Marshall v. Livingston, 77 Ga. 21; Smith v. Adams, 79 Ga. 802, 5 S. E. 242; Lauchheimer v. Jacobs, 126 Ga. 261 (5), 55 S. E. 55; Pope v. Scott, 143 Ga. 275 (2), 84 S. E. 582; Petty v. Piedmont Fertilizer Co., 146 Ga. 149 (2), 90 S. E. 986—in each of which the action was properly brought in trover for the recovery of personality, and the bond given was in compliance with the statute.

The judgment of the Court of Appeals, affirming the judgment of nonsuit and the summary judgment of the trial court on the bond, must be reversed.

Judgment reversed.

All the Justices concur.

GEORGE, J. (concurring specially). Matured crops, ready to be harvested, though standing in the field, when produced by annual cultivation, are no part of the realty. Such crops must, for most civil purposes, be deemed personality. This is a workable rule, and the only workable rule. A distinction is to be observed between the natural growth of the soil, such as trees, grasses and the like, which at common law are parts of the soil, and products the result of annual labor of man in sowing and reaping, planting and gathering. In my opinion, therefore, the plaintiffs' petition set forth a cause of action for recovery of the property described therein, and should not have been dismissed on demurrer.

The plaintiffs' petition was for the recovery of the crop as personality. One of them made the affidavit prescribed by statute, to require the defendant to give bail. The defendant having failed to make bond, the plaintiffs executed a bond and took possession of the crops. This court has uniformly held that a party will not be permitted to assert inconsistent positions, and is bound by solemn admissions in judicio. In the opinion of the writer, the court is not authorized to afford to the plaintiffs relief against the judgment on the bond on the theory indicated in the sixth division of the decision. But, for the reasons already stated, the plaintiffs were entitled to recover the property sued for, under the allegations of the petition. I therefore concur in the judgment of reversal, but not in the ruling stated in the fourth and sixth headnotes, nor in the reasoning set out in the corresponding divisions of the opinion of the court.

CLARKE et al. v. ARMSTRONG et al.
(No. 1890.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 17, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Militia \Leftrightarrow 3—Members of dissolved military company held not entitled to sue for receivership and distribution of property.

Certain persons, claiming that they were members of an incorporated military company, which had no capital stock and which was not a commercial, trading, or ordinary business corporation, brought an equitable petition, alleging that the corporation had been virtually dissolved as the result of national and state legislation, and that petitioners were members of the corporation at the time of its dissolution. They charged that certain persons, acting as trustees of the corporation, were mismanaging the property, and there was danger of loss of the same, and prayed for injunctive relief and the appointment of a receiver to take charge of the property, and that the property be sold and the proceeds distributed among petitioners and those who were members at the time of the dissolution of the corporation. Held:

The petitioners showed no such interest in the property involved in the controversy as authorized them to maintain the action.

2. Militia \Leftrightarrow 3—Statute providing for receivership and distribution of assets of dissolved corporation inapplicable to military company.

The provisions of section 2245 of the Civil Code of 1910, relating to the disposition of the assets of a corporation which has been dissolved, do not apply to the disposition of the property of a corporation like the one involved in this controversy, it being a corporation for the accomplishment of certain public purposes, and not a trading or commercial corporation, where subscriptions for stock are required of its members and certificates of stock are issued.

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

3. Corporations \Leftrightarrow 629—"Equal" distribution of assets to stockholders on dissolution means equality of right proportionate to stock held by members.

The word "equal" as used in Civ. Code 1910, § 2245, providing that upon dissolution of a corporation all of the property and assets shall, after payment of debts, constitute a fund for equal distribution among its members, implies not absolute equality of amount, but equality of right entitling each member to an amount payable from the proceeds of the assets of the corporation proportionate to his interest in the corporation's property or to the amount of the shares of stock held by each member.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; W. D. Ellis, Judge.

Suit by F. P. Armstrong and others against P. F. Clarke and others. Demurrers to the petition were overruled, and defendants bring error. Reversed.

Armstrong and others brought a petition against Clarke and others, in which, with the amendments, the following facts were alleged: In the year 1859 the Georgia Legislature incorporated the Gate City Guard, the title of the act (Acts 1859, p. 382) being, "An act to incorporate the Gate City Guards of Atlanta, and to grant certain immunities and privileges to the members of same," and the named incorporators and their successors were given all the corporate powers deemed necessary for the purposes of a volunteer infantry corps. The number of men composing the corps should never exceed 80 privates, exclusive of commissioned and noncommissioned officers. The officers were to be a president and a secretary; the commanding officer being by virtue of his office the president. The immunities and privileges granted to the members and officers were to continue no longer than during membership in the corps. This charter was accepted, and the persons named in it organized under it and continued their organization until they entered the service of the Confederate government in the war between the states. In 1881, when this military corps, the Gate City Guard, began to acquire property, certain of its members applied to the superior court for a charter, which was in that year granted, incorporating the applicants as "the board of trustees of the Gate City Guard." The object of this corporation was to hold and manage the property and funds belonging to the Gate City Guard. This last-named corporation was to have no shares or paid-in capital. The trustees were to serve for the term and in the manner provided for by the constitution and by-laws of the Gate City Guard. The petitioners prayed that they be incorporated for 20 years, with the privilege of renewal. The order to incorporate recited that it appeared that a petition had been filed by certain named individuals for themselves and successors, asking to be incorporated for the purposes above stated, and that the same was in accordance with the requirements of law; and it was ordered that they be incorporated as prayed. Certain valuable real estate belonging to the Gate City Guard was accordingly conveyed to this trustee corporation. Debts having accumulated, a sale of certain property in the City of Atlanta was necessitated. The proceeds of this sale, after paying debts, was invested in other property on Peachtree Street, Atlanta. The charter of the trustee corporation expired by its time limitation in June, 1901. In March, 1902, J. F. O'Neill and certain other persons filed a petition to Fulton superior court, setting forth that in June, 1881, the old charter of the trustee corporation had been granted; that the petitioners were the legal successors of the persons named in the original petition and order of incorporation; that the original charter had expired in June, 1901; that the board of trustees of the Gate City Guard held the title to valuable property; that petitioners desired to have said charter of the board of trustees, etc., renewed and extended for a period of 20 years from the expiration of said former charter, to wit, June 18, 1901, with certain additions and amendments added. In one paragraph of their petition it was prayed that the trustees should consist of nine members, to wit, the captain, the first and second lieutenants ex officio, and the six other members to be elected at a meeting of the active enlisted members of the Gate City Guard; and it proceeded to set forth the details connected with the election of such trustees by the members of the Gate City Guard. It was further prayed, in another paragraph of the petition, that if the Gate City Guard should at any time disband, the trustees then in office should continue to serve, and preserve and take care of the property in their hands "until the reorganization is effected and recognized by said board of trustees." It was also prayed that the board be granted the power to elect such officers and make such rules for their government as they might see fit, but should not be permitted to sell any of the real property held for the benefit of the Gate City Guard, or invest in other property, without authority so to do by resolution adopted by a majority of the members of the Gate City Guard present at a meeting regularly held. It was further provided that a vote of two-thirds of the members of the Gate City Guard, in which a majority of the trustees concurred, should be had before the trustees could use the corpus of the estate, or incur the same for any purpose; that the board of trustees be given the power to collect the income from the property and hold the same subject to the disposition of the Gate City Guard, "and, upon being demanded by a majority vote of any regular or call meeting of said active company, shall be immediately turned over to said company by said board."

On May 27, 1902, an order was passed by Fulton superior court providing that—

"The charter of the board of trustees of the Gate City Guard, granted by this court on June 18, 1881, is hereby renewed and extended for a period of 20 years from June 18, 1901, the date of the expiration of said former charter, with all the rights, powers, and privileges contained in said former order of incorporation, except as the same may be enlarged, modified, limited, or amended by the provisions of the following application, and such others as are by law incident to corporations of like character, and the persons above named and their successors are incorporated for an additional term of 20 years from June 18, 1901, under the name and style of 'the board of trustees of the Gate City Guard,' with all the rights, powers, and privileges hereinbefore referred to."

After this last order was passed the Gate City Guard held a meeting and passed a resolution authorizing one Harwell, as their commissioner, to execute to the named board of trustees a deed conveying all the property of the company to the trustees; and Harwell executed such deed on June 13, 1902. After this conveyance the board of trustees decided to sell the real estate so conveyed to them by Harwell, and did sell it, and invested the proceeds in two lots on Houston street, Atlanta, which it is alleged is now worth $100,000. Although the members of the Gate City Guard were not enlisted in the military service of the state for the two years from March, 1893, to some time in 1895, they kept up their organization under their charter, and with the exception of these two years they have been continuously a part of the military forces of the state up to 1916. After the formation of the Fifth Regiment National Guard of Georgia, the company from the Gate City Guard belonged to that regiment and constituted Company L. On June 3, 1916, Congress passed what is known as the National Defense Act (39 Stat. 166). This legislation was adopted by Georgia under the act of August 21, 1916 (Acts 1916, p. 158). Section 61 of the National Defense Act of Congress (U. S. Comp. St. § 3044b) provided:

"No state shall maintain troops in time of peace other than as authorized in accordance with the organization prescribed under this act: Provided, that nothing contained in this act shall be construed as limiting the rights of the states and territories in the use of the National Guard within their respective borders in time of peace: Provided further, that nothing contained in this act shall prevent the organization and maintenance of state police or constabulary."

The petition alleges that the Gate City Guard was dissolved by this act of Congress.

On August 5, 1917, the Fifth Regiment, which included the members of the Gate City Guard as Company L, was drafted into the service of the United States under the Selective Draft Act of Congress, passed May 18, 1917 (40 Stat. 76). On July 13, 1916, Company L had been mustered into the service of the United States, and saw service on the Mexican border. In the year 1916 the board of trustees authorized Clarke, Harwell, and Silverman to incur the Houston street property, which they did by executing a loan deed for $21,000. This loan was made largely for the purpose of taking up a pre-existing mortgage of $10,000, and to enable the trustees to repair and improve the building. Clarke received a commission, it is alleged, of $2,000 for negotiating this loan. On April 24, 1917, the board of trustees, at the instance of Clarke, passed a resolution authorizing Clarke, Harwell, and Silverman to sell the Houston street property for a sum not less than $65,000, which power has not yet been executed. It is alleged that this property is now worth $100,000, and that Clarke and others will sell it unless restrained.

The petition sets forth that the charter of the first board of trustees was void, because the superior court had no jurisdiction or power to grant such a charter; also that the second charter of the board of trustees was void for the same reason, and also because it purported to be an extension or renewal of the first charter, but was not applied for before the expiration of the first charter. The deed from Harwell, as commissioner, to the board of trustees, was alleged to be unauthorized, because the legislative charter of the Gate City Guard required that all contracts in writing should be signed by the president and countersigned by the secretary. It was alleged that certain of the petitioners were members of Company L of the Fifth Regiment, which Company constituted the members of Gate City Guard, at the date of the act of Congress of June 3, 1916; that certain others of petitioners joined the company later in that month and before it was sent to the Mexican border; and that the rest of petitioners enlisted in the company after its return from Mexico, but before it was drafted into the service of the United States by the act of Congress known as the Selective Draft Act of 1917.

Petitioners prayed that the corporation known as Gate City Guard be decreed to have been dissolved; that an injunction be granted against the defendants to prevent any disposition of the property of the Gate City Guard; that a receiver be appointed; that the assets be converted into money and distributed equally among petitioners; that, in the event the court should decide that the Gate City Guard has not been dissolved, the title to the property be declared and adjudged not to be in the board of trustees, but in the corporation; and that the judgment and decree of the court may declare in whom the title to the property rests. General and special demurrers were filed by defendants on various grounds, among which were that there is no equity in the petition; that plaintiffs have no right to maintain same; that the facts alleged do not show that petitioners have or ever had any such interest in the property as would authorize them to have the same sold and the proceeds divided among them. All demurrers were overruled by the court, and the defendants excepted.

Brewster, Howell & Heyman, W. C. Hendrix and Mark Bolding, all of Atlanta, for plaintiffs in error.

R. B. Arnold, Lowry Arnold, and A. H. Davis, all of Atlanta, for defendants in error.

BECK, P. J. (after stating the facts as above). A reading of the foregoing statement of the substance of the pleadings in this case will disclose the fact that many important questions affecting military companies, both those which have been incorporated and those not incorporated, are involved—questions affecting not only the property rights that may have been acquired by such companies or corporations, but affecting their very existence. But there is one controlling question; and the proper determination of that, under our view of the case as presented, will render the decision of the other questions in the case unnecessary.

[1, 2] The demurrer in the case, upon one ground, raises the point that the petitioners below do not show that they have such an interest in the property involved in the controversy as authorizes them to maintain this suit. The petitioners' general contention is that the act of Congress of June 3, 1916, (39 Stat. 168), called the National Defense Act, had the effect of superseding and destroying the state legislation granting the charter to the Gate City Guard, and that, when the troops composing the guard were drafted into the service of the government, they were thereby discharged from the militia, and the effect was to destroy the state military organization theretofore existing, as the members of that organization who went into the federal service stood thereby discharged from the militia, according to the terms of the act, and that all those who failed to enter the service and take the oath were likewise discharged from the militia by the state government through the Adjutant General, and the effect of this was to leave the organization wholly without members. And they further insist that by no enactment prior to June, 1916, did Congress assume exclusive jurisdiction of organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia and of prescribing the discipline by which the state should train the militia, and never until the act of 1916 did Congress forbid the states from maintaining any other military organizations, and that therefore the Gate City Guard continued to exist up to June 3, 1916, at which time, by the enactment of the law referred to, the Gate City Guard as a military organization was effectively destroyed, and that the property then belonging to it was subject to be distributed according to the law controlling the assets belonging to corporations at the time of their dissolution, and that those members of the Gate City Guard who were members at the time of the dissolution were entitled to have the assets of the corporation divided among themselves equally after the debts of the company were paid. They claim the right to this property under the provisions of the Civil Code, § 2245, as follows:

"Upon the dissolution of a corporation, for any cause, all of the property and assets of every description belonging to the corporation shall constitute a fund, first, for the payment of its debts, and then for equal distribution among its members. To this end the superior court of the county where such corporation was located shall have power to appoint a receiver, under proper restrictions, properly to administer such assets under its direction."

If the section just quoted did not have the effect of giving to petitioners the right to have the property divided and to participate in a division of the same, then they had no right to maintain this suit. For, if the effect of the act of Congress relatively to the continued existence of the company was as petitioners contend, nevertheless, if upon its dissolution they were not entitled to have the property distributed among those who were members at the time of the termination of the existence of the company, they have no standing in court for any of the purposes sought by their petition. And we do think that section 2245 of the Code, above quoted, is applicable in case of a dissolution of a corporation like the one under consideration here.

[3] The expression "equal distribution among its members" has not the controlling force attributed to it in the argument of counsel for defendants in error, where it is insisted that the provision for "equal" distribution shows conclusively that the statute is applicable to corporations like that involved here; but, as the statute was intended to make provision for the distribution of the assets of corporations generally, where certificates of shares of stock are issued and held by the members of the corporation, the word "equal" must imply, not absolute equality of amount, but equality of right entitling each member to an amount payable from the proceeds of the assets of the corporation proportionate to his interest in the corporation's property or to the amount of the shares of stock held by each member.

From the statement of the facts in the case of Mason v. Atlanta Fire Co., 70 Ga. 604, 48 Am. Rep. 535, it appears that Mrs. Mason filed her bill on behalf of herself and her minor children against the Atlanta Fire Company, alleging, in substance, as follows: in 1850 (Laws 1849-50, p. 183) the company was incorporated by the Legislature under the name of the Fire Company of the City of Atlanta. They were to elect their own officers, who were to be commissioned by the Governor. The members, not exceeding 30 in number, were to be exempt from jury duty, and, except in case of war, from militia duty. The length of time for the continuance of the corporate privilege was not prescribed. By the act of 1854 (Laws 1853-54, p. 371) the membership was increased to 60, and the name changed to the Atlanta Fire Company No. 1. Perpetual succession was given, with the right to have a seal, to sue and be sued, to form a constitution and adopt by-laws. They subsequently adopted a constitution and by-laws, which provided for the election of members, their duties, their expulsion, the dropping of them from the roll for delinquencies, the election of officers, etc. No provision was made either in the charter or in the constitution and by-laws for the acquisition of property; but from the collection of dues from the members and by voluntary donations, fairs, festivals, excursions and other public and private entertainments, a considerable amount of money was raised and invested in real and personal property for the use of the company. Mason, the husband of complainant, had been a member of this company, and by his zeal, skill, and energy he contributed more to the creation of this fund than any other member. He died in October, 1867, being at that time an active member in good standing, with all his dues paid and a clear record on the company's books. In 1882 the system of fire service in Atlanta was changed; the volunteer service being discontinued and a paid department being organized. This company, therefore, was dissolved, or at least the object of its incorporation ceased. They had sold their personal property for an amount not known to complainant, and their real estate for $10,000, and the living members of the company were about to distribute the money without regard to the rights of the widows and orphans of deceased members. But it was charged that, if the fund was so distributed, it would, in a large measure, go into the hands of persons who were insolvent and could not respond to any judgment complainant might recover. She prayed for an accounting between living members and the representatives of deceased members, for the appointment of a receiver to take charge of the fund, and for injunction to prevent its being paid out until the rights of complainant could be ascertained. Defendant demurred to the bill: (1) Because complainant disclosed no right in herself to assert the supposed cause of action; and (2) because there was no equity in the bill. In the course of the decision in the case this court, after pointing out that the Atlanta Fire Company was not a trading, commercial, or ordinary business corporation, or anything like it, that its property was acquired, not by subscriptions paid by its members who took certificates of stock, but by donations made by public-spirited and patriotic citizens (for, whether the contributions came through fairs, concerts, or otherwise, still they were donations for a public object), said:

"The view we take of this case renders it unnecessary to determine whether this is a public or a private corporation, whether it is dissolved by the change and transfer of the service it was created to render to others authorized by the public authority to perform them, or whether it still exists as a body corporate, although it has ceased to render the services for which it was created or to exercise any of its franchises, * * * or what will become ultimately of the property belonging to the corporation upon its dissolution or the forfeiture of its charter. The only question we need to determine is as to the right of these complainants to participate in its property during its existence or after its dissolution."

And then, after discussing certain authorities and decisions from other courts, this court ruled that the complainant had no right to participate in the fund either during the existence of the corporation or after its dissolution. And in the case of Cummings v. Hollis, 108 Ga. 402, 33 S. E. 919, a case involving in part the property of the Gate City Guard of Atlanta, the company whose property is here involved, it was ruled:

"When persons claiming to be members of an incorporated military company which has no capital stock, but has acquired property by donation, file an equitable petition seeking to obtain control and management of the affairs of the company so incorporated, and allege that the company was, for noncompliance with law, disbanded by an order passed by the Governor of the state pursuant to a statute, and that the members of the company, including the plaintiffs, acquiesced in such order and ceased to exercise military functions, held, that the case so made does not entitle petitioners to the relief sought, and the petition was properly dismissed on demurrer."

And in the opinion in that case it was said:

"The corps [the Gate City Guard] was organized and incorporated for military duty, and for nothing else; and when it ceased to perform military duty under the laws of this state, the purposes of its incorporation were at an end, and its charter was subject to forfeiture for nonuser, under the general law providing for forfeiture of charters. Civil Code, § 1883. The petitioners seek to have the property of the corporation placed in the hands of a receiver until the court should hear and determine to whom the possession of the property belongs, and by the offered amendment they pray to have the property sold and the proceeds divided pro rata among the parties entitled thereto, as set out in the petition. There are two reasons why none of the prayers of the petitioners could have been granted. The first is that the petition shows on its face that the persons seeking relief are not members of the Gate City Guard and are not entitled to any of the rights or privileges conferred by the original charter. The only design in the creation of this corporate body was that its members, as a volunteer military organization, should become a part and parcel of the military forces of the state of Georgia, and the charter conferred upon the members no rights unless such military organization was kept up and maintained. The petition shows on its face that several years ago the company, finding military duty onerous, declined to enlist in the military forces of the state, as the law required, and were disbanded as a military organization by the commander in chief, and not allowed to drill and parade as a military organization. Having been incorporated only to perform duties which they allege became so onerous that they abandoned them, it seems to follow, as a matter of law, that the body ceased to exist as a corporation by practically surrendering its franchise. Certainly, if the members failed to perform military duty, they could do nothing. So that, under the allegations made, the petitioners show that they have no right as members of the Gate City Guard to any of the powers, privileges, or exemptions conferred upon the members of that corps under the act of incorporation. It is not a matter of concern whether the act incorporating the Gate City Guard constituted that organization either a public or a private corporation; nor is it necessary now for us to decide whether the organization still exists as a legal corporate body, nor whether as a corporation, in consequence of the nonuser of the franchises for a period of years, coupled with the fact that under the laws of this state it was disbanded by the Governor, it has incurred a forfeiture of the original charter rights and privileges. The only question involved by the demurrer is as to the right of petitioners to control the property alleged to be owned by the corporation; and if it be found that the petitioners have no right to the control of such property, nor any interest in it, then the ultimate disposition of such property does not concern either this court or the petitioners. The company was organized for a purely public purpose, that of performing military duty for the state. The powers conferred were only such as were necessary for a military organization. The corporation had no capital stock, no shares of stock of any character; no subscription was required of its members; the only property which it was authorized under the law to hold was such as was deemed necessary or convenient for the purposes of said corps, whether obtained by gift or purchase. Concerning the rights of the members of such a corporation, this court in the case of Mason v. Atlanta Fire Company, 70 Ga. 604, ruled that the representatives of a deceased member had no right to participate in a fund arising from the sale of the property of the company, either during the existence of the corporation or after it had been dissolved. The ruling made in that case was based on the reasons that members in such a corporation held no stock; that they were members while they lived and belonged to the organization; that while a member of it was in life he had nothing which he could sell or assign; that it was not a trading, commercial, or ordinary business corporation, or anything like it; that its property was acquired, not by subscription paid in by its members who thereby became entitled to certificates of stock, but by donations made by public-spirited and patriotic citizens, and, whether such contributions came from fairs, concerts, or otherwise, still they were donations for a great public object; that membership in such a corporation was not obtained as the result of contract, nor held by virtue of any vested right springing from a contract, but was only obtained by the will of those composing the company who acted under charter from the Legislature of the state. These reasons apply in full force to the organization of the Gate City Guard, as set out in the petition, and, because of them, it must be held that, even if petitioners are members of the Gate City Guard, they can have no such interest in the property belonging to that organization as entitles them either to control it, or to have it sold and the proceeds divided. On the dissolution of a corporation of this character, its assets are appropriated in other ways than by a division among its members."

It may be that a part of what was said was obiter dictum, but the reasoning upon which the ruling in that case is based is applicable to the controlling question in the present case, and we adopt it as sound principle.

It follows from what we have said that, if the corporation was destroyed by the act of 1916, then these petitioners have no right to maintain this suit. If, on the other hand, it was not dissolved, if it is still in existence, petitioners or other members of the corporation may call upon the officials of the company to take corporate action to preserve the property from waste; and if they refuse to do so, then under proper allegations as members of a corporation, where directors or those occupying a position analogous to directors refuse to act, the members may act. But these petitioners show no right to maintain this suit respecting the property in question here.

ATKINSON, J. In this case a general demurrer to the petition was overruled, and the judgment of the trial court was reversed. Clarke v. Armstrong, 150 Ga. —, 106 S. E. 289. After the judgment overruling the demurrer, but before the decision by this court reversing that judgment, the trial judge appointed a temporary receiver and granted an interlocutory injunction in accordance with prayers of the petition. A separate bill of exceptions assigns error on that judgment. Held, that the ruling by this court relating to the decision of the trial court on demurrer is controlling on the assignments of error in the last bill of exceptions; and it follows that the judgment appointing the temporary receiver and granting an interlocutory injunction must be reversed.

1. Master and servant §107(5)—Duty to furnish safe place inapplicable to place transformed by work.

The general rule requiring a master to furnish his servant a safe place to work applies to a permanent place, and not to places constantly shifting and being transformed as a direct result of the servant's labor.

2. Master and servant §129(7)—Defective roadbed not proximate cause of injury in attempting to pull car out of hole.

Where a railroad roadbed over which an employee was moving a flat car and pile driver gave way, permitting the car to sink and the employee, in attempting to pull the car back, with full knowledge of the danger and risk assumed, was killed when the car turned over, the faulty construction of the roadbed was not the proximate cause of the death.

Stephens, Barrow & Heyward, of Savannah, for plaintiff in error.

Hitch & Denmark, of Savannah, for defendant in error.

LUKE, J. In this case an administratrix sought to recover damages on account of the death of her husband, alleged to have been caused by negligence of the defendant. The action was brought under the statutes of South Carolina, the injury and death of the deceased having occurred in South Carolina, and the defendant being resident of Chatham county, Ga. The plaintiff's petition alleges, substantially, that on December 1, 1919, her husband was in the employ of the defendant as a foreman of a gang of men operating a pile driver near the defendant's mill in Jasper county, S. C.; that it was the duty of her husband, with his gang of men, to lay rails and cross-ties, operate a pile driver and do such other work as the superintendent of logging and construction directed him to perform; that her husband was ordered to lay cross-ties and rails on a roadbed that had recently been constructed by other employees of the defendant, and, after laying the cross-ties and rails on said roadbed, he was directed to move a pile driver over said newly constructed railroad to a point near a gully, over which gully piles were to be driven for constructing a trestle or bridge; that the defendant had recently constructed, as an experiment, a combination pile driver and skidder, which was constructed on a flat car and weighed about 5,700 pounds and by reason of the construction and weight made the car top-heavy; that the roadbed was recently constructed; that her husband was directed to move the flat car and the pile driver over the said roadbed toward the gully for the purpose of driving the piles; that after moving the pile driver and car a short distance, the roadbed gave way and the car sank 8 or 10 inches; that the car was stopped; that after the car was stopped, her husband attempted to pull it back, and while standing on the car, operating the engine to pull the car out of the hole, the car turned over and fell on him and crushed him to death; that her husband was in the performance of his duty, free from fault, and exercising due care and diligence for his safety, did not know of the weak spot in the roadbed, and was not warned of the same by the defendant, and, in the exercise of ordinary care and diligence could not have discovered it; that the defendant knew of the dangerous condition of the roadbed, or in the exercise of ordinary care and diligence should have known it, and should have warned her husband; and that it was the duty of the defendant to have and maintain a safe place for her husband to work. The plaintiff pleads that her husband was killed by reason of negligence of the defendant as follows:

(a) "Said defendant company negligently failed to provide the said M. H. Beach with a safe and properly constructed roadbed for him to operate the said skidder car and pile driver on and over; (b) that said defendant company negligently required the said M. H. Beach to operate said skidder car and pile driver over an unsafe, weak, and defectively constructed roadbed without warning the said M. H. Beach of the unsafe, weak, and defective condition of said roadbed; (c) that said defendant company negligently provided the said M. H. Beach with an experimental, unsafe, defectively constructed and top-heavy skidder and pile driver; (d) said defendant company negligently required the said M. H. Beach to use and operate the same without warning him of the defective construction and top-heaviness thereof, and the danger that might exist in the use thereof or result therefrom."

[1] The defendant demurred to the petition, upon the grounds that there was no cause of action. The court sustained the demurrer and dismissed the petition, and the plaintiff excepted. Held: It was not error to sustain the general demurrer. Under repeated rulings of the Supreme Court and of this court the general rule requiring a master to furnish his servant with a safe place to work is applied to a permanent place, and does not apply to places constantly shifting and being transformed as a direct result of the servant's labor. See Cowart v. Southern

Marble Co., 144 Ga. 255, 87 S. E. 282, and cases cited; Atlantic Paper & Pulp Corp. v. Bowen, 23 Ga. App. 249, 97 S. E. 867; Armour v. Hahn, 111 U. S. 813, 4 Sup. Ct. 433, 28 L. Ed. 440.

[2] In the instant case the allegations of the plaintiff clearly show that the proximate cause of the death of the plaintiff's husband was not faulty construction of the roadbed, for it is pleaded that after the roadbed had given way the deceased was not injured, and would not have been injured, had it not been for the fact that, with full knowledge of the danger and risk assumed, he undertook to pull the pile driver and car out of the hole into which they had sunk. Whatever may have been the negligence of the defendant in the construction of the roadbed, and however little the deceased may have known of the dangerous and weak construction of the roadbed, when the car sank and the roadbed gave way he was fully apprised of its defects and weaknesses, was at a place of safety, free from dangers of the roadbed upon which he himself had placed cross-ties and laid rails, and would have escaped injury had he not undertaken to pull the car from the hole into which it had sunk. The reasons here given, pointing out the defects in the plaintiff's petition, are in accord with the laws of the state wherein the plaintiff's husband lost his life. The court did not err in sustaining the general demurrer.

When objection to a ruling is made in such a way as not to put the court and opposing counsel upon notice that the objection is insisted upon, an assignment of error upon the ruling is without merit.

2. Trial ¶108—Defendant's refusal to argue held not to prevent plaintiff's counsel from arguing the issues.

Where plaintiff's counsel merely stated the names of cases relied on by him and waived his opening argument, stating that he would argue the issues in his concluding argument, and defendant's counsel thereupon declined to argue the case, plaintiff's counsel was not deprived of his right to argue the issues; he having been given no warning, before concluding his opening statement, that he would be deprived of such right.

Error from City Court of Atlanta; H. M. Reid, Judge.

Action by R. Y. S. Hunnicutt against the Georgia Railway & Power Company and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Arminius Wright, of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error.

Colquitt & Conyers, of Atlanta, for defendants in error.

LUKE, J. Hunnicutt sued the Georgia Railway & Power Company and Weisinger for damages for alleged personal injuries. The case was in default as to Weisinger, and the jury rendered a verdict against him alone. The evidence was conflicting, and would have supported a verdict either way. The only question for decision can be best understood from the following statement in the motion for a new trial:

"Upon conclusion of the evidence in the above-stated case, plaintiff's counsel stated to the court the names of certain cases which he contended were controlling in the case at bar. He then stated that he would waive his opening argument, and in his concluding argument would argue only the issues made by the evidence and as set out in the declaration. Plaintiff's counsel occupied about five minutes in this statement. Thereupon defendant's counsel inquired of the court, if he declined to argue the case, would that be an end of the argument under the statement of plaintiff's counsel that he waived his opening argument after stating his contention as to the law of the case. The court stated that would be the effect if defendant's counsel declined to argue the case. Defendant's counsel then declined to make an argument. Plaintiff's counsel then stated to the court that he had not intended to waive his concluding argument by waiving the opening argument, that he had stated what he believed to be the controlling law of the case, and that he would argue in conclusion the contentions of the plaintiff as set out by the pleadings, and as shown by the evidence. The court suggested to plaintiff's counsel that, if he had made a full opening argument and defendant's counsel had declined to make an argument, the effect would be to cut off further argument, and it seemed to the court that what had occurred on the part of plaintiff's counsel would be equivalent to having made an argument, so far as the effect was concerned, under this rule. The plaintiff's counsel then said, 'Well, let it go,' and thereupon the court proceeded to charge the jury."

[2] We think the court's ruling as above indicated was, in effect, that under the facts stated the plaintiff's counsel was precluded from further argument. There having been nothing said as to the manner of argument until after counsel had concluded his opening statement to the jury, we are of the opinion that so to rule would be to deprive him, without warning, of the invaluable right of arguing the facts of his client's case to the jury; and, upon proper objection, this court would be constrained to hold such ruling error. See Cartright v. Clopton, 25 Ga. 85, Grant v. State, 97 Ga. 789, 25 S. E. 399, and Porter v. State, 6 Ga. App. 770 (1), 65 S. E. 814.

[1] We are quite certain, however, that the objection as interposed, when coupled with the subsequent and final statement of the plaintiff's counsel, "Well, let it go," does not constitute a good assignment of error.

"The motion should have been made in such a manner as that the judge should clearly understand that a ruling was being invoked, and that opposing counsel should also have notice of it." Grant v. State, 97 Ga. 789, 25 S. E. 399.

After the court had argued and reiterated his ruling, and counsel, by way of reply, said, "Well, let it go," it would appear to the ordinary mind that counsel yielded to the court's ruling; and, at best, we do not think it can be held that either the court or opposing counsel was put upon sufficient notice that plaintiff's counsel intended to insist upon his objection to the court's ruling.

This being the only question argued in the brief of counsel for the plaintiff in error, the judgment is affirmed.

Appeal and error \S 999(1)—Jury finding on question of fact is final.

The jury are the final arbiters on questions of fact, and, where they have passed on the evidence and no error of law is shown, their finding is final.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; John D. Humphries, Judge.

Action by Mrs. A. A. McMahon against W. E. Wells. Judgment for plaintiff and certiorari refused, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Roy Lewis, of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error.

Anderson & Slate, of Atlanta, for defendant in error.

BLOODWORTH, J. In the municipal court of Atlanta, Mrs. McMahon sued Wells on a promissory note. Admitting that the amount sued for was correct, the defendant pleaded a set-off. On conflicting evidence the jury found for the plaintiff the full amount sued for. The defendant applied for a writ of certiorari, alleging that—

"Said verdict and said judgment thereon was contrary to the evidence, without evidence to support it, and contrary to the principles of justice and equity."

The judge of the superior court refused to sanction the certiorari, and in his order said:

"The evidence warranted the verdict; the jury were the judges of the credibility of the witnesses; they had the right, if they saw fit, to believe the testimony of the plaintiff's witnesses, which was in conflict with the testimony of the witnesses for the defendant."

It is well settled that the jury are the final arbiters on questions of fact, and where they have passed on the evidence and no error of law is shown, their finding is final. The judge of the superior court properly refused to sanction the certiorari.

Judgment affirmed.

Negligence \S 22½—Guest cannot recover for automobile driver's negligence unless gross.

One who was an invited guest and gratuitous passenger in another's automobile could not recover for the other's negligence in driving the automobile, unless it amounted to gross negligence.

Error from City Court of Savannah; Davis Freeman, Judge.

Action by Mrs. E. A. Parrish against Mrs. J. D. Epps. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Hitch & Denmark, of Savannah, for plaintiff in error.

Oliver & Oliver, of Savannah, for defendant in error.

LUKE, J. This case arises by reason of a suit to recover damages, wherein it is alleged that the plaintiff was riding as an invited guest, in an automobile owned and driven by the defendant; that while so riding as such invited guest, along with other members of her family, who were also invited guests, the defendant carelessly and negligently, and because of inexperience and lack of skill in the handling of an automobile, lost control of the automobile and drove it, head on, into a large oak tree, wrecking the automobile, and that by reason of the wreck, the plaintiff was injured. The defendant demurred to the petition, upon the ground that it set forth no cause of action. The court overruled the demurrer.

Held: Inasmuch as the plaintiff was an invited guest and a gratuitous passenger, and it not being alleged that the defendant was guilty of gross negligence, it was error for the court to overrule the general demurrer. It is our opinion that in order for an invited guest in an automobile to recover of the owner and driver of the car for an injury occasioned by the negligence of the driver, it must be pleaded that such negligence was gross negligence. See, in this connection, the reasoning set out in Self v. Dunn & Brown, 42 Ga. 528, 5 Am. Rep. 544. See, also, in this connection, Civil Code 1910, § 3473; Huddy on Automobiles (5th Ed.) 890; Massaletti v. Fitzroy, 228 Mass. 487, 118 N. E. 168, L. R. A. 1918C, 264, Ann. Cas. 1918B, 1088. We understand that it has been an open question in Georgia as to what degree of care is owed by the owner and driver of an automobile to an invited guest. We have reached the conclusion that in order for the invited guest to recover from the owner and operator of an automobile for an injury received by reason of the negligent driving or handling of the machine, there must be facts pleaded that show gross neglect upon the part of the owner and driver of the machine. We have examined cases from other states, and in all cases where there seems to be a holding to the contrary the cases were dependent upon the particular facts there pleaded, such as the driving of the automobile at a reckless rate of speed over the protest of the invited guest, or the racing of the car with other vehicles over his protest. We find no case where there was a ruling contrary to the view we take upon the particular facts as pleaded in the instant case. It was error to overrule the general demurrer to the plaintiff's petition.

Judgment reversed.

Railroads — 335(5)—Driver of automobile towing another car, held guilty of negligence proximately causing collision.

Where plaintiff knew that it was about train time, and could have observed an approaching train if he had looked or listened, and knew that the automobile he was towing was heavily loaded, and would have gotten across the track before the arrival of the train if his car had not stalled because of such load, he was negligent in going into a place of danger with the automobile overburdened, and such negligence, and not the negligence of railroad, if any, was the proximate cause of the damage to his automobile.

Error from City Court of Hinesville; W. C. Hodges, Judge.

Action by O. L. Stevens against W. D. Hines, Director General of Railroads. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Bolling Whitfield, of Brunswick, and N. J. Norman, of Savannah, for plaintiff in error. Darsey & Mills, of Hinesville, for defendant in error.

LUKE, J. This case arises by reason of a suit to recover damages from the Federal Director General, operating the Seaboard Air Line Railway, for alleged damage to an automobile, the property of the plaintiff. The evidence was conclusive that at Dorchester, a station on the line of railroad, there was a crossing over its track; that the track was perfectly straight for several miles, and there were no obstructions to the view; that at a time when a regular passenger train was due to arrive and stop at Dorchester, the plaintiff, who owned a garage within a very few yards of the railroad, coupled behind his Ford car, with a chain about 15 feet long, another Ford car, and started his car in motion, towing the other car in the direction of the railroad, and just as the car in which he was riding got upon the railroad track, his car, because of the heavy load which he was towing, was stalled and stopped immediately upon the railroad track; that upon discovering the approaching train he jumped from his car to a place of safety, and two persons who were in the car that was being towed also jumped to a place of safety; that the engine struck the automobile on the track, and completely wrecked it. There is no conflict in the evidence that the plaintiff did not look to see if there was a train approaching before he went upon the track. The evidence is in conflict as to how far away the train was when he first discovered it. The plaintiff said that it was about the distance of two telegraph poles, or 150 or 200 yards away; witnesses in his behalf place it even closer. There is conflict as to whether the whistle of the engine was blown and the bell rung. The engineer operating the engine testified that he was within 25 yards of the automobile when it suddenly ran upon and stopped on the railroad track; that he had proper brakes for stopping the train, and they were in perfect working condition; that he immediately observed the car upon the track, and applied his brakes with full force, and reversed his engine, and did everything in his power to stop the train before striking the automobile, but that the automobile ran upon the track so closely that it was impossible to stop the train; that he had his train under control preparatory to making his regular stop at the station; that he sounded his whistle and gave the proper blow-post signal at the proper place. Another member of the train crew testified to the blowing of the whistle and the application of brakes, and corroborated the engineer's evidence as to the distance the train was away from the automobile at the time the automobile ran upon the track.

Held: The verdict in favor of the plaintiff was without evidence to support it. There being no conflict in the evidence that if it had not been for the heavy load, which the plaintiff was undertaking to tow with the destroyed automobile, he would have gotten across the track before the arrival of the train, and there being no conflict in the evidence that the plaintiff knew that it was about train time, and the track was perfectly straight, so that he may have observed the train a mile or more away, if he had cared to look or listen, in our opinion he was grossly negligent in going upon the railroad track, a place of danger, with the automobile overburdened as he says he knew it was. We cannot agree that the proximate cause of the plaintiff's damage was the result of negligence of the defendant's employees. They could not anticipate the presence suddenly of an automobile so overloaded that it would likely stall upon the track. The plaintiff's own negligence was the proximate cause of his damage. It was error to overrule the motion for a new trial.

Judgment reversed.

Appeal and error \S 977(4)—First grant of new trial on any ground not disturbed, unless verdict was demanded.

Under Civ. Code 1910, \S 6204, the first grant of a new trial, whether general, or on a ground involving questions of evidence, or a ground involving purely questions of law, will not be disturbed, unless no other verdict than the one rendered could possibly have been returned.

BLOODWORTH, J. This case comes to this court upon exceptions to the first grant of a new trial. Paragraph 6204 of the Civil Code of 1910 is as follows:

"The first grant of a new trial will not be disturbed by the Supreme Court, unless the plaintiff in error shows that the judge abused his discretion in granting it, and that the law and facts require the verdict, notwithstanding the judgment of the presiding judge."

In Weinkle v. Brunswick & W. Railroad Co., 107 Ga. 368, 38 S. E. 471, the Supreme Court said:

"It may be now considered as settled that this court will not, under any circumstances, reverse a judgment granting a first new trial, whether the grant be general upon all the grounds of the motion or special upon one or more grounds only, or whether it be upon a ground which involves questions of evidence of upon a ground which involves purely questions of law, unless it is made to appear that no other verdict than the one rendered could possibly have been returned under the law and facts of the case. Unless the case can be brought within the exception just stated, it is useless for parties to bring before this court the judgment of a trial judge granting a first new trial."

2. Larceny ¶52—Evidence held admissible to corroborate defendant's claim as to purchasing stolen car.

On a trial for stealing a Ford car which defendant claimed to have purchased from two men dressed as soldiers, testimony that two men so dressed tried to sell a witness a car within a day or two prior to the theft held admissible, though the description of the car was exceedingly vague.

Error from Superior Court, Bartow County; M. C. Tarver, Judge.

Guy Stringer was convicted of stealing an automobile, and he brings error. Reversed.

John S. Wood, of Canton, and J. M. Neel, Jr., and J. R. Whitaker, both of Cartersville, for plaintiff in error.

Joe M. Lang, Sol. Gen., of Calhoun, for the State.

BROYLES, C. J. The indictment in this case charges the accused, Guy Stringer, with stealing—

"one Ford five-passenger touring car, 1918 model, with bright bumper in front, with the two outside isinglass windows in the rear of same torn, of the value of $600, the property of J. I. Lowe."

[1] Ground 5 of the amendment to the motion for a new trial is as follows:

"Upon the trial of said case, and during the introduction of evidence by the defendant, the defendant regularly introduced and swore as a witness one J. V. Reece. The witness J. V. Reece testified: 'I know Guy Stringer. I recall the incident, but not the date, that Mr. Stringer had a car taken from him over there last spring a year ago. Just the day before, or within a day or so prior to, the time this car was taken from him, I had a conversation with two men dressed in soldier's uniform, over there, with reference to selling me a car.

This conversation occurred on the road about one mile from where Guy Stringer lives.' The state then objected to this evidence of the witness Reece, and the court excluded it unless it was shown to be a similar [car] to the car that was taken from Stringer. The witness Reece testified that he was not familiar with automobiles and could not definitely describe the automobile which they tried to sell him, as he made no inspection of it; that they were out on the side of the road and wanted to sell him the car; that he did not know the make on it, but it was a two-seated car and had a top on it; that he never saw the car which was taken from Guy Stringer unless this car which the soldiers tried to sell him was the car which was taken from Stringer. The court thereupon excluded the evidence of the witness Reece, and refused to permit him to testify further. Counsel for the defendant then stated to the court that the witness Reece would testify that on the day prior to the day the car in question was taken from Guy Stringer, or a day or so prior to that time, the witness Reece was on the public road about one mile from Guy Stringer's house, and two men dressed in soldier's uniform tried to sell him a two-seated automobile; that these two persons dressed in soldier's uniform were unknown to the witness, and he had never seen them before or since, but that they went off in the direction of Guy Stringer's house. The court thereupon excluded this evidence and refused to permit it to go to the jury for consideration by the jury. Counsel for the defendant thereupon asked the court to let the jury retire, so that the witness could testify in the absence of the jury and thus get it into the record. The court refused to permit the jury to retire, and stated that the court would permit the statement in the record just as if the witness had testified it into the record.

"Movant insists that the court erred in refusing to permit the witness to so testify and in refusing to permit said evidence to go to the jury for its consideration, and says that this ruling by the court was hurtful error, because, as movant insists, this was most material and vital evidence for the defendant, as it was strongly corroborative of the defendant's statement that he had bought the automobile in question from two men dressed in soldier's uniform, and tended strongly to show that the defendant had really bought the car and had not stolen the same as the State contended."

This court is of the opinion that under all the facts of the case the trial court erred in excluding the testimony as above complained of, and that this error requires another trial of the case.

[2] While the exceedingly vague description of the automobile in the rejected evidence did not show that the car there testified about by the witness Reece was the same car afterwards found in the defendant's possession and which he claimed to have bought from two men dressed as soldiers, there was nothing in that description to indicate that it was not the same automobile. At any rate, the excluded testimony tended indirectly to corroborate the defendant's explanation as to how he came into possession of the car, and was admissible for what it was worth.

The other alleged errors are not passed upon, as they are not likely to recur on another trial of the case.

Judgment reversed.

Suit by J. A. Coleman against the Savannah Bank & Trust Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error, and defendant files a cross-bill of exceptions. Judgment affirmed, and cross-bill of exceptions dismissed.

Hitch & Denmark, of Savannah, for plaintiff in error.

W. L. Clay, of Savannah, for defendant in error.

LUKE, J. This case arises by reason of a suit by Coleman against the Savannah Bank & Trust Company for $8,023.33. The plaintiff pleads his right to recover by alleging substantially that he shipped to the Producers' Naval Stores Company, who were naval stores factors, 432 casks of spirits of turpentine, with instructions to the Producers' Naval Stores Company to place the turpentine in tanks; that the turpentine was placed in tanks of the National Tank & Export Company, and receipts were given by the latter company to the Producers' Naval Stores Company; that subsequently the Producers' Naval Stores Company pledged the tank receipts to the Savannah Bank & Trust Company to secure certain of its notes, aggregating the sum sued for; that the president of the Producers' Naval Stores Company was a director of the Savannah Bank & Trust Company, and that the office of the Producers' Naval Stores Company was in the Savannah Bank & Trust Company building; that the Producers' Naval Stores Company sold the turpentine and paid the proceeds to the Savannah Bank & Trust Company; and that subsequently the Producers' Naval Stores Company was adjudicated to be bankrupt. At the conclusion of the plaintiff's evidence a nonsuit was granted, and to this judgment he excepted.

[1, 2] Held: The judgment of the court awarding a nonsuit was not erroneous. The evidence did not prove the plaintiff's case as laid, nor did the evidence authorize the plaintiff to recover upon his petition. The evidence clearly established the fact that the Savannah Bank & Trust Company had no notice that the turpentine was the property of the plaintiff, or had ever been the property of the plaintiff. The receipts from the Tank Company for the turpentine were in the name of Producers' Naval Stores Company and were negotiable, and there was nothing to indicate title to the property in any one else other than Producers' Naval Stores Company. The evidence further developed the fact that Coleman knew this. The plaintiff further failed to show a right to recover, because the evidence showed that the Producers' Naval Stores Company, at his direction, sold the turpentine and deposited the proceeds of the sale to its credit, and rendered to him accounts of sales, and subsequently, from its funds on deposit, paid to the Savannah Bank & Trust Company the notes referred to in the plaintiff's petition. This case differs from the two cases relied upon by the plaintiff. Bank v. Nelson, 38 Ga. 391, 95 Am. Dec. 400, and Savannah Bank & Trust Co. v. McQueen, 149 Ga. 302, 100 S. E. 33. In the Nelson Case, it will be noted, certain agents were given special and limited authority to sell the goods stored with them, and there was no delivery of the goods to the bank, and the bank had constructive notice of the limited authority. In the case that we have here for review there is no claim by the bank to the turpentine, nor is there any notice to the bank that the tank receipts, which are symbolic and negotiable, were the property of any one other than the Producers' Naval Stores Company. There is no evidence that the Producers' Naval Stores Company was the agent of Coleman. Of course, there is the further distinction that the turpentine was actually sold and proper accounts of sales were rendered to Coleman, and the notes of the Producers' Naval Stores Company to the Savannah Bank & Trust Company was paid, not with the turpentine, but from the general funds of the Producers' Naval Stores Company. In the McQueen Case, supra, the bank had notice that the factor, in pledging his principal's property, was acting as an agent, and not as an owner. Under no view of the evidence in this case, upon the issues formed by the pleadings, was the plaintiff entitled to recover of the defendant. It was not error to grant a nonsuit.

LUKE, J. [1] 1. Where it is recited in a bill of exceptions in a criminal case that it is tendered "within the time allowed by law," and there is nothing in the bill of exceptions or the entries thereon, or in the record, tending to show that perhaps, as a matter of fact, the bill of exceptions was not so tendered, except that it was signed by the judge more than 20 days after the date of the judgment excepted to, the writ of error will not be dismissed on the ground that the bill of exceptions was not tendered and signed within 20 days from the date of the judgment excepted to. Under such circumstances, it will be presumed that the bill of exceptions was tendered within 20 days from the date of the judgment and that the judge held the papers, through no fault of the plaintiff in error or his counsel, until the date of the certificate. See, in this connection, Pennington v. Sparta, 15 Ga. App. 287, 82 S. E. 826; Strickland v. Brannen, 18 Ga. App. 325, 89 S. E. 377; Cole v. Western Union Telegraph Co., 23 Ga. App. 479, 98 S. [2] 2. The defendant was charged with disorderly conduct in violation of a city ordinance of the city of Savannah. The evidence authorized the recorder, who tried the defendant, to find that at night, at her home, she cursed police officers who had called her to her door to make inquiry of her about matters in their line of duty. She not only cursed them, but slammed the door of her house and ordered them away. It was not error for the judge of the superior court to overrule the certiorari.

New trial \S 71.—Properly denied when evidence conflicting.

A motion for a new trial on the ground that the verdict was contrary to the evidence was properly overruled where the evidence was conflicting.

Error from Superior Court, Clinch County; J. I. Summerall, Judge.

Action by O. C. Cowart against C. L. Stanley. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

S. Burkhalter, of Homerville, and E. H. Williams, of Alma, for plaintiff in error.

W. T. Dickerson, of Homerville, for defendant in error.

LUKE, J. Cowart instituted an action in trover against Stanley to recover certain property. Upon conflicting evidence, the jury found in favor of the plaintiff. The verdict has the approval of the trial judge, and, the only assignment of error being that the verdict was contrary to the evidence, it was not error to overrule the motion for a new trial.

FOUCHE v. RENFROE.

(Nos. 11458, 11459.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2. Feb. 26, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Bailment \S 11, 12, 13, 14(1), 31(1).—Bailee, exercising proper care, not liable for loss or destruction, but burden is on him to show care; degree of care required stated.

A bailee, who has exercised the proper degree of care and diligence in protecting and keeping safely the thing bailed, is relieved from any liability for its loss or destruction; but, upon proof of loss, the burden is upon the bailee to show that he has exercised the proper degree of care and diligence. Civil Code 1910, \S 3469, 3470. "If the bailment is for the benefit exclusively of the bailee, he must use extraordinary care; if for the mutual benefit of the parties, ordinary care; and if for the exclusive benefit of the bailor, slight care will suffice." Merchants' National Bank of Savannah v. Guilmartin, 88 Ga. 797, 799, 15 S. E. 831, 832 (17 L. R. A. 322).

2. Bailment \S 14(1).—For repairs calls for ordinary care, though repairs have been completed.

Where a bailment in its inception is for the mutual benefit of both the bailor and the bailee, as where the thing bailed is deposited with the bailee for the purpose of making repairs for a consideration to the bailee, the bailee is under a duty to exercise ordinary care and diligence to protect the property. A compliance by the bailee with his contractual obligation to make the repairs and a holding of the property bailed until the bailor can call for it does not render the bailment any the less one for the mutual benefit of both parties, and is not such a change in its nature as will absolve the bailee from his duty to exercise ordinary care in preserving the property bailed.

3. Master and servant \S 303.—Tort of servant negligently selected actionable, though act is outside scope of authority.

"Every person shall be liable for torts committed by his * * * servant, by his command or in the prosecution and within the scope of his business, whether the same be by negligence or voluntary." Civil Code 1910, \S 4413. Where a servant departs from the prosecution of his business and commits a tort while acting without the scope of his authority, the person employing him may still be liable if he failed to exercise due care in the selection of his servant.

4. Master and servant ¶303—Instruction stating liability of master for servant's torts held properly given.

Where an automobile was deposited by the owner with a garage man for the purpose of making repairs thereon, and where during the continuance of the bailment the automobile was stolen by one of the servants of the garage man, employed to work around the garage, in a suit brought by the owner against the garage man to recover damages for the loss of the automobile a charge of the court submitting to the jury the above legal propositions was correct.

5. Damages ¶127—Insurance against loss not defense to bailor's action against bailee.

In a suit against a bailee for loss of property bailed, it is no defense that the bailor was insured against such loss.

6. Bailment ¶11—Bailee cannot escape common-law liability by posting notice.

A bailee cannot by the posting of a notice to the effect that he will not be responsible for damage to articles bailed by fire or theft relieve himself of his common-law liability to exercise due care in preserving the property against damage from such causes.

7. No errors committed.

The charge of the court fairly submitted all the issues in the case and fairly called attention to all of the contentions of the defendant. No error of law appears as set out in any of the grounds of the motion for a new trial, and the evidence authorized the verdict for the plaintiff.

Error from Superior Court, Bartow County; M. C. Tarver, Judge.

1. Criminal law ¶822(1)—Charge should be read in its entirety.

Excerpts from the charge, which are not objectionable when the charge is read in its entirety, are not grounds for reversal.

2. Criminal law ¶845(1)—Newly discovered evidence which would not probably produce different result not ground for new trial.

Newly discovered evidence, which is not such as would be likely to produce a different verdict upon another trial, does not require a new trial.

[2] The newly discovered evidence is not such as would be likely to produce a different verdict upon another trial of the case.

The defendant has had a legal trial, and for no reason appearing in the record was it error for the court to overrule the motion for a new trial.

Appeal and error ¶588 — Evidence not reviewed, when not briefed as required by law.

LUKE, J. Under repeated rulings of the Supreme Court, by which this court is bound,

In the instant case there was no attempt to brief the evidence at all; the evidence sent to this court in the transcript of the record being apparently the evidence in full, with questions and answers, interspersed with objections by counsel and rulings of the court. In other words, there is no brief of evidence therefore, as no question is presented for decision which can be determined without reference to the evidence, the judgment of the court below must be affirmed. Municipal corporations \S 705(12)—Automobile owner's guests held not responsible for his fault in driving along street.

In an action for injuries sustained in an automobile collision against invited guests riding in the automobile which collided with plaintiff's car on a street, brought on the theory that they were engaged in a joint enterprise, the petition alleging that they had bought the oil and gasoline used was properly dismissed, where the owner and driver was not made a defendant, and it did not appear why he was not sued.

Action by Mrs. C. O. Neve against A. Graves, Jr., and others. Judgment dismissing the petition on demurrer, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Edgar Latham, of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error.

John Y. Smith, of Atlanta, for defendants in error.

LUKE, J. This case arises by reason of a suit for damages wherein the plaintiff alleges that while she was a passenger in an automobile traveling along one of the streets in the city of Atlanta an automobile driven and owned by one Shivery collided with the machine in which she was riding, and as a result thereof she was thrown from her machine and suffered injury. The suit is not against the owner and driver, Shivery, but is against four persons who were riding in the machine with Shivery as his invited guests. It is alleged that the invited guests so sued neither had nor claimed an interest in the automobile in which they were riding, but that the invited guests had bought some oil and gasoline that was put in the car and was being used in the propelling of the car at the time of her injury, and that they were engaged in a joint enterprise. It does not appear why Shivery was not sued. The defendants filed a general demurrer to the petition. The general demurrer was sustained and the petition was dismissed. Held, it was not error to sustain the general demurrer and dismiss the petition. See Adamson v. McEwen, 12 Ga. App. 508, 77 S. E. 591.

VAN HARLENGEN v. BEARSE.
(No. 11957.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
March 9, 1921.)

(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

1. Parties ¶84(2)—Objection that partnership was liable and other partner a necessary party cannot be raised when plea in abatement not filed at first term.

Where, in an action under Civ. Code 1910, § 4417, for injuries caused by a vicious animal, it did not appear on the face of the petition that the suit was for the tort of a partnership, if the animal was owned by a partnership, and the other partner a necessary party, the point should have been raised by sworn plea in abatement filed at the first term under Civ. Code 1895, § 5058, and, not having been so raised, could not be raised at the trial.

2. Animals ¶74(8)—Owner's liability for personal injuries held for jury.

In an action for personal injuries caused by a vicious animal, held, that its viciousness and the negligence of defendant and that of plaintiff were questions for the jury.

Error from City Court of Atlanta; H. M. Reid, Judge.

Action by J. M. Van Harlengen against Asa Bearse. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Robt. C. & Philip H. Alston, of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error.

Wm. F. Buchanan, of Atlanta, for defendant in error.

LUKE, J. 1. By statute it is provided that where a person "owns or keeps a vicious or dangerous animal of any kind, and by the careless management of the same, or by allowing the same to go at liberty, another without fault on his part is injured thereby, such owner or keeper shall be liable in damages for such injury." Civil Code 1910, § 4417.

(a) The plaintiff brought suit under the above section for personal injuries inflicted upon him by a bull alleged to be the property of defendant. Upon the trial the defendant contended that there could be no legal recovery, inasmuch as the suit was brought against him as an individual, and the proof developed that the animal was the property of a partnership composed of defendant and his son. He contended also that the evidence adduced was insufficient to authorize a recovery in any event. At the conclusion of the evidence the court, upon motion of the defendant's counsel, directed a verdict in favor of the defendant.

[1] Held: It does not appear on the face of the petition that the suit was brought against an individual for the tort of a partnership, and, in order for the defendant to claim that the suit against him as an individual is based upon a partnership liability, and that the other partner is a necessary party thereto, he should have raised the point by a plea in abatement properly sworn to and filed at the first term of the court. Civil Code 1895, § 5058; Merritt v. Bagwell, 70 Ga. 578, 585; Hirsch v. Oliver, 91 Ga. 554 (4), 18 S. E. 354; Bray v. Peace, 131 Ga. 638 (2-5), 62 S. E. 1025. No such plea was filed in the instant case, and consequently the defendant could not raise the point at the trial term, and a verdict in his favor could not legally be directed on this question. See, also, 20 R. C. L. § 128.

[2] 2. The injury alleged was proved beyond contradiction, but the other questions of fact involved, as to the viciousness of the bull, the negligence of the defendant, and the negligence of the plaintiff, should have been submitted to a jury for determination. It follows that the court erred in directing a verdict for the defendant.

Appeal and error \S 1041(2)—Disallowance of amendment after reversal not error, when amended petition would not have stated cause of action.

The disallowance of an amendment to the petition tendered by plaintiff after return of the remittitur on reversal of a judgment overruling a general demurrer to the petition was not error, where, if the amendment had been allowed, the petition as amended would still have failed to state a cause of action.

Error from Superior Court, Colquitt County; W. E. Thomas, Judge.

Hill & Gibson, of Moultrie, for plaintiff in error.

Dowling & Askew and James Humphreys, all of Moultrie, for defendant in error.

BROYLES, C. J. When this case was here before, the judgment of the trial court, overruling a general demurrer to the petition, was reversed. Rowell v. Harrell Realty Co., 25 Ga. App. 585, 108 S. E. 717. Upon the receipt of the remittitur by the trial court, but before it had been made the judgment of that court, the plaintiff offered an amendment to its original petition. This amendment was disallowed by the court, and the remittitur was then made the judgment of the lower court, and to both of these rulings the plaintiff excepted. An examination of the record shows that the proffered amendment was largely a mere amplification of the original petition, and that, if the amendment had been allowed, the petition as so amended would still have failed to set forth a cause of action. It follows that the court did not err in disallowing the amendment.

Judgment affirmed.

BANK OF LA GRANGE v. GUINN et al.
(No. 11928.)(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
March 8, 1921.)(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

1. Pledges \S 31(4)—Pledgor entitled to damages when pledgee sells contrary to agreement.

Where a bank holding cotton as collateral security for a debt agreed with the owner that if he would sell part of the cotton and apply the proceeds on the debt it would hold the remainder of the cotton until instructed to sell, but, without instructions, sold the remainder of the cotton, the owner was entitled to recover damages.

2. Pledges \S 36—Measure of damages for sale by pledgor contrary to agreement stated.

The measure of damages for a pledgee's sale of cotton, contrary to its agreement with the pledgor not to sell without instructions, was the difference between the selling price and the highest market value at the place where the cotton was sold, at any time between the date of the sale and the date of the trial.

3. New trial \S 70 — Properly refused when verdict authorized by evidence.

A new trial was properly refused on a motion containing only the usual general grounds, where the verdict was authorized by the evidence.

LOGANVILLE BANKING CO. v. BRODNAX et al. (No. 10954.)(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
March 2, 1921.)(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Rights of assignee of judgment and execution.

"A plaintiff may, bona fide and for a valuable consideration, transfer in writing a judgment and the execution issued thereon to a third person; and the transferee has the same rights as the original plaintiff had, and the transfer or assignment need not be under seal. Civil Code 1910, §§ 4274, 5969. See Thompson v. First State Bank, 102 Ga. 696, 29 S. E. 610.

"(a) Where a statutory claim case is pending in the superior court, and the plaintiff transfers, in writing not under seal, a fi. fa. and the judgment on which it is based, 'without any recourse on us whatsoever,' such assignment passes to the assignee the title to the judgment and the execution, with all the resulting incidents of the assignment, which include the right of the assignee, as such, to be made a party plaintiff in the case, to proceed with its prosecution to subject the property levied on, and to recover damages from the claimant if it should appear that the claim was interposed for delay only; and it would not be proper to order that the case proceed in the name of the original plaintiff for the use or the assignee.

"(b) After such assignment the original plaintiff in fi. fa. could not proceed on his own account against the claimant for the purpose of recovering such damages." 151 Ga. —, 106 S. E. 4.

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

2. Appeal and error \S 232(1)—Error held not to require new trial when only complaint of ruling was untenable.

A ruling requiring a statutory claim case to proceed in the name of the original plaintiff for the use of a transferee of the judgment and execution, though erroneous, does not require another trial, where the only complaint of such ruling was that the original plaintiff was thereby eliminated from the case, and it was properly eliminated.

Error from Superior Court, Walton County; W. L. Hodges, Judge.

Proceedings on a claim by J. C. Brodnax, trustee, and others to property levied on under a fi. fa. in favor of the Loganville Banking Company. Judgment ordering the case to proceed in the name of the Banking Company for the use of another, and the Banking Company brings error. Affirmed in conformity to answers by Supreme Court to certified questions (151 Ga. —, 106 S. E. 4).

J. H. Felker, of Monroe, for plaintiff in error.

R. L. Cox and O. Roberts, both of Monroe, for defendants in error.

LUKE, J. The motion of counsel for the plaintiff in error to amend the bill of exceptions by making Mrs. Sallie May Woodruff a party thereto is granted, and the motion of counsel for the defendant in error to dismiss the bill of exceptions is denied.

On April 16, 1917, Loganville Banking Company obtained judgment for a large sum of money against S. N. Forrester. On August 31, 1917, a fi. fa. was issued thereon, and on September 1, 1917, the sheriff levied the fi. fa. on certain land as property of the defendant in fi. fa. On September 22, 1917, J. C. Brodnax, as trustee for Forrester, filed a claim to a portion of this land, and the fi. fa. and claim were returned to the superior court of Walton county for a trial. Subsequently, on February 16, 1918, Loganville Banking Company, in consideration of the full amount of principal, interest, and attorney's fees and costs, transferred and assigned in writing to Sallie May Woodruff the fi. fa. and the judgment on which it was based, "without any recourse on us whatsoever." This transfer was not under seal, while the claim bond was under seal. At the August term, 1919, of the Walton superior court, Loganville Banking Company tendered issue, claiming it was entitled to proceed for damages against the claimant and his security, alleging that the claimant had abandoned his claim, and that his claim was filed for delay only. The claimant and the other defendants joined issue. At this stage of the proceedings Sallie May Woodruff moved the court to make her a party plaintiff in the case, on the ground that she was the sole owner of the fi. fa., and that the fi. fa. should proceed for her use as transferee. Over objection of counsel for Loganville Banking Company the court made her a party plaintiff. The court ruled also that Loganville Banking Company had by the above-mentioned transfer assigned any and all rights that it had for damages for delay, and passed an order eliminating the Loganville Banking Company from the case, and ordered that the case proceed in the name of the Loganville Banking Company for the use of Sallie May Woodruff as transferee. To these rulings the Loganville Banking Company excepted.

(1. 2) Under the rulings in the headnote (which were made by the Supreme Court on February 16, 1921, in answer to certain questions certified by this court), all the rulings of the trial court excepted to were correct, except the one ordering that the case proceed in the name of the original plaintiff for the use of the transferee, and this error does not require another trial of the case, since the only complaint of the plaintiff in error, the Loganville Banking Company, as to this ruling is that the Loganville Banking Company was thereby eliminated from the case, and, under the ruling of the Supreme Court, it was properly so eliminated.

Judgment affirmed.

DAVIS v. STATE. (No. 12045.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
March 9, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Criminal law \S 1041—Sufficiency of approval of grounds of motion for new trial not considered when not raised before trial judge.

In this case the state questions the sufficiency of the approval of the grounds of the motion for new trial, and insists that there is no proper approval of such grounds. No motion was made to dismiss the motion for a new trial, and the question for the first time, upon the sufficiency of the approval of the special grounds of the amended motion for a new trial, is raised here by the state. Since the passage of the act of 1911 (Laws 1911, p. 149; Park's Pen. Code, \S 1090 [a]), "where the judge has finally passed on the merits of a motion for a new trial and the parties have raised no question as to the sufficiency of the approval of the grounds of such motion,

* * * no question as to these matters shall be entertained by the reviewing courts unless first raised and insisted on before the trial judge."

2. Criminal law \S 1064(4), 1144(12)—Motion for new trial insufficient when not showing objections to evidence excluded; evidence presumed excluded on objection of opposite party.

Under the ruling in Summerlin v. State, 25 Ga. App. 568(1b), 103 S. E. 832, neither ground of the amendment to the motion for a new trial presents any question for the consideration of this court. In each ground the movant complains of the rejection of certain testimony, but it is not stated therein what objection to the testimony was offered by the other party and sustained by the court. If it had been stated in the grounds that the court on its own motion excluded the evidence, a different question would be presented. Where no such statement, however, appears in the ground, it will be presumed that the usual modus operandi was followed, viz., that the evidence offered by the movant was objected to by the opposite party for some stated reason, and that this objection was sustained by the court, and the evidence excluded for that reason.

3. Criminal law \S 1160—Overruling of motion for new trial not error when verdict authorized by evidence.

The evidence authorized the verdict, which has the approval of the trial judge, and it was not error to overrule the motion for a new trial.

LUKE, J. (dissenting). I do not disagree to the ruling announced in the first headnote, but I do disagree to the ruling announced in the second headnote, and to the affirmance of the judgment overruling the motion for a new trial.

Upon the trial of the case the prosecutor had testified that his feeling towards the defendant was good. Upon cross-examination the defendant sought to inquire of the prosecutor if he had not had a recent previous difficulty with the defendant, for the purpose of rebutting the statement that no ill feeling existed between them. The court refused to permit the defendant to so interrogate the prosecutor. As laid down in Smith v. State, 12 Ga. App. 13 (2), 76 S. E. 647, it was error to deny the defendant this right. The majority opinion holds that since the defendant did not show in his motion for a new trial upon what ground the court ruled out the evidence which he offered on cross-examination, the assignment of error was insufficient. It is to this technical ruling that I do not agree. The party offering evidence which is rejected, in order to have this court pass upon a ground of a motion for a new trial which complains of the judge's refusal to admit the evidence, does not have to show upon what ground the court refused the evidence. The only burden that the movant has to carry is to show that legal testimony has been excluded by the court. To hold otherwise would be to hold that illegal testimony should be admitted for no reason other than that there was lodged no legal objection to its admissibility. The complaint here is not to the court's overruling an objection to testimony where by precedent it is necessary for the movant for the party complaining to show that a legal objection had been lodged to the testimony. In the one instance the complaint is to the exclusion of legal testimony entitled to be admitted in the trial of the cause, and in the other instance the complaint is to the overruling of an objection, which objection must be shown to be legal.

The party offering evidence which is rejected does not have to show in his motion for a new trial upon what ground the evidence was excluded. The court may have ruled the evidence out without objection, and it may be impossible for the party offering the evidence to know what moved the court. The only burden to be carried by the party offering evidence is to show that the evidence was admissible. In this case error is not assigned upon an objection to evidence which was overruled, but error is here assigned upon the refusal of the court to admit legal testimony, and it does not make any difference upon what ground the evidence was excluded.

The dissent which I file in this case is the same in principle as the dissent in the case of Summerlin v. State, 25 Ga. App. 572, 103 S. E. 832, in so far as this identical question is involved.

SCARBOROUGH v. MALLORY. (No. 11725.)(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
March 8, 1921.)*(Syllabus by the Court.)Libel and slander \S 80—Petition alleging charge that defendant had moved a boundary corner held to state cause of action.

The petition in this case sufficiently alleges that the defendant imputed to the plaintiff a crime punishable by law, sets out a complete cause of action, and the court did not err in overruling the general demurrer and in refusing to dismiss the petition.

Error from Superior Court, Campbell County; John B. Hutcheson, Judge.

Action by J. M. Mallory against F. M. Scarborough. Judgment overruling a general demurrer to the petition, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Mallory brought suit for slander, and his petition contained in part the following allegations:

"Petitioner charges and alleges that said defendant, F. M. Scarborough, has injured and damaged the character and standing of your petitioner as a citizen of said county and state, in the sum aforesaid, for that the said defendant did, on or about the 20th of January, 1919, and at divers other times, in the months of January, February, and March, 1919, willfully, wickedly, falsely, and maliciously charge that your petitioner did pull up and remove a stone corner or stake placed there many years ago by the surveyors of the land lots of now Campbell county where it had been placed and driven in the ground at the southeast corner of lot of land No. 149, and, after taking said stone corner or stake, that your petitioner carried said stone to a point 47 feet south of said corner, and placed it at a point 47 feet on the dividing line of lots Nos. 149 and 150, then and there driving said stone corner into the ground, and claimed that the corner of said lots above stated was at the point where he had removed said stones and driven them into the ground, and that this was done on the part of said J. M. Mallory with the purpose and intention of changing the land line of said lots of land to a point 47 feet from where it originally belonged, for the purpose of stealing and possessing from defendant a fine and valuable part of his bottom land on lot No. 149," and that the alleged slanderous words of the defendant "were made for the purpose of injuring and damaging your petitioner's good name, character, and standing as a worthy citizen of this state, and caused your petitioner to be held up to public contempt, scorn and ridicule, to his injury and damage in the sum aforesaid, and were made by the defendant falsely, maliciously, and known to be false when made by said defendant, for the purpose of injuring and damaging, and which did injure and damage, your petitioner in the sum aforesaid. These statements hereinbefore charged, were made as aforesaid at divers times and places during the period herein alleged; some of them were made in the presence of the surveyor of Campbell county and his assistants, and also of Mr. Smith, the county surveyor of Fayette county."

The court overruled a general demurrer to the petition, and the defendant excepted.

J. F. Golightly, of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error.

James & Bedgood and John H. Hudson, all of Atlanta, for defendant in error.

BLOODWORTH, J. (after stating the facts as above). Under the record as it comes to us the only question for determination, and the only one argued in the brief of plaintiff in error, is whether or not the court erred in overruling the general demurrer. To impute to another a crime punishable by law is slander. Civil Code 1910, § 4433. Section 743 of the Penal Code of 1910 is as follows:

"If any person shall knowingly, maliciously, or fraudulently cut, alter, or remove any certain boundary tree, or other allowed landmark, to the injury of another, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor."

In Whitley v. Newman, 9 Ga. App. 90 (6) 70 S. E. 687, this court held:

"In order for one to impute a crime to another, in such a sense as that the imputation is actionable as slander, it is not necessary that the descriptive averments or essential ingredients by which the nature of the crime is defined should be stated with that distinctness requisite in an indictment. But, on the other hand, it is not enough that the party to whom the remark is addressed may unwarrantably reach the conclusion, from the language used, that a crime is being imputed to the person to whom the speaker refers. For a defamatory oral utterance to be slanderous as imputing a crime, the statement must not only be such as may convey to the auditor the impression that the crime in question is being charged, but it must be couched in such language as might reasonably be expected to convey that meaning to any one who happened to hear the utterance."

Under the above ruling the petition in this case sufficiently alleges that the defendant imputed to plaintiff a crime punishable by law, sets out a complete cause of action, and the court did not err in overruling the general demurrer and in refusing to dismiss the petition.

Judgment affirmed.

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1. March 9, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Contracts ~~§~~ 54(1)—Check given wife and by her delivered to hospital to pay her father's expenses held not without consideration.

Where a husband, at the solicitation of his wife, executes a bank check, payable to "Cash," and delivers it to her, for the express purpose of paying in advance a week's expenses of her father at a hospital where the father is then lying critically ill, the rules of the hospital requiring such payment to be made in advance, and she delivers it to the owner of the hospital for the purpose stated, and the father is cared for in the institution until his death, which occurs after her delivery of the check, but upon the same day, the check is not without a valid consideration. And where the owner of the hospital presents the check to the drawee for payment, and payment is refused because of an order of the husband to stop payment, the owner of the hospital is entitled to recover from the husband the face value of the check.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; Geo. L. Bell, Judge.

Action by W. B. Lingo against F. A. White. Judgment for plaintiff, and certiorari sustained by the superior court, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

R. R. Jackson, John F. Echols, and J. W. Weaver, all of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error. J. L. Anderson and John T. Pearson, both of Atlanta, for defendant in error.

BROYLES, C. J. Dr. Lingo brought suit against F. A. White in the municipal court of Atlanta, upon a $40 check, and obtained a judgment for the full amount of the check, and the defendant carried the case to the superior court by certiorari, the certiorari was sustained, and final judgment was entered in favor of the defendant. It is on exceptions to this judgment that the case comes to us for review. The evidence showed that the check, which was made payable to "Cash," was drawn by the defendant, and, at the solicitation of his wife, given to her for the express purpose of delivering it to the plaintiff as payment in advance for one week's hospital expenses of her father, which expenses, in accordance with the rules of the hospital, were payable in advance. The check was delivered to the plaintiff or his agent on the same day it was executed by the defendant, and the patient died a few hours after such delivery. Upon learning of the death of his father-in-law, the defendant went to the hospital and demanded the return of the check, but his demand was refused and he was informed there was still a balance of $3 due the plaintiff for professional services rendered his father-in-law. He paid the $3 under protest. He subsequently ordered payment on the check stopped, and, when it was presented to the bank upon which it was drawn, payment was refused. The evidence further showed that the defendant's father-in-law had been at the hospital about 21 days before he died, and that on two previous occasions before the defendant gave his wife the check in question, he had given his mother-in-law money to pay in advance a week's hospital bill of her husband. The evidence further showed that there was no contract or understanding between the plaintiff and the defendant as to the payment of these hospital expenses, but that the contract was between the plaintiff and the defendant's father-in-law, and that the plaintiff looked to the father-in-law for such payment.

It is apparent from the record that the defendant stopped payment on the check because his father-in-law died shortly after the delivery of the check for the week's hospital expenses in advance, and before the expiration of that week, and he evidently thought he was therefore entitled to a rebate, if not to recover the entire amount of the check. However, no such defense was insisted upon by the defendant in the trial court, but the grounds of the defense were that the contract to pay the hospital expenses was between the plaintiff and the defendant's father-in-law, that the plaintiff looked for payment to the father-in-law, and extended no credit to the defendant, and that the defendant was not a party to the contract, and was not legally or morally bound for the payment of the expenses, that the check was based upon no valid consideration, and that after gratuitously giving the check to his wife for the purpose of paying the expenses, the defendant had a legal right to change his mind before the plaintiff had cashed the check and to stop payment thereon. We cannot agree with these contentions. We think the check was based upon at least two valid considerations: (1) The agreement to keep the defendant's father-in-law in the hospital for another week, and (2) the benefit flowing to the defendant from the granting of his wife's request to pay her father's hospital expenses for another week. The first consideration is obvious, and needs no discussion, except to say it was not rendered invalid by the fact that the father died before the expiration of the week for which his expenses had been paid in advance. As to the second consideration, the slightest reflection will convince any one that where a husband and wife are living together in peace and happiness (and the living together and the peace and happiness will be presumed, nothing to the contrary appearing), and the wife requests her husband to give her $40 for the purpose of paying in advance for a week the hospital expenses of her father who is lying critically ill in the hospital, a refusal by the husband to give that small amount (he being able to do so) to ease the last hours of her dying father would tend to alienate her affections and to cause a "rift in the lute" of their domestic peace and happiness. Ergo, there was a benefit flowing to the husband from the giving of the check in question. The check being based upon a valid consideration, the defendant had no legal right to stop payment thereon after it had been delivered by his wife to the plaintiff.

It follows from what has been said that the verdict in favor of the plaintiff was demanded by the evidence, and that the judge of the superior court erred in sustaining the certiorari and entering final judgment in favor of the defendant.

Judgment reversed.

SANDERS v. STATE. (No. 11962.)(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
March 9, 1921.)(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Homicide \S 33, 309(4) — Killing held voluntary manslaughter if result of sudden passion, and instruction thereon authorized.

On the trial of an indictment for murder, where the defendant's statement and the evidence tended to show, as one of the legitimate views thereof, that the families of the accused and the decedent were at enmity; that, in a quarrel between the accused and his father on one side and the decedent and his companions on the other, the decedent shot and wounded both the accused and his father; and that, although the decedent then ceased his assault, the accused ran to his home near by, armed himself with a pistol, returned to the scene of the assault, and, without additional cause or excuse, save the heat of passion engendered by the quarrel, shot and killed the decedent—the court did not err in giving in charge to the jury the law of voluntary manslaughter.

2. Homicide \S 114, 276 — Intent is essential to mutual combat, but may be shown by acts, conduct, and circumstances; intent is question for jury; evidence held to make question for jury as to intent.

Without a mutual intent to fight, there can be no mutual combat; but that intent, like any other intent, may be manifested by the acts and conduct of the parties and the circumstances surrounding them at the time of the combat, as well as the circumstances leading up to and culminating in such combat. The question of intent is peculiarly for the jury where there is any evidence from which it may be inferred. In the instant case the court did not err in referring that question to the jury, by giving them in charge the law applicable to mutual combat.

3. Instructions not reversible error.

When considered in the light of the entire charge of the court and the facts of the case, none of the instructions complained of contain reversible error.

4. Sufficiency of evidence.

The evidence authorized the verdict, and it was not error to overrule the motion for a new trial.

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

5. Homicide \S 121 — Justification cannot be based on assault which is completely ended.

Under Pen. Code 1910, §§ 70, 74, justification for a homicide cannot be based on a deadly assault which has been completely ended unless the assailant manifests some apparent purpose to renew or continue it.

6. Homicide \S 114—Killing held not justifiable under law governing mutual combats.

Where defendant and his father were assaulted by decedent, and defendant ran home, armed himself with a pistol, and left his place of safety to enter or recommence the affray and remained in it until decedent was mortally wounded, the killing was not justifiable under Pen. Code 1910, § 73, relative to a killing in mutual combat.

Error from Superior Court, Putnam County; J. B. Park, Judge.

Freddie Sanders was convicted of voluntary manslaughter, and he brings error. Affirmed.

Stubbs & Duke, of Eatonton, for plaintiff in error.

Doyle Campbell, Sol. Gen., and A. Y. Clement, both of Monticello, for the State.

LUKE, J. Freddie Sanders was indicted jointly with his father, West Sanders, for the murder of John Adams, and, being separately tried, the son was found guilty of voluntary manslaughter. From the defendant's statement and the conflicting evidence, the jury were authorized to find the following facts: On the day before the homicide West Sanders wrongfully killed a hog belonging to Adams, while Fred Sanders and his sister went to the Adams home, during his absence, assaulted and beat his wife, and forcibly took and carried away a pistol belonging to Adams. But later, either on the same day or at some time during the night, Adams and West Sanders mutually adjusted their differences by an agreement that Sanders should either pay for the hog he had killed or replace it with one of his own. On the occasion of the homicide Adams, with two companions, had started to the Sanders home to demand the return of his pistol, but met both West and Fred Sanders in the road near their home, where, in a discussion of the troubles of the preceding day, a quarrel ensued, which terminated in both West and Fred Sanders, who were then unarmed, being shot and wounded by Adams. As to what then followed, the defendant in his statement to the court and jury, said:

"I didn't have anything in my hand, and I ran to the house and got the pistol out of the washstand drawer, and come back and shot him and killed him."

In a supplemental statement, made after the testimony was closed, the defendant further said:

"I want to finish telling you about what I done. I shot John to protect myself and my father, too. If I hadn't done something, he would likely have killed me and the whole family."

But as to what John Adams, the deceased, was doing at the time the fatal shot was fired, or at any time after Fred Sanders left the scene of the first shooting to arm himself for the final combat, the evidence is conflicting, and the defendant's statement is by no means clear. As to that interval of time the jury were authorized by some of the evidence, as well as by the defendant's statement, to infer that the deceased did nothing whatever to justify or mitigate the killing. From other evidence they were authorized to infer that the deceased merely held his ground, pistol in hand, awaiting the return of Fred Sanders, with the intention then and there to continue the fight; and that, upon the return of Fred Sanders, with his pistol in hand, the two men began simultaneously to shoot at each other, and continued to shoot until Adams fell mortally wounded.

Other theories of the case, deducible from the evidence, are unimportant here; the only attack upon the evidence being that it demanded either a conviction of murder or an absolute acquittal, and that it discloses no theory of voluntary manslaughter, either as where a killing occurs in a sudden heat of passion or as where the killing results from mutual combat.

[1, 5] 1-3. Under the facts above outlined, a charge on the law of voluntary manslaughter was not only authorized, but was demanded. Barney v. State, 5 Ga. App. 301, 63 S. E. 28; Smith v. State, 147 Ga. 652, 95 S. E. 223. Even the defendant's statement, if true, shows no justification for the killing. The most that it does for him is to show a killing without malice and in a sudden heat of passion, provoked by the decedent's felonious assault upon the defendant and the defendant's father, thereby reducing the offense from murder to voluntary manslaughter. If the killing had occurred while the decedent was actually shooting at the defendant or at the defendant's father, or if it had occurred while the decedent was manifestly intending or endeavoring to shoot at either or both of them, then the killing would be justifiable homicide under the law of self-defense or under the right of a son to defend his father. Penal Code 1910, §§ 70 and 74. But justification cannot be based on a deadly assault which has been completely ended, unless the assailant manifests some apparent purpose to renew or continue it. Cochran v. State, 9 Ga. App. 824, 72 S. E. 281. Where, as in this case, the assault had been completely ended, and the person assailed had left the scene of the assault, had gone into his own home, armed himself, and returned to the original scene before the killing occurred, the question is, not whether such killing was justifiable, but whether it was the result of a sudden heat of passion or of a deliberate desire for revenge. If it was the result of that sudden, violent impulse of passion supposed to be irresistible, then the killing was voluntary manslaughter; but if the interval between the assault and the homicide was sufficient for the voice of reason and humanity to be heard, then the killing should be attributed to deliberate revenge, and be punished as murder. Penal Code 1910, § 65. In so far as these principles of the law of homicide are concerned, the jury, in finding the accused guilty of voluntary manslaughter, simply accepted as true the version of the facts most favorable to him.

[2, 6] From the evidence above set out, a mutual intent to fight, and an actual fight in pursuance thereof, resulting in the homicide in question, were reasonably inferable. For this reason the court did not err in giving in charge to the jury the law applicable to such combats. But under this theory of the case no more justification for the killing appears than under the other. To justify a killing in mutual combat, it must appear, not only that the threatened danger, whether real or apparent, was urgent and pressing "at the time of the killing," but also "that the person killed was the assailant, or that the slayer had really and in good faith endeavored to decline any further struggle before the mortal blow was given." Penal Code 1910, § 73. While, from this theory of the facts, the impending danger is sufficiently made to appear, yet in view of the defendant's own statement that he armed himself for that combat, left his place of safety to enter or recommence the affray, and, having entered it, remained in it until his antagonist fell mortally wounded, he negatives the other essential of the justification he claims.

[3, 4] The verdict was authorized by the evidence, and the charge of the court is not subject to the criticisms urged. The defendant has had a fair trial. It was not error for any reason assigned to overrule the motion for a new trial.

Judgment affirmed.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; Geo. L. Bell, Judge.

Action by T. F. Bean, for the use of J. H. McNesser, against P. J. Farrell. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

This is a suit by T. F. Bean, the owner of certain realty, for the use of J. H. McNesser, a real estate broker, to recover commissions alleged to be due by reason of the breach of the following contract:

"Atlanta, Ga. 4/5/1920.

"The undersigned hereby agrees to purchase through J. H. McNesser, agent, the following described property, to wit: All that tract or parcel of land lying and being in the city of Atlanta, Ga. House and lot known as number 164 Whiteford Ave., for the sum of five thousand five hundred dollars ($5,500), to be paid as follows:

Cash payment.....	$2,400 00
Assume loan 7% int., due about 1922.....	1,600 00
Assume bal. in notes at $27.50 per mo. 7% int.	1,500 00
	$5,500 00

"Special Stipulations.

"Fire insurance and interest on loan are to be prorated at the time of closing deal. I have this day deposited with J. H. McNesser, real estate agent for Mr. Bean, the sum of $25, twenty-five dollars, as a part of the named purchase money to bind this trade; a reasonable length of time being allowed for the examination of titles by my attorney. If said titles are good, I agree to make settlement at once; but if said titles are not good, and cannot be made good within a reasonable length of time, the said cash payment is to be returned to me, and this trade canceled. If through any fault of mine I fail or refuse to complete the above trade, then I agree to pay J. H. McNesser the amount of commission which he would have received, had I complied with my contract above set out.

"[Signed] P. J. Farrell, Purchaser."

"I hereby accept the above offer of $5,500 upon the terms and conditions therein named, and guarantee the title to be perfect, and to deliver same free of legal incumbrance to the purchaser, and agree to pay J. H. McNesser, for having negotiated the above sale, a commission on the gross amount as follows, viz.: 5 per cent. on the first $5,500; 2½ per cent. on the excess over the first $5,000. In event the buyer fails to pay for the property as stipulated above, then the amount paid in is forfeited, and is to be kept by J. H. McNesser as part compensation for service by him rendered in this trade. This April 5, 1920.

"[Signed] T. J. Bean, Owner."

The defendant answered, denying liability, on the ground that the writing quoted was not a legal and valid contract and was not binding upon him, because it was signed with the express agreement and understanding that it was to be held in escrow by McNesser, and not to be delivered to Bean until the defendant sold his home place, No. 98 Alto avenue, Atlanta, Ga., and that this place was never sold, and the contract was never delivered. Upon the trial the defendant offered to amend his answer, by adding allegations of fraud in the procurement of the contract. The amendment was disallowed, the case proceeded to trial, and at the conclusion of the evidence the court directed a verdict for the plaintiff. The defendant sued out certiorari, and to the judgment overruling the certiorari he excepted.

T. J. Ripley and W. M. Bailey, both of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error.

Etheridge, Sams & Etheridge, of Atlanta, for defendant in error.

BROYLES, O. J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] 1. There is no merit in the contention that it was not proper to bring the suit in the name of Bean, suing for the use of McNesser. West v. Morris, 10 Ga. App. 651, 73 S. E. 1075.

[2] 2. The proffered amendment to the defendant's answer, which alleged fraud in the procurement of the contract, was properly disallowed, since the facts therein set forth were insufficient to show fraud.

[3] 3. While the proffered amendment to the answer was properly disallowed, the defendant, under the original answer, was entitled to show by parol evidence, if he could, that the instrument in question was signed by the defendant with the express understanding and agreement that it was to be held in escrow by McNesser, the agent, and not to be delivered to Bean, the owner, until the defendant had sold his home place, and that that place had never been sold, and that the instrument had never been delivered to Bean.

A written instrument may, by parol evidence, be shown not to be a contract at all, because of the nonperformance of a condition precedent as to which the writing is silent. It may be shown by parol evidence:

"That the writing is not a valid or enforceable legal obligation, because it does not possess finality of utterance as a completed, all-comprehensive, and presently operative embodiment of the entire agreement of the contracting parties.' It is manifest * * * that there is a very marked difference between allowing parol evidence for the purpose of varying the terms of a writing whose execution and delivery are not denied, and allowing [parol] proof * * * for the purpose of showing that, on account of the nonperformance of some condition, perhaps not stated in the instrument, the alleged contract was in reality never created at all." Heitmann v. Commercial Bank, 6 Ga. App. 584, 65 S. E. 590; Hartman Stock Farm v. Henley, 8 Ga. App. 255, 68 S. E. 957; Equitable Manufacturing Co. v. Hill-Atkinson Co., 17 Ga. App. 494, 87 S. E. 715; Hansford v. Freeman, 99 Ga. 376, 27 S. E. 708; Purcell v. Armour Packing Co., 4 Ga. App. 253, 256, 61 S. E. 138.

It follows from what has been said that the trial court erred in rejecting the evidence offered by the defendant for the purpose of showing that when he signed the instrument sued upon he did it with the express understanding and agreement that the instrument was not to be delivered until he had sold his home place, that he had sold it, and that the instrument had never been delivered. The error in rejecting this evidence necessitated a new trial, and the judge of the superior court erred in overruling the certiorari.

Judgment reversed.

DAVIS v. STATE. (No. 11946.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
March 9, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Forgery \S 16, 29(1), 32, 34(4) — Indictment and information \S 73(1) — Indictment for uttering and publishing forged deed held sufficient as against general demurrer; indictment held to show signing was without grantor's knowledge or consent; indictment need not allege existence of property; allegation of intent to defraud two persons supported by proof of intent to defraud either; allegation of intent to defraud apparent grantor or his heir not inconsistent; filing for record is "uttering" and "publishing."

The indictment charges that the accused, Charles E. Davis, did "utter and publish as true the false, fraudulent, forged, altered, and counterfeited quitclaim deed purporting to be signed, sealed, and delivered by J. D. Kirkpatrick, in the presence of J. O. Scott and Walter Harris, J. P., to Southern Trading & Trust Company, a corporation, of the county of Fulton and state of Georgia, * * * said quitclaim deed being in words and figures as follows, to wit: [A complete copy deed is here set out], by then and there filing said false and fraudulent, forged, altered, and counterfeited quitclaim deed for record with the clerk of the superior court of said county as a bona fide quitclaim deed, with intent to defraud the said J. D. Kirkpatrick and * * * Mrs. J. D. Kirkpatrick, sole heir at law and legatee of the said J. D. Kirkpatrick, knowing the said deed to have been so falsely and fraudulently made, forged, altered, and counterfeited, and knowing the said names, to wit, J. D. Kirkpatrick's, as grantor, and J. O. Scott's and Walter Harris', as witnesses, to have been so fraudulently and falsely signed to said deed as aforesaid, contrary to the laws of said state," etc. Held:

(a) As against a general demurrer, the indictment was sufficient. Penal Code 1910, §§ 231, 232, 954.

(b) The averment that the grantor's name was "falsely and fraudulently" signed to the deed sufficiently shows, even as against special demurrer, that such signing was done without the grantor's knowledge or consent.

(c) It is not necessary, even as against special demurrer, that the indictment show that the property described in the deed is or ever was in existence. Penal Code 1910, § 954. If such property was not in existence, that fact is matter of affirmative defense; and even then the real question would be not so much whether the property existed as whether its nonexistence rendered vain the alleged intent to defraud. Penal Code 1910, § 232.

(d) Such an indictment may properly allege an intent to defraud two or more persons, and the allegation is sufficiently established by proof of intent to defraud any one or more of them. The state not being restricted in its proof to the specific date alleged in the indictment, the allegation of an intent to defraud the purported grantor of the forged deed and his "sole heir at law and legatee" did not necessarily render the indictment inconsistent or the allegation impossible of proof.

(e) Filing a forged deed for record "with the clerk," or "in the office of the clerk," as contemplated by law for the recordation of a valid deed, is an uttering and publishing within the scope and purview of section 232 of the Penal Code of 1910.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Publish; Utter.]

2. Criminal law \S 824(9) — Failure to charge on circumstantial evidence held error, though charge not requested.

In a trial under an indictment for uttering a forged deed, where the state relied exclusively upon witnesses' knowledge of handwriting to show that the deed was a forgery, and relied wholly upon circumstantial evidence to show that the accused knew it was a forgery, as well as that his intent in uttering it was to defraud certain designated persons, and where the defendant in his statement denied each of these elements of the alleged offense and introduced evidence tending to disprove them, the failure of the court to instruct the jury as to the weight of circumstantial evidence was error, requiring the grant of a new trial, even though no written request for such an instruction was presented. Penal Code 1910, §§ 1010, 1087; Weaver v. State, 135 Ga. 317, 69 S. E. 488; Glaze v. State, 2 Ga. App. 704, 708, 58 S. E. 1126; Amason v. State, 23 Ga. App. 784, 99 S. E. 631.

3. Forgery \S 34(1) — Deed held not inadmissible in evidence because of printed matter not referred to in indictment.

Where an indictment alleges that a forged deed was "in words and figures as follows, to wit," and undertakes to set out a complete copy of the deed, beginning with the words "State of Georgia, Floyd county" and ending with the names of the purported grantor and of the attesting witnesses in the usual form, and where the original deed offered in evidence varies from the copy, in that the upper margin contains matter appropriate for the backing of such a deed, together with other matter usually found on printed legal forms for such deeds, and, in the lower margin, the grantor's name and seal is followed by a blank line and the word "Seal," the variance affords no valid ground of objection to the admission of the original deed in evidence. Haupt v. State, 108 Ga. 53(2), 34 S. E. 313, 75 Am. St. Rep. 19.

4. Other errors not likely to recur.

A new trial must be granted because of the error pointed out in the second note, supra. If any other error appears from the record, it is not such as will likely recur on another trial of the case.

Error from Superior Court, Floyd County; Moses Wright, Judge.

Charles E. Davis was convicted of uttering and publishing a forged instrument, and he brings error. Reversed.

Denny & Wright and Willingham, Wright & Covington, all of Rome, for plaintiff in error.

C. H. Porter, Sol. Gen., of Rome, for the State.

LUKE, J. [1-4] Only the second headnote needs elaboration. It appears, from the evidence, that the purported grantor and the two attesting witnesses whose names were signed to the deed in question were all three dead; and no eyewitness to the making of the deed, or to its attestation, was offered, either by the state or by the accused. To prove that the deed was a forgery, the state relied upon witnesses who testified to their knowledge of the handwriting of the purported grantor and of the attesting witnesses, and who further testified that, in their opinion, the signatures were all false, though good imitations of the genuine. The defendant, on the other hand, offered like evidence to the effect that the purported signature of the grantor was genuine, and offered other evidence to the same effect by expert comparison of that signature with another signature, which was proved to be the genuine signature of the purported grantor. To prove the defendant's guilty knowledge and fraudulent intent, the state relied upon evidence tending to show that the grantee in the alleged deed was a corporation; that the defendant was president of that corporation; that the deed was first found in his possession and was filed for record by him; that he had made various conflicting statements as to the source from which he had received it; that he had once refused to surrender it on demand by counsel of the purported grantor or his estate; and that later, when arrested and charged with the forgery of the deed, he had offered to surrender it upon condition that he be discharged from custody. The defendant, in his statement to the court and jury, denied any guilty knowledge or fraudulent intent on his part, and introduced in evidence, as correspondence between the grantor and the grantee, letters purporting to have been written several years before the origin of this prosecution, during the year following the date of the deed in question, and tending to show an effort on the part of the grantor to repossess the deed in question, because, as he contended, his signature thereto had been obtained by fraud on the part of the grantee. The deed itself is dated May 12, 1910; the purported grantor appears to have died in 1915; the deed was filed for record in February, 1918; and the indictment was returned in July, 1920. The allegation that the defendant filed the deed for record was established by positive and direct evidence, and was admitted by him in his statement.

Under that evidence, it was for the jury to say whether or not the accused was guilty of the charge laid in the bill of indictment. In such a case, however, the trial judge must, whether so requested or not, instruct the jury that, to warrant a conviction on circumstantial evidence, the proved facts must not only be consistent with the hypothesis of guilty, but must exclude every other reasonable hypothesis than that of the guilt of the accused. In this case the learned trial judge failed, perhaps by mere oversight, so to charge the jury; but, that failure being assigned as one of the grounds of the motion for a new trial, both the lower court and this court are bound, as matter of law, to sustain the motion.

For the reason hereinbefore given, it was error to overrule the motion for a new trial. Judgment reversed.

GALLIVITTOCH v. PROVIDENT LIFE & ACCIDENT INS. CO. (No. 11713.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1. March 8, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Insurance §§622(2, 4), 623(3)—Policy limitation on time for bringing suit is valid; minority does not excuse delay; insurer not estopped by letter.

A condition in an insurance policy providing that no recovery shall be had thereon unless suit is brought within "two years from the time within which proof of loss is required by the policy" is valid, and no recovery can be had on a policy containing such a condition when the action is not brought within the time specified in the policy, unless the provision is waived or there is valid excuse for delay.

(a) The minority of a beneficiary is no excuse for delay beyond the contractual limitation fixed by the policy.

(b) This contractual limitation is not waived, nor is the insurance company estopped from pleading it, by a letter written by the company to the attorney of the beneficiary, soon after the loss, in which it is stated that "within the very near future" a representative of the company would call upon the said attorney with the view of closing the matter; the letter stating further that the company would appreciate any assistance shown this representative in effecting an amicable and fair settlement of the claim.

Error from City Court of Savannah; Davis Freeman, Judge.

Action by Joe Gallivitch, by next friend, against the Provident Life & Accident Insurance Company. Judgment for defendant and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Joe Gallivitch, a minor, by next friend, sued the Provident Life & Accident Insurance Company on an insurance policy, alleging that Frank Gallivitch, his father, was injured in an accident, and as a result thereof died on March 25, 1915, and that "proof of the death of the said Frank Gallivitch has been furnished to said company as required by the terms of the said policy." The petition was filed February 23, 1920, and the defendant filed a demurrer, the first and fourth grounds of which were as follows:

"(1) That the said petition set forth no cause of action in favor of said plaintiff against this defendant."

"(4) The fourth paragraph of said petition fails to alleged what injuries said Frank Gallivitch received and how he was injured."

The petition was amended, and the defendant filed a demurrer on the grounds:

"That the said petition as amended sets forth no cause of action in favor of said plaintiff against this defendant;" "that said petition as amended shows the said cause of action to be barred under the terms of the policy, which provides that no cause be brought at all unless brought within two years from the expiration of the time within which proof of loss is required by the policy."

A second amendment to the petition was offered, which alleged:

That promptly after the death of the insured the policy was placed in the hands of an attorney for collection, and that on June 11, 1915, the company wrote to the said attorney as follows: "We have received proof in connection with the death of Frank Gallivitch, accompanied by your letter of the 5th inst. This claim will be given prompt and careful attention, and we will advise you further concerning the same within a few days. You can rest assured that we will not delay matters any longer than is necessary." That on June 22, 1915, the company wrote to the said attorney as follows: "With further reference to this claim about which the writer called on you in person recently, will say that this matter is now having our attention and has been referred to Dr. W. W. Lee for disposition. Dr. Lee will call upon you within the very near future with the view of closing the matter. We will certainly appreciate any assistance shown the doctor in effecting an amiable [amicable?] and fair settlement of this claim." That "upon receiving these letters he expected a settlement of the said policy by the defendant company, and, relying upon the promises in said letters and shortly thereafter, he enlisted in the service of his country and served with the marines in France during the World War, being absent from Savannah for several years." That "upon petitioner's return in November, 1919, very much to his astonishment he found that no settlement had been made, and promptly took the matter up with the defendant company, whereupon they promised to pay a portion of the policy, but refused to pay the entire amount of the liability when this suit was filed."

To the allowance of this amendment objections were filed, two only of which are necessary for consideration here:

"(1) That the letters set forth in said proposed amendment were not such letters as would mislead the plaintiff into believing that this claim would be paid, thereby lulling him into security.

"(2) That these letters were written within three months after the death of the insured, and that suit was not filed until nearly five years after the death of the assured and after the writing of said letters."

The court sustained these objections; the proposed amendment was disallowed; the grounds 1 and 4 of the original demurrer and grounds 1 and 2 of the demurrer to the petition as amended were sustained, and the petition was dismissed.

H. P. Cobb, of Savannah, for plaintiff in error.

Anderson, Cann & Cann and McIntire, Walsh & Bernstein, all of Savannah, for defendant in error.

BLOODWORTH, J. (after stating the facts as above). The policy sued on contained the following clauses:

"Affirmative proof of loss must be furnished to the company at its said office in case of claim for loss of time from disability, within ninety days after the termination of the period for which the company is liable, and in case of claim for any other loss, within ninety days after the date of such loss. No action at law or in equity shall be brought to recover on this policy prior to the expiration of sixty days after proof of loss has been filed in accordance with the requirements of this policy, nor shall such action be brought at all unless brought within two years from the expiration of the time within which proof of loss is required by the policy."

This court and the Supreme Court are absolutely committed to the proposition that a condition such as the above in an insurance policy is reasonable and valid, and that a compliance therewith is necessary to sustain an action on a policy in which is contained such a condition. Maxwell Bros. v. Liverpool & London & Globe Ins. Co., 12 Ga. App. 127(1), 128(1), 76 S. E. 1036, and cases cited; Stanley v. Sterling Mutual Life Ins. Co., 12 Ga. App. 477, 77 S. E. 664, and cases cited. See, also, Brooks v. Georgia Home Ins. Co., 99 Ga. 116, 24 S. E. 869; Met. Life Ins. Co. v. Caudle, 122 Ga. 608, 50 S. E. 337(1); Gross v. Globe & Rutgers Fire Ins. Co., 140 Ga. 531, 79 S. E. 138; Third Natl. Bank of Columbus v. American Bonding Co., 145 Ga. 126, 88 S. E. 585. In Melson v. Phenix Ins. Co. of Brooklyn, 97 Ga. 723, 25 S. E. 189, Mr. Justice Lumpkin said:

"Where the parties, by agreement, make a fixed and unqualified limitation for themselves, they abandon all the legal regulations on the subject, and consequently must stand upon their contract as written."

It will be noted that the policy sued on required that proofs of loss be furnished "within ninety days from the date of such loss," and that suit must be brought, if at all, "within two years from the expiration of the time in which proof of loss is required by the policy." The petition in this case shows that the death, and consequently the loss, occurred in March, 1915, and alleges that "proof of the death of the said Frank Galivitch has been furnished the said company as required by the terms of said policy," and yet suit was not filed until February, 1920, nearly five years after the loss. However, the plaintiff seeks to avoid the plain and legal provision of the policy as to the two-year limitation by two contentions.

First. It is contended the contractual limitation in the policy was suspended because the beneficiary was a minor. Is this contention good? Is the minor beneficiary bound by the stipulation in the policy as to the two-year limitation? It will be noted that the contract of insurance was made between the father of the beneficiary and the company, and as between them counsel for the plaintiff in error concedes that the contractual limitation is valid. Let us remember that this is not a suit that could not be brought because of minority of the beneficiary. The suit could have been instituted by "next friend" as well within the two-year period of contractual limitation as when it was brought, more than four years after the loss. As far as we have been able to ascertain, the exact question under consideration has never been passed upon directly by the appellate courts of this state. The nearest approach thereto is found in Maxwell v. Liverpool Ins. Co., 12 Ga. App. 127, 76 S. E. 1036. In the opinion in that case, Chief Judge Hill said:

"It is next contended by counsel for plaintiff in error that a member of the partnership whose property was insured was insane during a period of time immediately following the fire, and that during that period this contractual limitation was suspended as to the partnership. Under the law a partnership is a distinct and separate entity from the members who compose it, and the fact that one partner was temporarily insane or otherwise incapacitated to look after the affairs of the partnership, or to comply with its contracts, would not excuse a failure of the partnership, or of either of the members thereof, to perform the duty of looking after the interests of the partnership. It may be that the running of the statute of limitations would be suspended during the period of insanity of a member of the firm, but we are clear that any disability on the part of a member of the firm would not suspend the running of a contractual limitation, or fix a period of limitation other than that prescribed by the contract. The limitation in the present case is a condition precedent to the right of action on the policy, and the partnership, having made the contract, is bound thereby, regardless of any intervening infirmity of one of its members. It has been held that the minority of a beneficiary in an insurance policy did not exempt him from complying with a stipulation requiring an action on the policy to be brought within one year after the right accrued. Suggs v. Travelers' Ins. Co., 71 Tex. 579 (9 S. W. 676, 1 L. R. A. 847); Mead v. Phenix Ins. Co., 68 Kan. 437 (75 Pac. 475, 104 Am. St. R. 412, 64 L. R. A. 79)."

While this is not a direct adjudication of the question under consideration, it is quite persuasive. In addition to the Texas and Kansas decisions referred to in the foregoing quotation, there are decisions of other courts that such a stipulation in an insurance policy is binding on an infant plaintiff. In O'Laughlin v. Union Central Life Ins. Co. (C. C.) 11 Fed. 280, the headnotes are as follows:

"(1) A condition in a life policy that no suit shall be brought upon it unless brought within one year after the assured's death is valid.

"(2) A suit cannot be maintained upon a policy containing such a condition unless instituted within the time specified.

"(3) Where suit is not instituted within the time specified, the condition need not be specially pleaded as a defense. It is sufficient to deny that the conditions of the policy have been complied with.

"(4) The fact that the beneficiaries named in the policy are minors will not prevent the enforcement of such a condition."

See, also, Fey v. I. O. O. F. Mutual Life Ins. Society, 120 Wis. 358, 98 N. W. 206; Riddlesbarger v. Hartford Ins. Co., 7 Wall. 386, 19 L. Ed. 257.

So we must conclude that the contractual limitation was not suspended because of the minority of the beneficiary.

Second. Was the defendant estopped by the letters sent by the company to the attorney of the plaintiff from pleading the limitation fixed by the policy? Plaintiff in error insists that it was, and to support this contention several cases are cited each of which is easily differentiated from the case sub judice. To illustrate: In the case of Hartford Ins. Co. v. Amos, 98 Ga. 533, 25 S. E. 575, one of the cases relied upon by the plaintiff in error, the record shows that after the fire the insurance company was garnished by creditors of the insured, and the company "promised to adjust and pay the loss . . . when the garnishment could and should be disposed of." The Supreme Court based its ruling on this positive promise. The other Georgia case cited for the plaintiff in error was that of Stanley v. Sterling Mutual Life Ins. Co., 12 Ga. App. 475, 77 S. E. 664. In the opinion in that case this court said (12 Ga. App. 478, 77 S. E. 666):

"According to the testimony of the plaintiff, this officer [the secretary and treasurer of the company] made a direct promise to pay the loss. The plaintiff went to see him several times, but each time the officer said that everything was all right, and that the plaintiff would get his insurance. The plaintiff was thus lulled into the belief, by the repeated promises of the company's officer, that he would be paid without suit."

In the case under discussion, if there had been a direct and positive promise to pay the loss, a different case would probably have been presented. There is nothing in the letters in the amendment to the petition which could be construed into an absolute promise to pay. A statement in a letter from the company to the attorney for the plaintiff that a representative of the company would call upon him "within the very near future with a view of closing the matter," and that the company "will appreciate any assistance shown the doctor in effecting an amiable [amicable?] and fair settlement," was not a promise to pay, or such a negotiation for settlement as to lull the plaintiff into the belief that he would be paid without suit, especially as it is not shown that the doctor did call "within the very near future," or that he ever called at all, or that the negotiation for a settlement ever went further than is shown by this letter. This letter might have been a reason for waiting a reasonable time for the doctor to call in an effort to adjust the matter but was not sufficient to "lull him [the plaintiff] into a false security" and cause him to wait beyond the two-year period of limitation embraced in the contract for bringing the suit. It is therefore clear that the ruling of the court upon the pleadings and in dismissing the suit was not error.

Judgment affirmed.

(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

Certiorari \Leftrightarrow 56(1) — Untraversed answer of magistrate is conclusive.

An untraversed answer of the magistrate to a petition for certiorari is controlling on the superior court and Court of Appeals, and where such answer stated that all the allegations of the petition were not true without specifying those that were untrue and did not verify the allegation that the damage sued for was to growing crops, the contention that the magistrate was without jurisdiction was not sustained.

Error from Superior Court, Putnam County; J. B. Park, Judge.

R. C. Jenkins, of Eatonton, for plaintiff in error.

Davidson, Callaway & De Jarnette, of Eatonton, for defendant in error.

BROYLES, C. J. It is well settled that an untraversed answer of the magistrate to a petition for certiorari, and not the petition, is controlling upon the superior court and this court, and that points made in the petition for certiorari, but not verified by the answer of the magistrate, cannot be considered by either court. In the instant case the only point that the petition for certiorari raises which was insisted upon before this court is that the justice who tried the case was without jurisdiction of the subject-matter, for the reason that the damage sued for was to growing crops that had never been severed from the realty, but the allegations as to these facts and the evidence in support thereof set out in the petition were not verified by the answer of the magistrate. Moreover, it is stated by the magistrate in his answer to the petition "that all the allegations [in the petition for certiorari] are not true," and it is not directly or clearly specified in the answer what allegations in the petition are untrue and what are true, and the answer was neither traversed nor excepted to. Under such circumstances this court is unable to say that the judge of the superior court erred in overruling the certiorari.

Judgment affirmed.

THOMPSON v. ATLANTIC COAST LINE R. CO. (No. 11948.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
March 9, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Carriers \S 45—Measure of damages in suit under statute for failure to furnish cars to transport perishable freight stated; petition insufficient when not showing notice to carrier of intended market.

Although a shipper who has sustained damage by reason of a breach of the common-law duty of a railroad company, as a common carrier, to furnish cars for the transportation of freight within a reasonable time, is not prevented by the act of 1907 (Ga. Laws 1907, p. 84; Civil Code of 1910, \S 2774 et seq.) from instituting a common-law action for damages, instead of pursuing the remedy provided by that act, touching the failure of a railroad company to furnish cars to a grower of perishable products (Southern Railway Co. v. Moore, 133 Ga. 806 (67 S. E. 85, 26 L. R. A. [N. S.] 851), yet, where the suit is instituted under that act, the exclusive measure of damages is the market value of the product (with interest thereon, less cost of carriage and the usual expense of selling) in the market to which the shipper intended shipping it, on the day it would have arrived had it been carried in the usual course of transportation on schedule time for such freight. And in order to obtain damages in such a case the shipper must in writing notify the agent of the railroad company of the market to which he intended shipping his product. Civil Code 1910, $\S\S$ 2774, 2775.

(a) It is clearly apparent from an examination of the act of 1907 that the General Assembly intended that the measure of damages prescribed therein should be the exclusive and sole measure of damages in any suit brought under that act.

(b) In the instant case the petition, properly construed, manifestly shows that the action was instituted under the act of 1907, and not under the common law, and as the petition failed to allege that the railroad company had been notified in writing by the shipper of the market to which he intended the goods to be shipped, and as this defect in the petition was pointed out by a timely special demurrer, and was not cured by any amendment, the court properly sustained the general demurrer interposed and dismissed the suit. (Per Broyles, C. J.)

2. Carriers \S 45—Petition held not to state cause of action for failure to furnish cars when not alleging delivery for transportation.

Moreover, even if the action were based upon the common-law liability of a carrier for the failure to furnish cars upon demand, the petition still fails to set out a cause of action, since it does not allege that the goods were properly offered for transportation. It is not alleged in the petition that the goods were ever carried to the defendant railroad line or offered in any way to the railroad company for transportation. On the contrary, it appears from the allegations of the petition (properly construed most strongly against the plaintiff) that the goods in question—watermelons—were never removed from the plaintiff's farm where they were grown. And these defects in the petition were pointed out by timely special demurrers and were not cured by any amendment. See, in this connection, Southern Railway Co. v. Moore, 133 Ga. 806, 67 S. E. 85, 26 L. R. A. (N. S.) 851; Chattanooga Southern Railroad Co. v. Thompson, 133 Ga. 127, 65 S. E. 285; Wadley Southern Railway Co. v. Kent, 145 Ga. 690, 89 S. E. 765.

Error from City Court of Thomasville; W. H. Hammond, Judge.

Action by H. W. Thompson against the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

The record shows the following petition:

"H. W. Thompson brings this his petition against the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company, as defendant, and herein shows the court:

"(1) That the defendant railroad company is a common carrier by railroad, having a line of railroad through an office and agent in said county.

"(2) Your petitioner is a grower of watermelons.

"(3) During the spring of the year 1920 your petitioner grew watermelons for shipment in carload lots, growing them upon his farm near Ochlocknee, in said county.

"(4a) A ventilated car, great numbers of which are and were in use by the defendant railroad company, is the only kind of freight car suitable for the transportation of such products.

"(5) Being such grower of watermelons, and having a carload of same ready for shipment from Ochlocknee, Ga., said county, your petitioner, on the 6th day of July, 1920, made written application to the defendant railroad company, through its agent at Ochlocknee, Ga., to wit, C. A. Welch, for a ventilated car to be loaded on the 8th day of July, 1920, at Ochlocknee, for immediate shipment.

"(6) The following is a copy of the application so served upon the said defendant, to wit: 'Georgia, Thomas County—To the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company: In compliance with [section] 2774 of the Civil Code of Georgia, adopted in 1910, and as a grower of watermelons, I hereby make application for a ventilated car for the transportation of such watermelons, that being the only car suitable for such purpose; and you are hereby advised that I desire to load such car on the 8th day of July, 1920, beginning at the hour of 4 o'clock, p. m., at Ochlocknee, Georgia. This the 6th day of July, 1920.

[Signed] H. W. Thompson.'

"(7) The defendant company failed and refused to furnish a ventilated car to your petitioner in accordance with the foregoing demand, either within the 24-hour period contemplated by law for such case or within any other period.

"(8) The defendant company failed and refused to respond to the said application by furnishing to your petitioner any car of any kind whatever for the loading and transportation of such melons, persisting in such failure and refusal for more than five days following next after the service upon its said agent of the said written application.

"(9) The fair market value of such melons, loaded in a ventilated car at Ochlocknee, Ga., was then and there, on the 8th and 9th days of July, 1920, the sum of $175.

"(10) By reason of the defendant's failure and refusal to furnish a ventilated car as aforesaid, your petitioner failed to receive any sum whatever for his said melons, and the same became a total loss.

"(11) By reason of the defendant's failure and refusal to furnish a suitable car for the transportation of the melons aforesaid, it has injured and damaged your petitioner in the sum of $175, and now fails and refuses to pay the said sum or any part thereof.

"Wherefore, your petitioner brings this suit to recover his said damages, and prays process and judgment accordingly."

The Code sections referred to in the headnotes are as follows:

"It shall be the duty of the railroad companies of this state to furnish to any grower of peaches, apples, cantaloupes, watermelons, or other perishable products, suitable icing and refrigerator cars, or other suitable cars for the transportation of such products, whenever application is made therefor in writing by the shipper twenty-four hours in advance of the time such car or cars are wanted for loading. Such application to be filed with the nearest agent of the railroad company to the point from which shipment is to be made, and it shall state the time and place from which shipment is desired." Civil Code 1910, § 2774.

"Whenever any railroad company shall fail to furnish such icing and refrigerator cars as required in the preceding section, and the shipper places his product in carload lots, or, in cases of less than carload lots, expresses to the agent of the railroad company his willingness to pay charges for carload lots, then such railroad company shall be liable for the market value of such product with interest thereon. The market value to be determined by the market value of the product less the cost of carriage and the usual expense of selling in the market to which the shipper intended shipping same, on the day such product would have arrived, had the same been carried in the usual course of transportation on schedule time for such freight. In order to avail himself of this rule of damage, the shipper shall in writing notify the agent of the railroad company of the market to which he intended to ship his product. Payment shall be made by the railroad company for such product within thirty days after written claim has been filed with the company therefor. In the event that such railroad company shall fail to make payment as herein provided, or tender the correct amount thereof, it shall be liable for an additional fixed sum of fifty dollars for each car as liquidated damages for failure to perform its duty in the premises; such liquidated damages to be recovered in any cause brought for the recovery of damages on the main claim, in the event recovery is had thereon." Civil Code 1910, § 2775.

BLOODWORTH, J. (concurring specially). While I cannot concur in all that is said by the Chief Judge in the first headnote, I do agree with him that the declaration does not set out a cause of action either under the statute (Civil Code of 1910, §§ 2774, 2775), or under the common-law duty of a railroad company, as a common carrier, to furnish cars for the transportation of freight within a reasonable time after proper notice.

ATLANTA POST CO. et al. v. McHENRY.
(No. 11544.)(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2.
Feb. 26, 1921.)(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Appeal and error \S 917(3)—No presumption of ruling on any particular ground of demurrer to petition containing general and specific grounds.

Where a demurrer to a petition contains general and specific grounds, and the court passes an order on the demurrer, there is no presumption that the ruling was based on any particular ground, but the order will be treated as passing on the entire demurrer and on all its grounds. McClaren v. Williams, 132 Ga. 352, 64 S. E. 65.

2. Appeal and error \S 853—Ruling on demurrer held law of case as to right to relief and as to libelous character of language employed.

In a suit for libel, where the defendant admits the use of the language charged, and fails to enter a plea of justification, but files a special ground of demurrer, setting up specifically that the words used in the article were not per se libelous, and that no special damages were asked for, and this demurrer is overruled, and no exception taken to such order, the ruling on the demurrer becomes the law of the case, in so far as it amounts to an adjudication to the effect that the plaintiff is entitled to relief, and that the words used in the article were libelous per se. The only question in such a case remaining for the jury to determine is the amount of the damages to which the plaintiff is entitled. Ga. Northern Ry. Co. v. Hutchins & Jenkins, 119 Ga. 504, 46 S. E. 659; Johnson v. Wheelock, 63 Ga. 624; Miller v. Central of Ga. Ry. Co., 16 Ga. App. 855(3), 87 S. E. 303. The defendant by his demurrer having invoked a ruling upon the precise question indicated, and having failed to preserve exceptions taken pendente lite, or to enter direct exceptions upon such ruling, he cannot, upon exception to the judgment overruling the motion for a new trial, be heard in effect to attack the judgment on the demurrer, which he himself invited, and which had become the law of the case. American Grocery Co. v. Kennedy, 100 Ga. 462, 28 S. E. 241.

3. Libel and slander \S 124(7)—Instruction as to mitigation of damages by proof of absence of malice held not erroneous.

The charge of the court relative to the mitigation of damages, by proof of the absence of malice, was in accordance with the provisions of section 4429 of the Civil Code of 1910, to the effect that in all actions for printed or spoken defamation, malice may be inferred from the character of the charge, and that, should its existence be rebutted, such proof shall go in mitigation of damages. Shipp v. Story, 68 Ga. 47.

4. Libel and slander \S 33—In action for general defamation by words libelous per se, special damages need not be alleged or proven.

The court did not err in rejecting testimony offered by the defendant for the purpose of showing the absence of special damages. In an action for general damages on account of words spoken or written about another which are libelous per se, it is not necessary to allege or prove special damage, and where they are not claimed, the defendant is not entitled to show the absence of special damage. Civ. Code 1910, § 4433; 25 Cyc. 509.

Stephens, J., dissenting.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; J. T. Pendleton, Judge.

Action by Jackson McHenry against the Atlanta Post Company and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Affirmed.

T. J. Ripley, of Atlanta, for plaintiffs in error.

C. D. Maddox, of Atlanta, for defendant in error.

JENKINS, P. J. In the demurrer to the suit for libel the following statement is made:

"Nothing is alleged to base the damages upon the article not being per se libelous, and defendants move to dismiss said suit."

The court overruled the demurrer, and in the charge to the jury stated that the article was libelous per se, as had already been thus previously determined. The defendant excepts to the charge, on the ground that the jury should have been allowed to pass upon the question whether the article was libelous per se.

[1] It is urged that the judgment on the on the demurrer, which set up specifically, as the necessary basis of its ground, that the language used in the article was not libelous per se, did not necessarily pass upon that question; and that consequently there has been no adjudication to the effect that the words contained in the published article were libelous per se. If this contention be correct, then the conclusion stated in the second division of the syllabus would not follow, since, as was held in McElmurray v. Blodgett, 120 Ga. 9, 47 S. E. 531, such a judgment does not conclude a party upon any question not necessarily involved in the decision on the demurrer, citing Ga. Northern Ry. Co. v. Hutchins & Jenkins, 119 Ga. 504, 46 S. E. 659. As we see it, however, the distinction between the instant case and the McElmurray Case is clear and well defined. In that case the court held that the decision on the demurrer did not necessarily include a construction as to the nature of the instrument there involved, although the demurrer may have itself urged, as a reason why the petition should be dismissed, that the paper was of a certain named and definite character; this because there were other allegations in the petition, setting up fraud, such as would have authorized a recovery, even though the defendant's construction of the contract was correct, and that for this reason the court did not necessarily have to pass upon the character of the instrument in overruling the demurrer. In the instant case, as stated in the demurrer itself, the plaintiff has failed to set up or ask for special damages; and, as stated by the demurrer, the suit was for this reason not maintainable, unless the petition showed the use of language by the defendant which amounted to a libel per se. Thus, as urged by the demurrer itself, there could be no recovery under any other theory. It follows, therefore, that, in overruling the demurrer, the court necessarily had to determine whether the language of the published article amounted to a libel per se; this being the sole and precise question upon which a ruling was invoked.

[2-4] The real difficulty of the case strikes somewhat deeper, however, and is presented by a consideration of the question as to whether, in ruling upon the demurrer, the judge necessarily determined that the words of the published article were libelous per se, or whether he only necessarily determined that they authorized such a construction, thus leaving it for the jury to say whether the innuendoes, which the petition sets up by way of explanation, set forth the true and actual meaning of the language used. The petition sets forth by way of innuendo an explanation as to the meaning of the language, which it is alleged charged the plaintiff with a crime, and it appears to be the general rule in such a case that where the alleged defamatory statement is ambiguous, that is, where it is capable, as a matter of law, of being understood in more than one sense, it is the office of the innuendo to designate the meaning which the plaintiff proposes to establish as the true and actual intent of the language, and such as was understood by those who read it. It is not the office of an innuendo, when thus pleaded by way of interpretation, to add to or take from the meaning of the language itself. It cannot be made to operate as an averment imputing to the statement anything which is not in keeping with the usual and natural meaning of the language used. Whether the plaintiff by setting up the innuendo has assigned to a defamatory statement a meaning of which it is not logically capable is a question of law for the court; but after the court has determined, as a matter of law, that the statement is capable of the construction placed upon it by the plaintiff, it then becomes a question of fact for the jury to say whether or not the alleged defamatory statement was in fact used and understood in the sense charged. Thus it will be seen that if all the court did in passing upon the demurrer was to say that the language, as a matter of law, was legally capable of being understood as defamatory, that it was legally capable of being construed as set up by the pleaded innuendo, then the ruling would not amount to a holding that the language in fact charged a crime. In other words, if all that the judgment did was to rule that the language to the publication was legally susceptible of being understood according to the interpretation set forth by the petition, the judgment on the demurrer would not preclude the defendant on the question as to whether the language itself was or was not actually libelous per se. It follows that, if this were a case where the petition had set up and claimed special damages, the reasoning just stated would have proper application; and in a case of that sort a ruling on a demurrer, which sought merely to deny that the words were legally capable of the meaning charged, would decide nothing more than that such language might be taken and understood in accordance with the explanation plead by way of innuendo. In a case such as that, the judgment would have no need to pass upon the question as to whether or not the libel was such per se.

The case before us is, however, of a different nature. Here, we have a libel suit, setting up and praying for general damages only. It could not thus be maintained at all unless the language were libelous of itself and as a matter of law. No special damages being set up, the language of the publication must be such as would itself import injury and damage. Dismissal of the case was sought on the specific ground of demurrer that the language used was not libelous per se. Unless the language used were libelous as a matter of law, without the aid of any explanatory pleading or extraneous proof, the court should have sustained the demurrer. Not having sustained it, the contrary ruling necessarily carries with it an adjudication to the effect that the language used was not only libelous when taken in connection with the pleaded innuendo, but libelous per se.

But, it may be urged, does not the ruling, after all, go only to the extent of holding that the language is legally susceptible of being construed as libelous per se? If this were true, the effect would be to hold that the language, though necessary to be taken in connection with and supported by the explanation and interpretation pleaded by way of innuendo, could nevertheless, as a matter of law, be construed as a libel of itself and within itself. That is to say, the language itself is libelous within itself and of itself, although it is required that this construction of the language be supported by explanatory pleading and extraneous proof. This would seem to be an anomaly. It would be similar to saying that a given act could be accounted as negligence per se, although it required the finding of a jury to determine its character as such. Negligence which is negligence per se, and words which are libelous per se, are such as a matter of law. In either case, if the finding of a jury is necessary to determine the character of the act or of the words, this is proof positive that its character is not fixed as a matter of law. Words which require support, interpretation, and explanation by pleading and extraneous proof cannot therefore be taken as libelous within themselves merely because the charge, when thus supported, relates to a crime. If it takes the verdict of the jury to establish the fact that it is libelous at all, it necessarily follows that it cannot be so accounted simply as a matter of law. When the judge, passing upon the specific question raised by the demurrer, ruled that the language used in the publication was itself libelous per se, he must necessarily have determined that this was true without the aid of any interpretation pleaded by way of innuendo. This being true, whether his decision was right or wrong makes no difference; no exception having been made thereto. Having decided that the language of the publication was libelous per se, he necessarily determined that it charged a crime independently of the innuendo pleaded in its support. His holding on the exact point raised by the defendant, to wit, that the words themselves were libelous per se, was equivalent to a holding that the innuendo pleaded in the petition was mere surplusage, since words which are libelous per se must be able to stand alone without the aid of any innuendo pleaded in their support.

In Central of Georgia Railway Co. v. Sheftall, 118 Ga. 865, 867, 45 S. E. 687, 688, the Supreme Court, speaking through Mr. Justice Lamar, said:

"Words which are clearly not defamatory cannot have their natural meaning changed by innuendo. Words which are libelous per se do not need an innuendo. [Italics ours.] But between these two extremes are found many expressions which may be ambiguous, and the real meaning can then be explained by reference to the circumstances. It is for the jury in such instances to say whether, in view of all the facts, the writing was libelous. It then becomes a part of the plaintiff's case to prove the allegations in the innuendo, and to show that the words were really libelous under the circumstances, and that those who read understood them in the sense alleged."

Following the principle thus laid down by the Supreme Court, it is our opinion that when the trial judge ruled that the words of the article were libelous per se, he necessarily must have determined that they should be so taken independently of any innuendo set up by the petition, since, under the authority quoted, if the words were not libelous per se without it, it could not be so accounted when thus supported. A petition cannot be based upon ambiguous language which is manifestly uncertain as to whether the meaning of the words was intended to be libelous, except where the petition is supported by innuendoes pleaded by way of interpretation. It would seem to be equally true that if the petition cannot stand without the aid of explanatory interpretation, such ambiguous language standing by itself alone would not be sufficient to impute injury and damage as a matter of law. In this case, there being no special damages prayed for, the judge must have held that the language was not ambiguous, and that it charged a crime—not that it could have charged it as set forth by the pleaded innuendo, but that it did so independently of such pleaded interpretation. In order to render the ruling he made, it was necessary that he treat as mere surplusage the innuendo pleaded by way of interpretation, and to hold that the language itself charged a crime.

HILL, J., concurs.

STEPHENS, J. (dissenting). "A libel is a false and malicious defamation of another, expressed in print, or writing, or pictures, or signs, tending to injure the reputation of an individual, and exposing him to public hatred, contempt, or ridicule." Civil Code 1910, § 4428. There is authority to the effect that any defamatory charge amounting to a libel is actionable without proof of special damage to the person against whom the charge is directed. Bigelow on Torts (8th Ed.) 285. Be that as it may, it is certainly true that a libel which imputes to a person a crime punishable by law is actionable without proof of special damage. Such a charge is inherently harmful and injurious to the person against whom it is directed, and damage is therefore presumed. Such a libelous charge is actionable per se. This is so whether the words directly, ex vi termini, or indirectly by intimation or innuendo, make the charge. The charge is just as effectually harmful without proof of special damage, and therefore actionable per se, whether it results from words which directly and unequivocally make the charge, or from words which do so indirectly or by inference. It is therefore the harmful effect of the defamatory language which renders it actionable per se, and not its directness or unequivocal nature. To indirectly intimate, as in the instant case, that one is an embezzler or a thief, by charging that he wants to get his paws upon the money, if such language can be construed as making such charge, is just as inherently harmful without proof of special damage as to directly and unequivocally and in express language make the charge. See, in this connection, Odgers on Libel & Slander (5th Ed.) 39 et seq.; Pollock on Torts (10th Ed.) 249 et seq.; Bigelow on Torts (8th Ed.) 284; Cooley on Torts (3d Ed.) 376, 400; Newell on Libel & Slander (3d Ed.) 334, 352; Cooper v. Perry Dudley (Ga.) 247; 18 Am. & Eng. Ency.

of Law, 865 et seq., 969; 25 Cyc. 250, 452. Whether or not in any case the court can without the aid of a jury construe the meaning of alleged defamatory words, yet, where the words are reasonably susceptible of a defamatory meaning as well as an innocent one, and where the defamatory meaning must be supplied by inference or innuendo, the question then as to what meaning attaches to the language is clearly and without doubt one for the jury. Beazley v. Reid, 88 Ga. 380; Morgan v. Black, 132 Ga. 67, 63 S. E. 821; Odgers on Libel and Slander (5th Ed.) 110, 116, 129, 688; Newell on Libel and Slander (3d Ed.) 352. The trial judge therefore erred, as contended by the defendant, in eliminating this question from the consideration of the jury, unless his ruling upon the defendant's demurrer can be construed, as claimed by my colleagues in the majority opinion, as having adjudicated that the alleged defamatory words directly and ex vi termini made a defamatory charge actionable per se. I am of the opinion that no such question was adjudicated upon the demurrer, and therefore must dissent from the judgment of affirmance.

I submit that the trial judge, in overruling the defendant's demurrer to the petition, has adjudicated only that the alleged defamatory publication was actionable per se in the sense above stated, and that therefore the petition set out a cause of action without alleging special damage. The demurrer was based upon the ground that no cause of action was set out in the petition, since the alleged defamatory publication was not "per se libelous" and no special damage was alleged. The expression "not being per se libelous," as used by the defendant in the demurrer, can only mean that the alleged defamatory words are not actionable per se. It is not to be construed as meaning that the words are not unequivocal or not directly defamatory. Since defamatory language may be actionable per se without proof of special damage, whether the language directly or by inference makes a charge which is in itself defamatory without proof of special damage, a demurrer, based upon the ground that a petition in a suit for libel sets out no cause of action because the alleged defamatory publication is not "per se libelous" and no special damage is set out, can only be construed as meaning that the alleged defamatory charge is not actionable per se. If, therefore, the order overruling the demurrer adjudicates only that the alleged defamatory charge upon which the suit is based is actionable per se, it is not an adjudication that the language directly and unequivocally makes a defamatory charge. Despite such an adjudication, it was nevertheless error to withdraw from the jury the question as to the meaning of the language used.

Conceding, however, that the language in the demurrer that the publication was not "per se libelous" means that the words are not directly or ex vi termini libelous, it cannot be said that the trial judge, in overruling the demurrer, adjudicated that the words were directly and ex vi termini libelous. An order upon a demurrer is an adjudication of those questions only which must necessarily have been adjudicated to sustain the order. It is not an adjudication of any question the decision of which is not necessary for the purpose of sustaining the order. McElmurray v. Blodgett, 120 Ga. 9, 47 S. E. 531; Wheeler v. Board of Education, etc., 12 Ga. App. 152, 76 S. E. 1035. Therefore, the judgment overruling the demurrer to the petition, and thereby sustaining the petition, cannot be an adjudication that the alleged defamatory words were directly and unequivocally libelous, since it was not necessary so to decide in order to sustain the petition. The order overruling the demurrer and sustaining the petition adjudicates only that the petition sets out a cause of action, and a cause of action may be set out, without alleging special damage, whether the defamatory words directly and unequivocally make the libelous charge, or whether they do so indirectly or by inference.

(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

Appeal and error \S 719(10)—Error must be assigned on exceptions pendente lite.

Action by Adolphus Armstrong against W. M. Allen. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

L. D. McGregor, of Warrenton, for plaintiff in error.

LUKE, J. 1. Exceptions pendente lite cannot be considered unless error is assigned thereon, either in the main bill of exceptions or in this court by counsel for plaintiff in error, before the argument begins. See Shaw v. Jones Newton & Co., 133 Ga. 446 (1), 66 S. E. 240, and cases cited. In the instant case the bill of exceptions recites that to the order of the judge refusing to open the default which had been entered the plaintiff in error "then and there filed his bill of exceptions pendente lite to the order and judgment of said judge refusing to open said default." Nowhere in the bill of exceptions is there error assigned upon the exceptions pendente lite; nor was error assigned upon the exceptions pendente lite in this court by the counsel for plaintiff in error before argument. The decisions of the Supreme Court, which bind this court, control this question. Therefore the point which it is sought to raise by these exceptions cannot be considered.

2. Although the evidence for the plaintiff might have authorized a verdict for a greater amount than that found, or for a lesser amount, this fact will not necessitate a reversal, at the instance of the defendant, under the facts of this case. For no reason assigned did the court err in overruling the motion for a new trial, which was based only on the general grounds.

In an action for injuries to an employé struck by a shell which fell from an overhead track, complaint alleging that employer negligently furnished a defective air pressure elevator with which to work held to warrant admission of expert testimony as to whether the shell would have fallen if the machine had not been defective.

7. Appeal and error \S 1050(2)—Erroneous admission of evidence harmless in view of issue.

In action for injuries to employé struck by heavy shell which had fallen from overhead track suspended from ceiling, in which the only issue was whether the failure of the employer to warn and instruct employé as to the danger incident to his work was the proximate cause of the accident, the admission of testimony that the accident could not have taken place if the machine had not been defective, if error, was harmless.

8. Appeal and error \S 1066—Instruction held harmless in view of issue.

In action for injuries to employé in which only issue was whether employer failed to properly warn and instruct employé with reference to the proper operation of machine at which he was working at time of injury, instructions as to master's duty to provide servants with reasonably safe machinery, though not appropriately worded, held harmless.

9. Trial \S 252(1)—Instructions should be applicable to evidence.

Instruction should be applicable to the evidence and the giving of instructions not applicable thereto, if the jury is misled thereby, constitutes reversible error.

Error to Circuit Court, York County.

Action by Nicholas M. Blair against the Du Pont Engineering Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Henley, Hall, Hall & Peachy, of Williamsburg, and Plummer & Bohannon, of Petersburg, for plaintiff in error.

E. V. Farinholt and David Meade White, both of Richmond, for defendant in error.

KELLY, P. This is a writ of error to a judgment in favor of Nicholas M. Blair against the Du Pont Engineering Company in an action to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by Blair while in the employment of that company.

At the time of the accident the Du Pont Engineering Company was engaged in the business of loading large caliber shells for the United States government at Penniman, in York county. These shells, very much in the shape of an ordinary pistol cartridge, were about 8 inches in diameter, about 28 inches in length, and weighed in the neighborhood of 200 pounds. Blair went to work for the company on the 12th of August, 1918, and worked for two days at the very simple task of cleaning rust from the shells by means of sandpaper or a wire brush. On the third day he was assigned to the work of attaching and elevating shells to an overhead track suspended from the ceiling of the building in which he was employed. This operation was perhaps not very difficult for a man who understood it, nor very complex in its nature. To describe the work, however, so that the operation may be clearly visualized from a description, without any ocular demonstration, is not an easy task.

The overhead track referred to consisted of a single rail, in the shape of an I beam, suspended from the ceiling of the building. On this track were a number of four-wheeled carriers, called in the record "pulleys," or "trolleys," or "gigs." Each carrier was complete in itself and independent of the others. To each of them on the lower side was attached a steel cable, extending toward the floor of the building, and used for elevating or moving the heavy shells. By means of the cable, whether the same was merely hanging loose or was attached to the nose of a shell, the carriers could be moved by hand back and forth along the track. At the lower end of each cable was a hook which could be fastened into a hook on the small end of the shells. The wheels of the carriers moved on two flanges at the lower side of the rail (a pair of wheels on each flange), and were so adjusted that they could not separate and slip off the flanges.

At certain points along the overhead track were located air hoists, which were operated by compressed air, and at those points a short section in the track was so constructed and adjusted that it could be detached and lowered several feet from its position in the permanent track. Each of these short sections was about 3 feet long. The proper and safe method of elevating and moving the shells was about as follows: The operator would take hold of the cable, move the carrier, which was about 9 inches in length, to a position practically in the center of the short and movable section, then by the use of a lever, lower the short section, thus bringing the hook of the cable in reach of the shell as it stood on its end, attach the hook to the nose of the shell, and then again, by the use of a lever, release the short section so that it would by air pressure go back to its place in the permanent track, carrying the weight of the shell with it. When the short section assumed its place in the permanent track, the shell as thus suspended could be moved forward or backward on the track by means of the cable and pulley.

On the short or movable section of the track, at a distance of about a foot from each end, there was a device known as safety catches, or safety dogs, which automatically came in place as the short section was lowered from its position in the permanent track, and thus operated as a stop or brace to prevent the carrier from rolling off at either end while the short section was disconnected.

There was a conflict in the evidence as to whether the foreman, a youth 19 years of age, who put Blair to work at these carriers, explained to him the imperative importance of seeing that the carrier was between the safety dogs before he lowered the short section. To one who understood the mechanism, it would be readily apparent that, if the trolley was not in proper position—that is, if it was allowed to be entirely clear of the safety dogs at either end—it would be likely to run off of the end of the track as soon as it was lowered, or certainly when, with the heavy shell attached, it started back towards the ceiling. The foreman who directed Blair to take up this new work says that he fully instructed and warned him in this respect. Blair says he gave him no warning whatever, but simply told him to raise and lower the track by means of the lever, and did not intimate to him that there would be any danger of the trolley running off under any circumstances.

Blair had been working at this job for several hours, and had elevated quite a number of shells. While so engaged, however, and after the lapse of several hours, he lowered a section of track, attached a shell to the hook in the cable, and, as the track was ascending in response to his use of the lever, the trolley, which instead of being between the dogs was entirely outside of them and near the end of the section, rolled off and thus allowed the shell to fall, inflicting the injury for which this suit was brought.

We have stated that the accident was due to the fact that the trolley was at the end of the short section instead of being properly placed between the safety dogs. This does not seem to have been the plaintiff's original theory, nor did his testimony in the outset tend to establish any such theory. Upon the contrary, he testified at one or more points in his evidence that the short section of track itself came down with the trolley. It is stated in substance in the opening brief for the company that the plaintiff abandoned the latter contention before the end of the trial, and was brought to rely upon the theory that, although the mechanism itself was in proper working order and free from defects, it was dangerous to an operator who did not understand that the trolley could move from the center of the track and fall, and that the plaintiff had no such knowledge, and was not properly instructed and warned in that respect by the defendant before he was put to work. This position does not seem to be controverted, seems to be borne out by the general course of the trial, as shown in the record, and, as it was insisted upon by the plaintiff in error, we may safely assume that to decide the case accordingly cannot operate to its prejudice. We shall therefore deal with the case upon that theory.

There were two counts in the declaration.

In the first the negligence charged was:

That the defendants "did negligently, carelessly, and wrongfully furnish and provide the said plaintiff with a defective, unsafe, and dangerous air pressure elevator with which to work, which said air pressure elevator the said defendants on the day and year aforesaid knew was defective, unsafe, and dangerous, or they could have known it by the exercise of ordinary care on their part."

The negligence charged in the second count was:

That the defendants "did negligently, carelessly, and wrongfully fail and neglect to furnish and provide the said plaintiff with a reasonably safe place in which to work while in the discharge of his said duties in the exercise of ordinary care on his part, all of which the said defendants knew, or could have known by the exercise of ordinary care on their part, * * *" and "that the said place where he was required to work in the discharge of his duties aforesaid was dangerous and exposed him to extraordinary hazard to his life and limb, without knowledge on his part. The place was rendered dangerous by reason of the defective condition of the said air pressure elevator, which, by reason of the defect, was liable to fall upon and injure the said plaintiff without default on his part and while he was in the discharge of his duties aforesaid in the exercise of ordinary care."

The first error assigned is that the trial court improperly refused, upon the motion of defendant, to enter final judgment in its favor, pursuant to the provisions of section 6251 of the Code. This section provides that, when the verdict of the jury in a civil case is set aside by a trial court upon the ground that it is contrary to the law and the evidence, or without evidence to support it, a new trial shall not be granted if there is sufficient evidence before the court to enable it to decide the case upon its merits, but such final judgment shall be entered as to the court shall seem right and proper.

[1, 2] In support of this assignment it is contended: First, that the plaintiff failed to prove any actionable negligence on the part of the defendant. The gist of the argument is that there was no proof of any defect in the machinery rendering the place unsafe, and that, as these were the only allegations of negligence in the declaration, the plaintiff has failed to make out his case. In dealing with this contention we are assuming, as already indicated, that there was no proof to show that the machinery was not in good working order and reasonably safe for one acquainted with the dangers ordinarily incident to the work. Upon this assumption it may be said, as a general proposition of law, that there would be no liability in the absence of allegation and proof that the defendant failed properly to warn and instruct the plaintiff in respect to such hazards of the operation as he would not be bound to know because of their open and obvious character. It is elementary and familiar law that the proof must correspond to the allegations. But to avail itself of this rule the defendant was required to make timely objection to the variance. See Code 1919, § 6250; Va. & S. W. R. Co. v. Bailey, 103 Va. 205, 227, 49 S. E. 33; Conrad v. Ellison-Harvey Co., 120 Va. 458, 463, 91 S. E. 763, Ann. Cas. 1918B, 1171.

In this case the plaintiff himself, who was the first witness in the case, testified directly to the fact that he was put to work without any instructions as to the dogs, and without any warning as to the necessity of placing the trolley in the center of the movable track to insure the operation of the safety catches. After testifying at some length, and stating very emphatically that he had been operating the machinery exactly as he had been shown by the foreman, and without in any way disregarding any of his instructions, he was asked the following question and gave the following answer:

"Q. I understood that you told the jury—I do not want to keep on repeating questions, but I believe you told the jury that Mr. Taylor did not warn you at all?

"A. Not in the slightest degree of any danger that might possibly happen even."

Again, when he had been recalled, and before the testimony in chief in his behalf had been completed, he was asked the following questions and gave the following answers:

"Q. Mr. Crandall (plaintiff's witness), whom you heard testify, told the jury that this gig or trolley, if it got near your right-hand corner, was always liable to slip or fall off. Did you know that?

"A. Not until Mr. Crandall said so.

"Q. You told the jury that Mr. Taylor (defendant's foreman) showed you how to operate the machine. Did he tell you about that?

"A. Not a word.

"Q. All he told you to do was to work the levers?

"A. Yes, sir."

If the defendant had objected to this testimony, or had moved to strike out, it is quite probable that the court would have sustained the objection on the ground that it did not appear to be within the allegations of the declaration, but the plaintiff would then have had an opportunity to amend his allegations to conform to the proof, and doubtless would have made such amendment. The defendant, however, neither objected to the evidence nor moved to strike it out, but, on the other hand, introduced proof to the contrary, and the conflict thus arising was a question for the jury. The question of variance between the allegation and the proof was waived, and cannot now be raised.

[3, 4] It is further contended that the court ought to have set aside the verdict and entered final judgment for the defendant because the plaintiff: (1) Assumed the risk of the danger which resulted in his injury; and (2) was guilty of contributory negligence. As to these contentions, it is sufficient to say that the machinery and its operation, though simple enough when explained and understood, was unusual in its character, and that from the testimony before us we think the questions of whether the plaintiff assumed the risk or was guilty of contributory negligence were properly referred to the jury.

[5] The next assignment of error is as to the admission in evidence of a certain statement alleged to have been made out of court by one Miller. The plaintiff in the course of his examination in chief testified that Miller "was the head safety man at the plant while I was there," "the chief safety man for the whole plant"; that while the plaintiff was at the hospital at Penniman, where he had been sent by the defendant for treatment, he was asked by the physician who was treating him, in the presence of Mr. Miller, to state how and under what circumstances he was injured; that he replied "that I was elevating shells and as this shell that hit my foot went up, the safety had failed to catch and it came down on my foot"; and that thereupon Miller turned to the doctor and said, "Doctor, we have had a great deal of trouble with that machinery." This testimony was objected to upon the sole ground, so far as the record shows, that "it had not been shown that Mr. Miller had any right to bind the defendant here, although he was an employé. Miller ought to have been brought here."

We are of opinion that the court did not err in the admission of this evidence. In the absence of proof to the contrary, which, if it existed, could easily have been produced by the defendant, it is a perfectly natural and fair inference from what the witness said that Miller was an employé of the defendant company, was the head of its safety department, and was present at the hospital in connection with the plaintiff's injury in the regular course of his business. This being true, his statement was clearly admissible. Lynchburg Telephone Co. v. Booker, 103 Va. 594, 604, 50 S. E. 148; Washington-Va. Ry. Co. v. Deahl, 126 Va. 141, 145, 100 S. E. 840.

The admission in evidence of a statement by the plaintiff's witness Crandall is also assigned as error. This witness had worked for defendant at Penniman for about six months, and while it appears that he had only actually worked eight days in the particular building in which plaintiff was injured, his testimony showed perfect familiarity with the machinery and its operation. At the conclusion of his testimony in chief, he was asked the following question, and, over the objection and exception of the defendant, was allowed to make the following answer:

"Q. Now, I will repeat the question: I want you to tell the jury whether or not this thing in here (indicating gig) could have fallen if the machine had not been defective.

"A. I do not see how it could."

[6, 7] The first objection urged against this testimony is that the witness had not qualified as an expert, and had not shown any particular knowledge, science, skill, or art in the construction or the operation of air pressure elevators not possessed by ordinary persons. The objection does not appear to be sound. Upon the contrary, the witness gave perhaps the best description of the operation to be found in the record, and evinced very great familiarity with and very accurate knowledge of the machine. A further objection urged against this evidence is that it did not relate to any allegation in the declaration. The mere reading of the allegations above set forth and a comparison thereof with the question and answer will show that this point is not well taken. In any view of the matter, however, the evidence was immaterial, and its admission, even if erroneous, was harmless. The case quite plainly appears to have narrowed down at the trial to the question of whether the proximate cause of the accident was or not the failure of the defendant to warn and instruct the plaintiff. Crandall himself admitted on cross-examination, and it was conclusively proved, that the trolley could run off if not placed in the center of the short section and between the dogs; and before the case went to the jury it must have been understood by everybody connected with the trial that the accident was due to the fact that the trolley was not properly placed, and that the sole question for determination was whether the defendant was liable to the plaintiff for a failure of duty in warning and instructing him in this particular.

This brings us to the question of instructions. Plaintiff's instruction No. 1, the giving of which is assigned as error, was as follows:

"The court instructs the jury that it is the paramount duty of the master to use ordinary care and diligence to provide his servants with reasonably safe machinery and appliances and such as are reasonably calculated to assure his safety, and to inspect and examine their machinery from time to time for the purpose of discovering and repairing defects therein. If, therefore, the master knew, or could have known, if he had used such care to ascertain the fact, that the air pressure and elevator or appliances which he had provided for his servants were defective and unsafe, and that the servant, without any negligence upon his part, was injured thereby, the master is liable, and the jury should find for the plaintiff."

[8] This instruction was not appropriately worded, but, in view of the fact that the issue as developed by the evidence was as to whether the defendant failed in its duty with regard to plaintiff's safety by its failure properly to warn and instruct him with reference to the proper position of the trolley on the short section of track, we do not think the jury could have been misled by the instruction.

Plaintiff's instructions Nos. 2, 3, and 4, objected to, were brief abstract statements with reference to the law of negligence as applied to the relation of master and servant, and were so manifestly correct and free from error that we deem it unnecessary to make further comment upon them.

Plaintiff's instruction No. 5 told the jury that it was the duty of the defendant to exercise ordinary care to provide a reasonably safe place in which the plaintiff was required to work, and that, if they believed that the defendant knew, or by the exercise of ordinary care on its part could have known, that the trolley could move from the center of the track which came down, and thus be liable to fall with the suspended shell attached, and thereby rendered the place dangerous to the person operating the machine, and did not use reasonable care to warn the plaintiff of the danger, and that the plaintiff was ignorant of this fact and could not by the exercise of ordinary care on his part have discovered the danger, then the defendant is liable, and the jury should find for the plaintiff.

Plaintiff's instruction No. 6 told the jury that it was the duty of the defendant to provide a reasonably safe place in which the plaintiff was required to work, and that, if they believed from the evidence that the place was not reasonably safe, that the plaintiff was ignorant of this fact and could not by the exercise of ordinary care discover the danger, it was the duty of the defendant to warn and inform him of it, and that in the absence of an official of higher grade this duty devolved upon the foreman under whom he was working.

These two instructions are objected to on the ground that there was no charge in the declaration, except with reference to the defective, unsafe, and dangerous condition of the machinery, and that therefore these instructions dealt with questions outside of the allegation, and were for that reason erroneous. We have, however, seen that the case was tried upon a theory as to which the declaration might have been amended, upon testimony which would have been applicable to the declaration as so amended, and without any objection to such evidence. In this view of the case the instructions complained of, while not as accurately phrased as they might have been, could not have been misunderstood by the jury, and cannot be made the ground of reversal.

[9] There should be this further comment made with reference to the instructions: The plaintiff asked for eight, the defendant for twelve, and the court gave all of them exactly as offered. These instructions, taken literally, covered practically every question of law which could have arisen as to the respective legal rights and duties of the plaintiff and defendant, even if the case had been one in which the evidence tended to show some defect rather than a mere inherent danger of the machinery. Why they were asked for and given in this form, in view of the narrow question of fact presented by the evidence, is not easy to understand. It is possible that they were prepared in advance of the actual introduction of the evidence, and afterwards offered and given without much consideration or scrutiny. Undoubtedly one of those given for the plaintiff and several of those given for the defendant might be construed to assume that a defective condition of the machinery was involved and relied upon by the plaintiff. The latter was true under the allegations of the declaration, but not true, as we think, under the issue as developed at the trial. Of course, it is well understood that instructions ought not to be given which are not applicable to the evidence, and that to give them constitutes reversible error where there is reason to suppose that they probably misled the jury. We do not think there was such probability in this instance.

Upon the whole case, we are of opinion that there has been a fair trial upon a narrow issue fully understood by the parties, the court, and the jury, and that we ought not to interfere with the verdict and judgment.

Affirmed.

FIELDS v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. March 17, 1921.)

1. Homicide §140—Indictment for attempt to murder held sufficiently to charge overt acts.

Indictment charging that accused did feloniously attempt to commit the crime of murder by discharging and shooting off a pistol at and towards another, etc., held sufficiently to charge the overt acts done toward commission of the offense.

2. Homicide §131—Indictment sufficiently informed accused of person upon whom attempt made.

Indictment charging an attempt to commit the crime of murder by discharging a pistol at another held sufficiently to inform accused whether she was charged with attempt to murder the person named or some one else.

3. Homicide §139—Indictment for attempt to commit murder not invalid for failure to specify degree.

Indictment charging attempt to commit the crime of murder by discharging a pistol at another held not invalid because failing to specify that the murder alleged to have been attempted was murder in the first degree.

4. Homicide §9—Intent to kill essential element of first degree murder.

The intent to kill is an essential element of the crime of murder in the first degree.

5. Homicide §128—Indictment for murder need not allege intent to kill.

An indictment for murder need not expressly allege the intent to kill, and an indictment for murder at common law which does not expressly charge such intent is valid and sufficient to support verdict of murder in the first degree, if the evidence is sufficient to establish the murder was of such degree.

6. Homicide §313(1), 330—Verdict convicting of attempt to murder not invalid because not finding degree.

In a prosecution under indictment charging attempt to commit the crime of murder, verdict of guilty held not invalid because it did not expressly appear therefrom that the jury found defendant guilty of attempt to commit murder in the first degree, and, in the absence of the evidence or instructions, the appellate court must presume that the jury in fact found defendant guilty of an attempt to commit murder in the first degree, in which case alone it could have lawfully fixed the punishment named in the verdict.

7. Criminal law §1144(16)—General verdict presumed to be responsive to all issues affecting its correctness.

Even in civil cases a general verdict is presumed to be responsive to all issues affecting its correctness, and it is only where it affirmatively appears from the record that it is uncertain whether the verdict responds to all such issues that it will be held to be invalid, which rule is still stronger in criminal cases.

Error to Circuit Court, York County.

Lou Emma Fields was convicted of an attempt to commit murder, and she brings error. Affirmed.

Omitting the formal and immaterial parts, the indictment in this case contains the following allegations, namely:

That the accused "did feloniously attempt to commit the crime of murder by then and there, with a pistol, then and there charged and loaded with gunpowder and leaden bullets, which said pistol she, the said Lou Emma Fields, in her hand then and there held, then and there feloniously, willfully, and of her malice aforethought did discharge and shoot off at and towards one David Tabb, she, the said Lou Emma Fields, at the time of said shooting being close enough to the said David Tabb to be within carrying distance of said pistol. * * *

The accused demurred to the indictment. The court overruled the demurrer, and the point was duly saved. There was a trial by jury, which resulted in the following verdict:

"We, the jury, find the accused, Lou Emma Fields, guilty as charged in the within indictment and fix her punishment at two years' confinement in the penitentiary."

Whereupon the accused moved the court to set aside the verdict on the ground that it was contrary to the law and the evidence, which motion the court overruled, entered judgment, and passed sentence upon the accused in accordance with the verdict, and the accused appeals.

None of the evidence introduced on the trial and none of the facts proved thereon is shown in the record. Further, it appears from the record that the jury "received the instructions of the court," but they do not appear in the record.

The indictment was found under the Virginia statute of attempts (Code 1919, § 4767, being section 3888 of the Code of 1887), which, so far as material, is as follows:

"How Attempts to Commit Offenses Punished.—Every person who attempts to commit an offense, and in such attempt does any act towards its commission, shall, when not otherwise provided, be punished as follows: If the offense attempted be punishable with death, the person making such attempt shall be confined in the penitentiary not less than two nor more than five years; * * * if it be punishable by confinement in the penitentiary, he shall be confined in jail not less than six nor more than twelve months; if it be punishable by confinement in jail or fine, he shall be confined in jail not exceeding six months or fined not exceeding one hundred dollars. * * *

Ashton Dovell, of Williamsburg, for plaintiff in error.

Jno. R. Saunders, Atty. Gen., and J. D. Hank, Jr., Asst. Atty. Gen., for the Commonwealth.

SIMS, J. (after stating the facts as above). The assignments of error raise the questions, which will be disposed of in their order as stated below:

[1] 1. Does the indictment sufficiently charge the overt acts done towards the commission of the offense?

This question must be answered in the affirmative.

The indictment is informal in some respects. It, however, follows the statute in its use of the word "attempt," and further charges that the attempt was "to commit the crime of murder," and that the overt acts done towards the commission of that offense were, in terms or in substance, that the accused, on a certain day, feloniously, willfully, and of her malice aforethought, did discharge and shoot at and towards one David Tabb a pistol, then and there held in her hand, charged and loaded with gunpowder and leaden bullets, she being at the time of the shooting close enough to said Tabb, with respect to the range of the pistol, to have rendered the shooting at and towards said Tabb effective of the aforesaid attempt to commit the crime of murder.

Concerning the overt acts in question, we have here a similar situation involved in Cunningham's Case, 88 Va. 37, 13 S. E. 309, where the indictment under consideration was for an attempt to commit rape and was found under the same statute concerning attempts as that under which the indictment was found in the instant case. There the indictment was held sufficient in its charge of the overt acts done towards the commission of the offense, although it merely charged an assault, without charging any of the specific acts constituting the assault. The indictment before us charges the acts constituting the assault, and therefore both charges the assault and descends into the particulars of that charge. A fortiori, under the ruling in the Cunningham Case, the indictment in the instant case sufficiently charges the overt acts in question. See, also, Broadus' Case, 126 Va. 733, 101 S. E. 321.

[2] 2. Did the indictment inform the accused whether she was charged with the attempt to murder David Tabb, or some one else?

We are of opinion that the indictment plainly charges and hence informed the accused that she was charged with the attempt to murder David Tabb.

The following position is taken for the accused in the petition for the writ of error, namely:

"The indictment first charges an 'attempt to commit the crime of murder,' alleging the same in the form of a conclusion, * * * then goes on by descriptive language, and alleges that the accused fired a loaded pistol at and towards one David Tabb, * * * but nowhere is the allegation made that the attempt was to murder David Tabb or assault him. We submit that the descriptive language is not sufficient to support the conclusion of the first part of the indictment that the accused attempted to commit the crime of murdering David Tabb."

The allegations of the indictment must be read as a whole. When so read, we think they unmistakably charge not only the conclusion in the first part of the indictment that the accused attempted to commit the crime of murdering David Tabb, but also, where they descend to the particulars of fact on which that conclusion is based, charge unmistakably that the attempt was to assault and murder David Tabb.

[3] 3. Is the indictment invalid because it fails to specify that the murder alleged to have been attempted was murder in the first degree?

The question must be answered in the negative.

[4, 5] The petition of the accused correctly takes the position that the intent to kill is an essential element of the crime of murder in the first degree. See Williams' Case, 128 Va. —, 104 S. E. 853, and authorities cited. And it is said in the petition that—

"The indictment says that the accused fired a pistol at and towards David Tabb while within range, but does not allege that the intent existed to kill him."

But it is the settled law of this state that an indictment for murder need not expressly allege the intent to kill, and that an indictment for murder at common law (which does not expressly charge the intent to kill) is valid and sufficient to support a verdict of murder in the first degree, if the evidence introduced on the trial is sufficient to establish that the murder was of that degree. Livingston's Case, 14 Grat. (55 Va.) 592, 596; Cluverius' Case, 81 Va. 787. On the same principle we are of opinion that an indictment for an attempt to commit murder at common law is valid and sufficient to support a verdict, such as that rendered in the instant case, convicting the accused of an attempt to commit murder in the first degree, if the evidence was sufficient to prove the commission of that crime. As the accused has not brought before us the evidence introduced on the trial, we must presume that it was sufficient to establish that the attempted murder was murder of the first degree. Therefore we are of opinion that the indictment is valid in the particular in question.

We come now to the only question raised by the assignments of error which remains for our consideration, namely:

[8, 7] 4. Is the verdict invalid because it does not expressly appear therefrom that the jury found the accused guilty of the attempt to commit murder of the first degree?

This question also must be answered in the negative.

It is true that under the statute the jury could not in this case have lawfully fixed the punishment named in the verdict, unless they in fact found the accused guilty of an attempt to commit murder in the first degree. But, in the absence of the presentation to us either of the evidence or the instructions, we must entertain every reasonable presumption in support of the validity of the action of the jury, and must conclude that the attention of the jury was properly called to the issue as to the degree of the attempted crime, and that they in their verdict responded to that as well as to all the other issues in the case which affected the correctness of the verdict. Even in civil cases a general verdict is presumed to be responsive to all the issues in the case affecting the correctness of the verdict (Burks' Pl. & Pr. § 300, p. 535), and it is only where it affirmatively appears from the record that it is uncertain whether the verdict responds to all such issues that it will be held to be invalid (Winn Bros. & Baker, Inc., v. Lipscombe, 103 S. E. 623). This rule is still stronger in criminal cases, for reasons which we need not enter into here.

The case will therefore be affirmed.

BRAGG v. JUSTUS et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
March 17, 1921.)

1. Exceptions, bill of \S 43(1)—Bill must be filed within time or court is without jurisdiction.

The filing of bills of exception within the time prescribed by law is of the very essence of the jurisdiction of the trial court, and, if not filed in such time, the trial court cannot make the bills a part of the record thereafter, nor can the matter be affected by consent of counsel.

2. Exceptions, bill of \S 41(5)—Bill must be filed within 60 days after rendition of judgment.

Where judgment was rendered February 2, a bill of exceptions filed May 18 comes too late, and cannot be considered, for the bill of exceptions, under Code 1919, § 6252, must be filed within 60 days after rendition of judgment, notwithstanding the term was in session for more than 60 days, and the provision of Code 1919, § 6338, authorizing the trial judge to suspend execution of judgment does not authorize the extension of time for filing bill of exceptions beyond 60 days.

3. Appeal and error \S 637—Writ of error dismissed where bill of exceptions was not filed in time, and the only errors assigned were dependent thereon for support.

Where the only errors assigned were dependent on the bill of exceptions for support, a writ of error will be dismissed where the bill of exceptions was not filed in time.

Error to Circuit Court of City of Richmond.

Action by John W. Justus and Hunter M. Martin, partners as the Manchester Mills, against W. G. Bragg. There was a judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant brings error. Writ dismissed.

A. H. Sands, of Richmond, for plaintiff in error.

F. T. Sutton, Jr., of Richmond, for defendants in error.

BURKS, J. The defendants in error (plaintiffs below) proceeded by motion for a judgment against W. G. Bragg for breach of contract. On December 11, 1919, there was a verdict in favor of the plaintiffs for $900. This verdict the defendant moved the court to set aside as contrary to the law and the evidence. The court took time to consider of its judgment, and on February 2, 1920, overruled the motion, and entered final judgment for the plaintiffs for $900, with interest and costs. The following is the language of the entry:

"This day came again the parties, by their attorneys, and the court, having considered the defendant's motion heretofore made to set aside the verdict of the jury rendered herein on the 11th day of December, 1919, doth overrule the same, to which action and ruling of the court the defendant, by his attorney, excepted.

"Therefore it is considered by the court that the plaintiffs recover against the defendant the sum of $900, the damages assessed by the jury in their verdict aforesaid, with interest thereon to be computed after the rate of 6 per centum per annum from the 11th day of December, 1919, until paid, and their costs by them about their motion in this behalf expended.

"Memorandum: Upon the trial of this action the defendant, by his attorney, excepted to sundry opinions and the judgment of the court given against him, and leave is given him to file his bills of exceptions at any time within the time prescribed by law. And on motion of the defendant, by his attorney, it is ordered that this judgment be suspended for the period of 60 days from this day to enable the defendant to apply for an appeal from the said judgment upon condition that he or some one for him enter into a bond before the clerk of this court with good and sufficient security in the penalty of $1,000 within 10 days from this day, conditioned according to law."

Afterwards, on March 22, 1920, the trial court entered the following order:

"This day came again the defendant, by his attorney, and on his motion the time given him to file his bills of exceptions is extended to 60 days from the rising of the court, and the judgment entered herein on the 2d day of February, 1920, is suspended for the same period, to allow the defendant to apply for an appeal from the said judgment, upon condition that he or some one for him enter into a bond before the clerk of this court with good and sufficient security in the penalty of one thousand dollars within ten days from this day conditioned according to law."

[1] On May 18, 1920, the bills of exception were filed. The only errors assigned are founded upon these bills of exception, and it is necessary to decide in the outset whether or not they are a part of the record. The subject was not mentioned either in the briefs of counsel or in the oral argument, and when it was brought to the attention of counsel after the case was submitted, counsel for the defendants in error, in a written communication to the court, stated that he had consented to the extension of the time within which the bills of exception were to have been filed. But it is not a matter that counsel could affect by consent. If the bills were not filed within the time prescribed by law, the trial court was without jurisdiction to receive them and have them made a part of the record at a later date. The filing within the time prescribed by law was of the very essence of the jurisdiction of the trial court. Dallas Wright's Case, 111 Va. 873, 69 S. E. 956; Battershall v. Roberts, 107 Va. 269, 58 S. E. 588; Standard Peanut Co. v. Wilson, 110 Va. 650, 66 S. E. 772, and cases cited.

[2] Prior to the Code of 1887, and for some years thereafter, bills of exception could not be filed after the adjournment of the term at which final judgment was entered. Afterwards the Legislature made changes in the statute, and finally allowed the bills to be filed within 30 days after the term "or at such other times as the parties, by consent entered of record, may agree upon." Code 1904, § 3385. This led to such loose practice as to evoke from this court the statement that—

"More miscarriages, in the effort to bring the rulings of trial courts under review in this court, have occurred in the six years since the amended statute, supra, has been in force than in all the years prior to its passage. And why? Simply because the statute has not, in the cases where the miscarriages have occurred, been strictly followed, as is absolutely necessary, in order to confer authority upon the judges of trial courts, to sign a bill of exception, and make it a part of the record, after the adjournment of the term at which the final judgment in the case is entered." Battershall v. Roberts, supra.

With full knowledge of the situation, the revisors of 1919 limited the time within which bills of exception might be filed to "sixty days from the time at which such judgment is entered." Code 1919, § 6252. In a note to this section the revisors say:

"It should be observed that sixty days are given instead of thirty, as was the case formerly, but that the time may not be increased by consent entered of record. It was thought that this period would be sufficient for all purposes, and that by making it a fixed, definite, unchangeable period, difficulties formerly encountered would be obviated."

[3] The provision of section 6338 of the Code permitting the trial court or the judge thereof in vacation to suspend the execution of a judgment under the circumstances mentioned in that section does not extend the time for filing bills of exception. The time for filing such bills is definitely fixed by section 6252, and the trial courts are without power or authority to extend it. Final judgment was entered in the case at bar February 2, 1920, but the bills of exception were not filed till May 18, 1920, more than 60 days after the final judgment. The bills of exception, therefore, are no parts of the record before us. It does not appear from the record, but we are informed by counsel on both sides, that when the order of March 22, 1920, was entered the February term of the court was still in session; in other words, the court still had control over the judgment. The fact that the court still had control over the judgment did not render the judgment any less a final judgment within the meaning of section 6252 of the Code. That section permits bills of exception to be filed "at any time before final judgment is entered, or within sixty days from the time at which such judgment is entered." This language, taken in connection with what the revisors say in their note to the section, makes it fairly plain that the bills of exception were to be filed within 60 days from the date of the judgment, whether the court continued in session or not. The sixty days is to be computed, not from the adjournment of the term at which the judgment by operation of law becomes final, but from the date of the judgment which becomes final by such adjournment. The fact is that the judgment of February 2, 1920, was the only judgment ever entered in the case. If it is not a final judgment, then the writ of error would have to be dismissed because such a writ lies only to a final judgment. If it is a final judgment within the meaning of the section, then the bills of exception were not filed in time. As the only errors assigned are dependent upon the bills of exception for support, the writ of error will be dismissed as having been improvidently awarded. It is not surprising that this error should have occurred, as the statute did not go into effect till January 13, 1920.

Dismissed.

ATLANTIC COAST LINE R. CO. v.
SOUTHERN OIL & FEED
MILLS, Inc.

HINES, Director General of Railroads, v.
SAME.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
March 17, 1921.)

1. Waters and water courses §119(4)—Ordinary care to be exercised by railroad in constructing a culvert.

The degree of care and foresight a railroad company should use in putting a pipe under its roadbed to carry off water to prevent flooding of lands of adjoining landowners is that which an ordinarily prudent man would exercise under the conditions and circumstances existing at the time.

2. Waters and water courses §119(4)—Inadequacy of culvert need not be affirmatively brought to railroad's attention.

A railroad's duty as to construction of culverts under its roadbed is not fully discharged by careful original construction of a pipe, and it was error, in an action for damages from flooding, to instruct in effect that such was the law unless and until an inadequacy of the pipe was affirmatively brought to the road's attention in some notice given by or on behalf of the adjoining landowner.

3. Trial §296(2)—Erroneous instruction as to inadequacy of culvert cured by following instruction.

In an action for damages by flooding, due to inadequacy of culvert under railroad roadbed, an instruction, objectionable as being susceptible of the meaning that any "want of proper construction of the said culvert" would have rendered defendant liable, was cured by an instruction immediately following it, correctly stating the rule as to the degree of care required of a railroad in constructing a culvert.

4. Railroads §5½, New, vol. 6A Key-No. Series—Director General had no right to permit injury by faulty culvert.

The Director General of Railroads had no more right to permit a faulty constructed culvert to operate injuriously to property owners than the railroad company itself, although he had nothing to do with the original construction of the culvert.

Error to Circuit Court of City of Suffolk.

Actions by the Southern Oil & Feed Mills, Incorporated, against the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company and against Walker D. Hines, Director General of Railroads, respectively. Judgments for plaintiff, and defendants separately bring error. Affirmed.

Wm. B. McIlwaine and Bernard Mann, both of Petersburg, for plaintiffs in error.
Lewis & Harris, for defendant in error.

KELLY, P. This is a writ of error to two judgments in favor of the Southern Oil &

Feed Mills, Incorporated, one thereof against the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company, and the other against the Director General, operating that company's lines. The judgments were rendered in two actions at law instituted at the same time by the Southern Oil & Feed Mills, Incorporated, against the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company and the Director General, respectively, and both actions were tried together by consent.

The damages sought to be recovered were alleged to have resulted from an insufficient pipe or culvert under the railroad, causing the damming or ponding of water on the plant and property of the plaintiff.

Some time prior to June, 1915, the plaintiff leased from the owners, L. F. Bain & Son, the certain building and premises in the city of Suffolk which for some years previous had been used as a warehouse for the storage of peanuts, and still earlier as a planing mill. This property, as described in the declaration and as shown by the evidence, was—

"near to and adjoining a certain gorge, drain, ditch, and water course which forms the southern boundary of the said premises, and has for all time, as far as is known, constituted a natural drain for the collection and passage of water, which flows from, over, and under a large area of land in the said city of Suffolk, including the premises of the plaintiff, and numerous accepted streets in said city, to wit, Johnson avenue, Culloden street, Spruce street, Tynes street, and Oak avenue, to, by, through, and beyond the same, and in an easterly direction under the tracks of the Norfolk Southern Railroad Company, the tracks of the Southern Railway Company, thence to the railroad right of way property of the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company, through which last-mentioned right of way property said gorge, drain, ditch, and water course passed before the said Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company constructed its right of way and tracks thereon."

To be a little more specific, it appears from the allegations and proof that the plaintiff's property was situated immediately west of three parallel lines of railroad tracks, the first and nearest being the Norfolk Southern, the second the Southern, and the third the Atlantic Coast Line. These tracks had been there for 25 or 30 years, having been constructed in point of time in the order last above named. From the time of their original construction until about the year 1908, the Norfolk Southern and Southern Railroads maintained an 18-inch pipe under their tracks connecting with the drain or gorge above mentioned, making a continuous pipe line of that size under both tracks for a distance of 117½ feet. This pipe line emptied into an opening or manhole between the tracks of the Southern and the tracks of the Atlantic Coast Line, and from this hole the latter company maintained a 15-inch pipe under its tracks for a distance of about 80 feet to a point east of the tracks, where it emptied on the surface. All of the tracks were on a fill elevated very considerably above the bottom of the aforesaid drain or gorge.

In about the year 1908, the Norfolk Southern Railroad Company substituted a 30-inch pipe in place of the 18-inch pipe under its tracks, and shortly thereafter the Southern Railway Company made a similar change. The Atlantic Coast Line at a much later date did the same thing, but not until after the damages herein sued for had been sustained.

These two actions were for damages sustained in four several floods, in which the water backed up on the plaintiff's property, one thereof occurring in June, 1915, one in March, 1917, one in April, 1918, and one in June, 1918, the last two after the railroads had been taken over by the Director General.

The first assignment of error is to the action of the court in refusing to set aside the verdict of the jury as being contrary to the law and the evidence.

Under this assignment, the argument of the defendants is addressed solely to the proposition that the evidence is insufficient from the plaintiff's stand point to support the verdicts; their main contention being summed up in their opening brief as follows:

"In conclusion, it is evident that the floods of 1915, 1917, and 1918, four in number, were caused by some one of the pipes under the railroad embankment becoming stopped up by debris, etc., and, as we have seen, it is just as probable, if not more so, that this stopping was at the mouth of one of the other pipes referred to in the evidence as that it occurred at the mouth of the A. C. L. pipe."

It would serve no good purpose to review the evidence in detail. We have examined it scrupulously, and are fully satisfied that it was amply sufficient to warrant the jury in finding that the damage was caused by the insufficient size of the pipe line under the Atlantic Coast Line track.

The second assignment of error relates to the giving and refusing of instructions. The plaintiff asked for 5 instructions, all of which were given. The defendant Atlantic Coast Line asked for 11, 7 of which were given, and the defendant Director General asked for 13, 9 of which were given. To the action of the court in giving the 5 instructions for the plaintiff, and in refusing 4 of those asked for by the railroad company and 4 asked for by the Director General, the defendants noted a general exception, but only 5 of the instructions, as given or refused, are discussed or referred to in the assignments of error, and we shall confine ourselves to a consideration of the latter.

[1] Instruction No. 4, asked for by the railroad company and refused, was as follows:

"That the degree of care and foresight which the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company should have used in putting a pipe under its roadbed to carry off the water in question was that which an ordinarily prudent man would have exercised under the conditions and circumstances existing at the time that said pipe was put in, and if the jury believe from the evidence that such care was used by said company, and further believe from the evidence that not until after the two floods complained of in the declaration, to wit, the one in June, 1915, and the one in March, 1917, was it brought to said company's attention that the pipe that had been installed by it was believed to be the source of damage to the plaintiff, then the jury cannot find a verdict against said company in this case."

[2] The first part of this instruction accurately defined the railroad company's duty in respect to the original installation of the pipe line. American Locomotive Co. v. Hoffman, 108 Va. 363, 370, 61 S. E. 759, 128 Am. St. Rep. 953. The latter part of the instruction, however, was inappropriate and misleading. To have given it would have been equivalent to telling the jury that the company's duty was fully and finally discharged by the duly careful original construction of the pipe, unless and until the inadequacy of the pipe was affirmatively brought to its attention in some notice given by or on behalf of the plaintiff. This is not the law.

There is evidence tending to show that the smaller pipe was reasonably adequate for some time after its installation; but, be that as it may, it is clear that in process of time the drainage area was subject to material changes, particularly by reason of the growth of the city of Suffolk, the improvement of its streets, etc., and that these changes augmented the flow of water into the culvert in question. The changes referred to were such as to be reasonably anticipated, they were readily apparent as they progressed, and their probable effect on the watershed was as open and obvious to the railroad company as they were to the owners of the property liable to be affected thereby. Both the Norfolk Southern and the Southern Railroad Companies had installed larger pipes some years before the damage here complained of had occurred. Whether this change was made because the pipe was originally too small, or because it had been rendered inadequate by changed conditions, may not be entirely clear; but it convincingly appears that the change was in fact made because the pipe was too small. The Atlantic Coast Line, in all reasonable probability, knew of the change made by the other roads; but, whether so or not, the conditions making it reasonably necessary were open to that company. The duty of a railroad company with respect to culverts to take care of surface water coming through a natural drain does not end with the original installation, but is a continuing one. 3 Farnham on Waters, p. 2669; Indiana, L. & I. R. Co. v. Patchett, 59 Ill. App. 251; 27 R. O. L. pp. 1148, 1149; Soules v. Northern Pacific R. Co., 34 N. D. 7, 157 N. W. 823, L. R. A. 1917A, 501, 509. Defendants' instruction No. 4 was properly refused.

[3] Complaint is made of plaintiff's instruction No. 4, given over defendants' objection, as follows:

"The court instructs the jury that, if from the evidence, they believe that the direct cause of the alleged disaster was the want of proper construction of the said culvert under the tracks of the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company, then they shall find for the plaintiff."

It is said, first, that this instruction ignores the degree of care with which the defendants are chargeable as defined in the Hoffman Case, supra. It appears, however, by reference to the plaintiff's instruction No. 5 that the court told the jury plainly:

"That the degree of care and foresight which the defendants should have used in constructing their culvert was in proportion to the nature and magnitude of the injury which would likely have resulted from the water being backed upon the plaintiff's property, and it should have been that care and prudence which a reasonably discreet and cautious individual would, or ought to have used for the purpose of protecting himself from injury."

This, as we understand it, is substantially the rule as to the degree of care laid down by the Hoffman Case, and while it would have been proper to have made a similar statement in instruction No. 4, there was no necessary conflict between the two, and when read together, they constitute a correct statement of the law. Instruction No. 4, standing alone, might have been objectionable as being susceptible of the meaning that any "want of proper construction of the said culvert" would have rendered the defendants liable, but instruction No. 5, immediately following it, cured the objection. Miller v. Newport News, 101 Va. 432, 44 S. E. 712; C. & O. Ry. Co. v. McCarthy, 114 Va. 181, 188, 76 S. E. 319; Eastern Export Corporation v. Beazley, 121 Va. 4, 9, 92 S. E. 824.

[4] Another objection urged against plaintiff's instruction No. 4 is that it applied to both defendants, whereas the Director General had nothing to do with the original construction. It is a sufficient answer to this objection to say that both cases were heard together, and, if there were anything in the objection here urged, the jury would not have been misled because they fully understood that the proceeding, in so far as it affected the Director General, was aimed at the condition and maintenance of the road during his administration. As a matter of fact, however, the instruction was right, and is free from objection as to both defendants. The Director General had no more right to permit a faulty construction to operate injuriously to property owners than the company itself. In this respect he stood in the company's shoes.

Instructions 1, 2, 3, and 5, given at the request of the plaintiff, are objected to on behalf of the Director General of Railroads on substantially the same ground as the second objection to plaintiff's instruction No. 4 above. For the reasons stated in the discussion of that instruction, there was no error in giving the three here in question, and no merit in the objection thereto.

The judgments complained of are affirmed. Affirmed.

WATTS v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. March 17, 1921.)

1. Indictment and information \S 110(31)—Indictment following statutory form not open to attack.

Where an indictment followed the statutory form previously adjudged sufficient, it is not open to attack, though charging a second offense in violation of the Prohibition Law.

2. Indictment and information \S 121(4)—Bill of particulars sufficient in a prosecution for violation of prohibition law.

In a prosecution for a second offense against the Prohibition Law, the bill of particulars, informing accused with clearness and certainty of the cause and nature of his accusation, which named the persons to whom and designated the place where he was alleged to have illegally sold ardent spirits, is sufficient.

3. Jury \S 58—Statute requires jurors to be drawn from lists furnished by jury commissioners.

Laws 1918, c. 340, requiring jurors to be drawn from a list furnished by a judge, was expressly repealed by Act Jan. 29, 1920 (Laws 1920, c. 1), and providing for juries to be drawn from lists furnished by jury commissioners and therefore defendant cannot complain that the venire facias was selected in that manner.

4. Criminal law \S 1144(12)—Presumption in favor of regularity of proceeding, where no certificate of evidence.

On writ of error to review a conviction under the Prohibition Law for a second offense, where there was no certificate of evidence, a certified copy of order of corporation court of Newport News, showing the defendant's previous conviction, must be deemed to have been regularly admitted, and the complaint in that connection that a witness should not have been allowed to testify to what could have been proven by the record in that court will be disregarded.

5. Criminal law §1144(14)—In the absence of certificate of evidence, instructions will be presumed warranted by evidence.

Where there was no certificate of evidence, it will be presumed on error that an instruction given was warranted by the evidence, and a complaint of such instruction is unavailable; there being nothing on its face to indicate illegality.

6. Criminal law §894—After discharge defendant cannot complain that the court did not poll the jury.

The accused, when the foreman returns the verdict in open court, may have each juror polled before it is accepted, and if he does not the clerk, after reading the verdict, addresses the jury, "and so say you all," and if none of the jurors expresses dissent the verdict is recorded, hence it is too late, after acceptance and discharge of the jury, for accused to complain that they were not polled.

Error to Corporation Court of Hopewell.

Joe W. Watts alias J. D. Watson was convicted of second offense under the Prohibition Law and he brings error. Affirmed.

David A. Harrison, Jr., and J. Toomer Garrow, both of Hopewell, for plaintiff in error.

Jno. R. Saunders, Atty. Gen., and J. D. Hank, Jr., Asst. Atty. Gen., for the Commonwealth.

PRENTIS, J. The accused was convicted of a second offense under the Prohibition Law (Laws 1916, c. 146) and his punishment fixed at $5 fine and six months in jail. The writ of error would not have been allowed but for the recent statute, requiring such allowance in all criminal cases, because it is manifest from the petition and record that no error is assigned or appears which would justify a reversal or a review of the case.

[1] One of the assignments of error is that the court overruled a demurrer to the indictment. As the indictment follows the statutory form, which has been adjudged sufficient in Pine & Scott v. Commonwealth, 121 Va. 812, 93 S. E. 652, the question must be considered as settled. The only difference between this indictment and that prescribed by the statute is that, inasmuch as this was a prosecution for a second offense, the indictment so stated. This allegation was made clearly and distinctly as required by the statute, and the demurrer was properly overruled.

[2] Upon motion of the accused the commonwealth was required to file a bill of particulars, and objection is made to this bill as insufficient. This objection rests upon no sufficient ground, for the bill of particulars informs the accused with clearness and certainty of the cause and nature of his accusation. It named the persons to whom, and designated the house, street, and city in which, he was alleged to have illegally sold ardent spirits.

[3] Exception was also taken to the venire facias, upon the allegation that the jury was improperly selected. This assignment is based upon the claim that the act of 1918 (Laws 1918, c. 340) requiring jurors to be drawn from a list furnished by the judge was in effect, whereas in fact that act had been expressly repealed by the act of January 29, 1920 (Acts 1920, p. 4). This later act provided for drawing of juries from lists furnished by the jury commissioners, and the jury in this case was selected strictly in accordance with its provisions; so that the jury was properly constituted.

[4] It is also assigned as error that the court should not have admitted a certified copy of the order of the corporation court of the city of Newport News, showing that the accused had been previously convicted of unlawfully having and transporting ardent spirits; and in this connection it is said in the petition that a certain witness should not have been allowed to testify to what could have been proved by the record of the corporation court of the city of Newport News. Inasmuch as there is no certificate of the evidence, we must disregard this suggestion. We know of no principle of law by which the court would have been justified in refusing to admit the certified copy of the order. Nor do we perceive how the prisoner was prejudiced by its introduction. In the absence of a certificate of the evidence, we must presume the regularity of the proceeding.

[5] Objection is made to the giving of an instruction, but, inasmuch as the evidence is not certified, there is the presumption that there was sufficient evidence in the case upon which to base it; certainly, there is nothing upon the face of the instruction to indicate its illegality.

[6] Again and finally, it is urged that the court erred in not polling each and every member of the jury, the polling of the jury not having been waived by the accused. It is not necessary in this state to poll each juror. When the foreman, in the presence of each member of the jury, returns a verdict in open court, the rule is that if the accused doubts whether each member of the jury has agreed to such verdict, he may have each one polled before it is accepted. If he does not, the clerk, after reading the verdict, addresses the jury and says, "And so say you all." If none of the jury expresses any dissent from such verdict, it is recorded. It is certainly too late, after the verdict has been thus accepted and the jury discharged, to complain that they were not polled, and the court properly overruled the motion to set it aside. Commonwealth v. Gibson, 4 Va. (2 Va. Cas.) 73; Bull v. Commonwealth, 55 Va. (14 Grat.) 633.

The statute (Acts 1920, p. 416) requires this court to allow writs of error in all criminal cases, without reference to their merits. The Virginia courts have for many years been rightfully commended because, while all the natural and constitutional rights of persons accused of crime have been respected, the administration and execution of the criminal laws have been prompt and efficient without any sacrifice of due and orderly procedure. This statute is manifestly retrogressive and harmful in its effects. It is injurious, not only to the public, but also to those litigants rightfully entitled to invoke the jurisdiction of this court for the correction of errors in the trial courts. The injustice to the public grows out of the consequential delay in the administration of justice, as well as the inevitable and unnecessary increase of those criminal expenses which are a charge on the public treasury. The wrong to the other litigants is that the time and attention of the judges of this court which could be better spent and is needed for the consideration and determination of their legal rights must be consumed in hearing futile argument and, in writing opinions (as required by the Constitution) in such cases as this, in which it is clear from the record presented that no right has been denied, and that justice has already been done in the trial court. For those thus rightfully convicted it accomplishes nothing except delay, while it impedes, hinders, and delays all other litigation.

Affirmed.

ATLANTIC COAST LINE R. CO. v. WARRINGTON.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
March 17, 1921.)

1. Stipulations ⇨21—Evidence held not to establish an agreement permitting grounds of demurrer to be filed subsequently to demurrer.

Evidence held insufficient to establish that, on defendant's oral announcement that it demurred to the evidence, it was expressly agreed in open court that the grounds of demurrer should be filed after conclusion of the evidence and retirement of jury, instead of prior thereto, as required by Acts 1912, c. 42.

2. Trial ⇨154 — Plaintiff held not to have waived timely filing of grounds of demurrer to evidence.

Plaintiff, by failure to demand that defendant file the grounds of the demurrer to the evidence at the conclusion of the evidence and before the jury retired, as required by Acts 1912, c. 42, and by expressly agreeing that the argument on the demurrer should be in writing and filed later, did not by implication waive the filing of the grounds at the time required by such statute.

3. Trial ⇨154—Statute as to submission of grounds of demurrer to evidence is mandatory.

Acts 1912, c. 42, requiring grounds of demurrer to evidence to be submitted in writing at the conclusion of the evidence and before the jury retires, is mandatory.

4. Trial ⇨154—Requirement of timely written grounds of demurrer to evidence may be waived.

The submission in writing of grounds of demurrer to evidence at the conclusion of the evidence and before the jury retires, under Acts 1912, c. 42, may be waived by agreement between the parties; but such agreement, being in derogation of the statute, must be clearly established.

Error to Circuit Court, Nansemond County.

Action by S. F. Warrington against the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Mann & Townsend, of Petersburg, for plaintiff in error.

Smith & Smith, of Richmond, and Saunders & Hutton, of Suffolk, for defendant in error.

SAUNDERS, J. This case is brought before us by a writ of error to a judgment of the circuit court of Nansemond county on the petition of the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company, plaintiff in error.

S. F. Warrington, defendant in error (plaintiff below), brought an action of assumpsit against the above company, claiming damages in the sum of $1,200, on account of loss suffered on certain shipments of Irish potatoes, due to the alleged unreasonable delay in the transportation of the same by the said company. The jury trying the issue returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $981.50, which the court refused to set aside. A petition assigning various errors alleged to have occurred in the progress of the trial was thereupon presented to one of the judges of this court, and a writ of error and supersedeas secured.

The petition presents the case of the plaintiff in error, first, on the merits, and, second, on a question of procedure. Reversing the order in which the alleged errors are discussed in the petition, we will first consider and dispose of the question of procedure.

The following statement of facts by the court appears in the record:

"The evidence in this case was given the court and the jury on March 23, 1919. After the evidence was all in, the defendant announced that it demurred to the evidence of the plaintiff.

"The plaintiff did not ask for the grounds of the demurrer, and did not state whether he joined in the demurrer or not, but the case proceeded as if there had been a joinder in the demurrer, and the jury were told by the court to find a verdict for the plaintiff for such sum as would compensate him for the loss he had sustained, if any, and thereupon the question of damages was argued to the jury by counsel for demurrant and demurree, as upon a demurrer to the evidence. After their retirement, the jury returned into court and rendered an unconditional verdict for the sum of $931.50, which the court now certifies should have been a conditional verdict, and subject to the opinion of the court on the demurrer to the evidence. Thereupon the defendant moved the court to set aside the verdict of the jury, upon the ground that it was excessive, which motion was continued, and it was further understood between counsel on both sides that the demurrer should be argued in writing at some later date after the evidence was transcribed, and that the demurrant should file the opening brief, the demurree should file a reply, and the demurrant should file the closing brief. The demurrant filed in the clerk's office of this court on April 17, 1919, a demurrer to the evidence, in writing, with the grounds thereof incorporated therein, and its opening brief in support thereof, and furnished a copy thereof to demurree's counsel. Counsel for demurree filed their reply brief in said clerk's office on the ____ day of ____, 1919, in which they made the point that the demurrer in writing and grounds thereof had not been filed at the trial, as required by law, and that therefore the court could not consider the case upon its merits, but should enter judgment for the demurree upon the verdict of the jury. The demurrant filed its reply brief on the ____ day of ____, 1919.

"It is therefore considered by the court that, the grounds of the demurrer in writing not having been filed by the demurrant as provided by law, the court, without considering the case upon the merits, is of opinion that the law is with the demurree. It is therefore considered by the court that the plaintiff recover of the defendant the sum of $931.50, with interest from March 28, 1919."

When counsel for the railroad company handed Mr. J. R. Saunders, counsel for the plaintiff, the demurrer in writing and copy of his brief, he was at once advised that—

"Objection would be made to the filing of any demurrer, on the ground that counsel for the defendant company, on the day of trial simply 'made an oral statement that they demurred to the evidence, and did not state any reasons in writing.'"

Further that—

"As the law required the demurrant to put his reasons for the demurrer in writing, and he had failed to do so before the court closed, objection would be made to his filing a demurrer at all."

The above appears from a letter of Judge Rawles, of counsel for the defendant company (plaintiff in error) to his associates, Messrs. Mann & Townsend. Quite an interchange of letters followed between these gentlemen, and also between them and counsel for the plaintiff. The latter insist that these letters are not properly a part of the record, and were read over their objection. A letter from Judge McLemore to counsel for the railway company also appears in the record. From the letters that were exchanged between counsel for the plaintiff in error, it appears that they were of the opinion that, as there was an express agreement in open court that the argument upon the demurrer to the evidence should be in writing and should be filed after the evidence had been transcribed, it was a necessary implication from said agreement that the ground of demurrer could be filed at that time. A letter was also written by Messrs. Mann & Townsend, counsel for the plaintiff in error, to Judge McLemore, in which the statement was made that there had been—

"an agreement in open court that the defendant company should file the grounds of demurrer later, and that the demurrer would be argued in writing."

A copy of this letter was sent by defendant's counsel to counsel for the plaintiff. On receipt of this copy Messrs. Smith and Smith wrote at once to Mann & Townsend as follows:

"Gentlemen: We beg to acknowledge copy of letter sent by you to Judge McLemore. * * * and in reply thereto we desire to say that there was no agreement on our part that you should file the grounds of demurrer later, and when Judge Rawles recently handed to Mr. Saunders, of Suffolk, a statement of the grounds of demurrer, he was promptly notified that we would object to the same being filed. The only thing that came up was that the court would hear argument on the demurrer to the evidence later, and we have been waiting to hear from you to that end, and it was only recently that we had any information from you on the subject. A brief of considerable length and grounds of demurrer were then presented for the first time to Mr. Saunders, and we wish it distinctly understood that we shall object strenuously to the filing of the grounds of demurrer at this time, when under the law they can only be filed in writing and the grounds assigned before the jury retires from the bar. The waiver of this right is heard for the first time, and after Judge Rawles has been notified that we would object to the filing of a demurrer to the evidence at this late day."

Messrs. Saunders & Hutton also received a copy of the letter to Judge McLemore, and made the following reply on their part:

"Gentlemen: Yours of June 7, inclosing copy of a letter to Judge Jas. L. McLemore, received. This letter mentions an agreement that grounds of demurrer in the case of S. F. Warrington v. Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company should be filed later. Permit me to say that there was never any agreement that the grounds of demurrer should be so filed; that neither Mr. Mann, Mr. Townsend, nor Judge Rawles requested me to make such an agreement, and I am informed that they did not so request my associate, Mr. J. Sidney Smith.

"The grounds of demurrer were not presented to me until after that term of the circuit court was closed. At the time the paper was handed to me by Judge Rawles, I distinctly told him that we would object to the filing of the demurrer, because I was under the impression that it should have been filed before the argument to the jury, and that we would not waive, nor had we agreed to waive, the filing of any demurrer on any ground therein stated. We shall claim advantage of the statute and the decisions in this state on that point."

Messrs. Mann & Townsend replied as follows to the above letter of Saunders & Hutton:

"We are in receipt of your letter of the 12th instant, and note its contents.

"There certainly can be no question about the fact that there was an express agreement in open court that the argument upon the demurrer to the evidence should be in writing and should be filed later when the evidence had been transcribed. It would have been impossible to file the demurrer in writing at the time of the argument before the jury, because the evidence was a part of the demurrer, and it could not have been inserted in the demurrer until it had been transcribed by the stenographer. It was a necessary implication from the aforesaid agreement that the grounds of demurrer would be filed later. We think this equally clear. Moreover, the plaintiff joined in the demurrer voluntarily and without calling for the grounds of the demurrer, which were simple, and would have prepared and tendered at once at the bar of the court, if called for. Within a few days after the evidence was transcribed by the stenographer, the demurrer, grounds of demurrer, and written memorandum of argument upon the grounds of demurrer were filed, and a copy was furnished the plaintiff's counsel.

"We have demurred to the evidence a great number of times, and in hardly an instance that we can recall has the demurrer and the grounds thereof been filed at the time the damages were argued to the jury.

"In view of the express agreement above mentioned that the demurrer should be argued at a later date, and of the implied agreement that this embraced the filing of the grounds of demurrer, because the written argument was to be based upon the grounds of demurrer, and in view of the fact that the demurrer was joined in voluntarily by plaintiff's counsel without any suggestion that they desired the grounds of demurrer in advance of the written argument thereon, we think it very remarkable that you should state in your letter: 'We shall claim advantage of the statute and the decisions of this state on that point.'

"As the court will doubtless recall what transpired in the courtroom, we have no idea that it will allow the plaintiff to reap any benefit from such a technical objection.

"We are sending copies of this letter to Judge McLemore, Judge Rawles, and Messrs. Smith & Smith."

These citations sufficiently show the relative attitudes of counsel with respect to the alleged agreements in court at the time the defendant demurred to the evidence. The letter of Judge McLemore, referred to supra, is to the following effect:

"Messrs. Mann & Townsend, Attorneys, Petersburg, Va.—Gentlemen: In the matter of Warrington v. A. C. L. Ry. Co., I have decided to overrule the demurrer. Plaintiff's counsel are positive in their statement that they did not waive the right to have the grounds of demurrer filed as required by the statute. With the record silent, I am unable to say they waived the filing, although I had the impression the entire matter would wait for the transcript of the evidence, and that no advantage would be taken of the failure to file the grounds of demurrer that day. It seems to me, in the face of the record, the statute and last construction of it by our court precludes a consideration on the merits.

"I need hardly say I always regret having a case disposed of under such circumstances."

On April 17, 1919, before the term expired, defendant filed its demurrer to the evidence, with the grounds thereof; also its opening brief. The plaintiff filed his reply brief, arguing the case on the merits, but "denying the right of the court to consider the merits, on the ground that the demurrer had not been filed in time." After consideration of the briefs, the court refused to consider the case on its merits, and entered judgment for the plaintiff for the amount of the verdict of the jury, on the ground "that the grounds of the demurrer were not filed in writing at the trial, and that therefore the case could not be heard upon the demurrer to the evidence." To this action of the court the defendant excepted.

From the foregoing citations, it appears that what took place when the evidence was concluded was that counsel for the defendant orally announced that they demurred to the evidence, not stating in writing the grounds of demurrer relied upon. The plaintiff did not ask for the grounds of demurrer, or state whether he joined in the demurrer or not, but the case proceeded as if there had been a joinder in the demurrer, and the jury were told by the court to find a verdict for the plaintiff for such sum as would compensate him for the loss he had sustained, if any. Thereupon the question of damages was argued to the jury by counsel for demurrant and demurree, as upon a demurrer to the evidence. (See statement of facts by the court, supra.) Later it was agreed between counsel for the parties that the demurrer should be argued in writing at a later date after the evidence was transcribed. The letter of Messrs. Mann & Townsend to Judge McLemore states that there was an express agreement in open court that counsel for the defendant should file the grounds of demurrer later. As soon as this claim of an agreement in the respect alleged was brought to the attention of Messrs. Smith & Smith and Saunders & Hutton, they explicitly and positively denied that it was ever made. Further, when Judge Rawles handed Mr. Saunders the de-murrer in writing and copy of brief, he was told by the latter that—

"He would object to the filing of any demurrer, stating that counsel for the company simply made an oral statement in court on the day of trial that they demurred to the evidence, and did not state any reasons in writing."

[1] The court does not certify that any agreement was made before him in relation to giving time within which to state the grounds of demurrer in writing, or in any wise waiving the requirement of the statute, though he had the impression that no advantage would be taken of the failure to file the "grounds of demurrer" at the prescribed time.

We therefore are of opinion that the evidence does not establish "an express agreement in open court that the grounds of demurrer should be filed later."

[2-4] But counsel for plaintiff in error insist that it was a necessary implication, from the express agreement that "the argument upon the demurrer to the evidence should be in writing and filed later," that the grounds of demurrer could also be filed later; in other words, that by necessary implication this secondary agreement was included in the agreement supra. But would this follow? Evidently the trial court, which heard all that took place, did not consider that a waiver, either by express agreement or necessary implication, had been established. The positive statement of the judge is that he is—"unable to say that the plaintiff waived the filing of the grounds of demurrer, and that, in the face of the record, the statute and the last construction of it by our court precludes a consideration on the merits."

The court could hardly have made that statement if it had been of opinion that counsel, by explicit compact or necessary implication, had agreed that the grounds of demurrer could be filed later. When a defendant demurs to the evidence, the statute prescribes what shall be done. The statute is mandatory in this respect, and positive in its statement of the penalty attached to a failure to conform to its mandate. But while we consider that the statute is mandatory upon one party, when the other stands upon his legal rights, we do not mean to say that the parties, by agreement inter se, cannot waive its requirements as to the precise time for filing the grounds of demurrer in writing. Such an agreement can be made, but, as it is in derogation of the statute, it should be clearly made and clearly established. In the case in judgment the plaintiff waited on the defendant to take the steps required by the statute. In order for the defendant to secure the benefits of the statute, it was necessary for it to comply with its requirements. This was a case of parties dealing at arm's length. We would draw the conclusion, from the silence of counsel for the plaintiff in this case, that they had waived their right to have the grounds of demurrer filed as required by the statute, if it appeared that on other and prior trials between them and counsel for the defendant company, upon an oral statement by the latter that they demurred to the evidence, the grounds of demurrer were permitted to be filed on a later day. If such had been the practice hitherto prevailing between counsel, then the silence of counsel for the plaintiff in the instant case under the circumstances supra, would have been misleading, and justified the contention of the defendant that an agreement had been made by implication. But there is nothing of this sort before us. Counsel for the plaintiff simply allowed the defendant to make out its own case, without aid or suggestion. Counsel for the defendant company may have thought, and doubtless did think, that they would be allowed to file their grounds of demurrer later, but they had no right so to conclude from the plaintiff's silence, to the latter's prejudice, or in derogation of his legal rights. If the plaintiff did not ask for the grounds of demurrer, neither did the defendant ask the plaintiff if he waived the requirements of the statute in this regard. Doubtless it was in the mind of counsel demurring to the evidence that they would be allowed to file the grounds of demurrer at a later time, but counsel for the plaintiff apparently did nothing to justify this state of mind. When counsel for defendant announced that they demurred to the evidence, it was not necessary for counsel for the plaintiff to demand the grounds of the demurrer in writing. On the contrary, it was necessary for the defendant to follow the statute, which explicitly prescribes that the—"party tendering the demurrer to the evidence shall state in writing specifically the grounds of demurrer relied on, and the demurree shall not be forced to join in said demurrer until the specific grounds upon which the demurrant relies are stated in writing; nor shall any grounds of demurrer not so specifically stated be considered."

Hence, in order to secure the benefit of the statute, a demurrant must comply with its terms, and, if time is needed for such compliance, must secure that time from the court, by a postponement, or by agreement with opposing counsel. The record does not show in the instant case compliance with the statutory requirements at the time the motion was made, or that time was secured for later compliance, either from the court or by agreement with adversary counsel.

Petitioner contends that the agreement to argue the demurrer carries by implication the agreement to allow the grounds to be filed later, since, otherwise there would be but little to argue. But the agreement speaks for itself. It was an agreement to argue in writing the demurrer as submitted by the defendant. The extent of that argument would depend upon the ruling of the court.

Should the court deny the subsequent effort of the defendant to file the grounds of demurrer, there would be but little room for argument. But, should the court hold that under the statute the grounds not filed at the time the defendant demurred could be filed at a later day of the court, the argument would be directed to the case on the merits. Hence the agreement was in substance an agreement to argue by briefs whatever under the ruling of the court could be argued on the defendant's demurrer, and the fact that in the result the court, upon the state of the record, excluded the grounds of demurrer tendered by the defendant, is not a determining factor in the construction of the agreement that the—"argument upon the demurrer to the evidence should be in writing, and filed later when the evidence had been transcribed."

The statute on the subject of demurrers to evidence, and from which citation has been made, is the statute of February 19, 1912 (Acts 1912, p. 75), and is as follows:

"In all suits or motions hereafter, when the evidence is concluded before the court and jury, the party tendering the demurrer to evidence shall state in writing specifically the grounds of demurrer relied on, and the demurree shall not be forced to join in the said demurrer until the specific grounds upon which the demurrant relies are stated in writing; nor shall any grounds of demurrer not thus specifically stated be considered, except that the court may, in its discretion, allow the demurrant to withdraw the demurrer; may allow the joinder in demurrer to be withdrawn by the demurree, and new evidence admitted, or a non-suit to be taken until the jury retire from the bar."

This act has been construed by this court in the cases of McMenamin v. Southern Ry. Co., 115 Va. 822, 80 S. E. 596, Saunders v. Southern Ry. Co., 117 Va. 396, 84 S. E. 650, and Virginia I. C. & C. Co. v. Asbury's Adm'r., 117 Va. 683, 86 S. E. 148.

In the Saunders case, 117 Va. 399, 84 S. E. 651, the court said:

"These statutory provisions are mandatory and preclude the idea of jurisdiction to consider a demurrer to evidence, unless the grounds of such demurrer are specifically stated in writing. The statute is a wise one that should be upheld and enforced as it is written. Its salutary purpose would be defeated and the statute practically abrogated if it were permissible to modify it by engrafting exceptions upon it."

And on page 400 of the same case (84 S. E. 651) we find the following:

"The grounds of the demurrer to the evidence filed by the defendant company, not having been specifically stated in writing, as required by statute, we are of opinion that the court was without jurisdiction to consider the same."

As stated supra, the statute plainly requires that the grounds of demurrer must be in writing, and submitted at the conclusion of the evidence and before the jury retires from the bar. The grounds of demurrer were not submitted in writing in the case in judgment, and there was no agreement between counsel waiving this requirement, or any postponement by the court of the case to afford opportunity to prepare and submit such grounds.

Plaintiff in error cites the case of Du Pont v. Smith, 249 Fed. 403, 161 C. C. A. 377, but that case is not in conflict with the conclusions that we have reached in the instant case. In the Du Pont case the court did not consider that the action which it took was precluded by the statute. This appears from the following citation from the opinion:

"We have the strong conviction that the extreme penalty of dismissal of a cause without a hearing on the merits should not be imposed upon a litigant for the inadvertence of his counsel, except in flagrant cases of neglect, or where the court is compelled by statute or clearly established practice to do so."

The time fixed in this case for the filing of the bill of exceptions was by an order of court, and the court held that—

"The evidence of consent to the allowance of the bill of exceptions, and waiver of the time, was very strong."

Judge Pritchard elaborately dissented.

In the case before us, but for the restraining and mandatory provisions of the statute, prescribing how a demurrant shall proceed, we would be disposed to disregard technicalities and decide this case on its merits. But when a statute plainly prescribes what must be done to enjoy its benefits, and the penalties for nonconformity, the courts are constrained to enforce the law as it is written. The trial court was more intimately in touch with what passed in its presence and within its hearing than this court can possibly be from the cold and formal record. That court could not certify that an express agreement had been made to waive the requirements of the statute, nor could it derive an agreement by implication to that effect from the agreement actually made. After setting out the facts the trial court announced the following conclusion:

"It is therefore considered by the court that, the grounds of demurrer in writing not having been filed by the demurrant as required by law, the court, without considering the case on the merits, is of opinion that the law is with the demurree. It is therefore considered by the court that the plaintiff recover of the defendant the sum of $921.50, with interest thereon from March 28, 1912."

In that finding this court concurs, and the judgment of the trial court is therefore affirmed.

Affirmed.

BARNARD v. GARDNER INV. CORPORATION.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. March 17, 1921.)

1. Principal and agent §33 — Contract of agency revocable by principal at will, unless coupled with interest based on consideration.

A contract expressly creating the relationship of principal and agent, unless coupled with an interest based on valuable consideration, is generally revocable by the principal at will.

2. Brokers §44 — Principal may revoke contract of agency unsupported by consideration at any time prior to sale.

A real estate broker's contract of agency may be revoked in good faith by his principal any time prior to sale; the purported consideration of $1 for the contract not having been paid.

3. Brokers §88(5) — Fraud inducing agency contract held jury question.

In a real estate broker's action for commissions on a sale made after revocation of the agency by the principal, evidence that the broker, by fraud and misrepresentation as to the value of the property and the price obtainable therefor, induced the principal to enter into the agency contract, held sufficient to justify the submission of the issue to the jury.

4. Brokers §6 — Fiduciary relation exists between real estate agents and their clients.

Real estate agents occupy a fiduciary relation to their clients, and so long as that relation continues the agent is under a legal obligation, as well as under a high moral duty, to give his principal loyal service and the benefit of information as to the property entrusted to him for sale; the principal being frequently at a disadvantage, and hence entitled to the utmost frankness, fidelity, and fair dealing from the agent.

Error to Circuit Court of City of Norfolk.

Action by the Gardner Investment Corporation against Alice T. Barnard. Verdict for defendant was set aside, and judgment in favor of plaintiff entered, and defendant brings error. Reversed and rendered.

Rumble & Rumble, of Norfolk, for plaintiff in error.

Jas. G. Martin, of Norfolk, for defendant in error.

PRENTIS, J. Gardner Investment Corporation, engaged in the real estate brokerage business, through its president, J. W. Gardner, solicited and obtained from Alice T. Barnard the following contract:

"June 27, 1919.

"To Gardner Investment Corporation:

"For and in consideration of one dollar ($1.00), the receipt of which is acknowledged, I hereby appoint you exclusive agent to make sale of the real property herein described as 715 Boissevain avenue, for the price of $17,000 upon the following terms: $—— cash; $—— secured by mortgage thereon for —— year at —— per cent. And you are hereby authorized to accept a deposit to be applied on the purchase price, and to execute a binding contract for sale on my behalf.

"In case the above described property is sold or disposed of within the time specified, I agree to make the purchaser a good and sufficient warranty deed to the same, and to furnish a complete abstract of title, if required; and it is further agreed that you shall have and may retain from the proceeds arising from such sale no commission on the above price and 100 per cent. of all of the consideration for which said property is sold over and above price above specified, amount for which said property may be sold.

"This contract to continue until July 27, 1919, and thereafter until terminated by me giving you as agent one day's notice in writing."

While the contract recites the consideration of $1 the evidence shows that the recital of such consideration is in print on one of the blanks of the company, and that no consideration was either paid, considered, or discussed. Before any sale of the property had been made, Mrs. Barnard wrote this letter to the company:

"715 Boissevain Ave.,

"Norfolk, Va., July 3, 1919.

"Gardner Investment Corporation, 330-333 Seaboard Bank Building, Norfolk, Va.

"Gentlemen: Having reconsidered the matter of selling my home on Boissevain Ave., I beg you to allow me to withdraw the option on said property. Thanking you for your kindness, I am "Very truly yours,

"[Signed] Alice T. Barnard."

On July 5th, when Gardner visited the property, Mrs. Barnard refused to allow the prospective purchaser, who accompanied him, to enter the house or to inspect its interior, and discussed with Gardner her change of purpose and desire to revoke the authority of the company under the written contract. This was on Saturday, but, notwithstanding these clear indications of her intention to revoke the agency, thereafter, on Monday, July 7th, the company, through Gardner, undertook to exercise the authority conferred by the agreement by selling the property to D. T. I'Anson for $18,000. This purchaser sued Mrs. Barnard for specific performance of the contract, but for reasons satisfactory to himself dismissed his suit. Then the company instituted its action in assumpsit against her for the recovery of $1,000 as its compensation for finding such purchaser, claiming under the contract. The defendant pleaded non assumpsit at the trial; there was a verdict in her favor, which, upon motion of the company, was set aside; thereupon judgment was entered in favor of the company for $1,000, and of this judgment she is here complaining.

1. One of the questions raised is whether or not the defendant could prove by parol that notwithstanding the recital of a consideration in the agreement there was in fact no consideration, and hence that the contract was revocable by her will. The trial court excluded this evidence, and refused to instruct the jury that the defendant had such power to revoke. It is not controverted by the company that an acknowledgement of a consideration in a written contract may be denied for many purposes, but it is claimed that it cannot be denied as to this contract because the effect of such denial is to nullify it.

One of the cases cited to support this view is Lawrence v. McCalmont, 43 U. S. (2 How.) 452, 11 L. Ed. 366, but what is said in that case is said with reference to a written guaranty of credit, and the court held that the guarantor, having expressly acknowledged the receipt of consideration in the contract, could not prove the lack of consideration for the purpose of showing that she was not thereby bound.

The other case chiefly relied upon is Watkins v. Robertson, 105 Va. 284, 54 S. E. 33, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1194, 115 Am. St. Rep. 880. That case involved a written option under seal, whereby the owner of certain shares of capital stock of a corporation agreed with another to sell him such stock at a fixed price, to be delivered if the purchase price was paid on or before a certain date named therein. It was an option to buy, such as is commonly used, and the court there held that the owner was estopped to deny that such option was based upon a valuable consideration, in view of the fact that the contract itself recited such consideration, and for the reason that to permit such a denial would be to nullify the contract. So far as we are advised, however, it has never been held that it is not permissible to introduce evidence to contradict such a recital for any proper purpose in a contract not under seal.

Stephen's Digest of Evidence (2d Ed.) p. 220, on this subject, states these among the exceptions to the rule excluding oral evidence for the purpose of varying or contradicting a written contract:

"Fraud, intimidation, illegality, want of due execution, want of capacity in any contracting party, the fact that it is wrongly dated, want or failure of consideration, or mistake in fact or law, or any other matter which, if proved, would produce any effect upon the validity of any document, or of any part of it, or which would entitle any person to any judgment, decree, or order relating thereto."

Statements to the same effect, fully supported by authority, may be found in 2 Elliott on Contracts, § 1642; 1 Greenleaf on Evidence (16th Ed.) § 284.

[1] In this case the evidence was not introduced for the purpose of nullifying the contract, but in order to show its true character. The paper itself is in express terms a contract between an agent and a principal. Such a contract, unless coupled with an interest, based upon valuable consideration, is generally revocable by the principal at will, and it is not necessary to cite authority to establish this proposition. If in fact there was no consideration, this fixes the true nature of such a contract; establishes it according to its true intent, purpose, and meaning, but does not nullify it.

[2] We think, therefore, that the evidence should have been admitted, and that the jury should have been instructed, in accordance with the request of the defendant, that she had the right to revoke the contract in good faith at any time prior to a sale. The refusal of the trial court to take this view is reversible error.

The case of Perrow v. Rixey, 119 Va. 192, 89 S. E. 101, is in our view conclusive of this question. The only difference between that case and this is that there the written agreement did not recite a consideration. It did fix the net price and allowed the agent 30 days in which to make a sale; but the court held that, inasmuch as it was an agency to sell land, which was neither coupled with an interest nor founded upon a valuable consideration, it might be terminated by the principal at will on giving notice, in good faith, before the agent found a purchaser, and that "coupled with an interest," under such circumstances, means an interest in the land itself, as distinguished from an interest in the proceeds of sale.

The contract in this case, illuminated as it is by the parol evidence showing that there was no consideration therefor, is identical in its legal effect with the contract which was involved in the case last cited.

2. The case may also be considered from another aspect, with the same result. There was evidence to the effect that Gardner, when he solicited the contract, told Mrs. Barnard, in response to her statement that she thought she ought to get at least $17,500 for the property; that she would never get it, that he did not think she would get $17,000, because it was not worth so much; that on July 3d he, the president of the company, came to her house and tried to buy the property for $15,000; and that on the same date he wrote to one Duncan, who had asked him for a description of the property, that the value of the ground was $12,500, of the building $20,000, and the total value of the property $32,500, while three real estate agents, who were not contradicted, testified that at the time a conservative estimate of the value of the property would be from $25,000 to $30,000.

This being the state of the evidence, the trial court instructed the jury as follows:

"The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence that J. W. Gardner, president of the plaintiff corporation, was on June 27, 1919, a dealer in real estate, familiar with real estate values in the city of Norfolk, and that he then knew the value of the defendant's property mentioned in the contract sued on in this case; that said Gardner, in order to induce the defendant to enter into the said contract, represented to her in substance and effect that said property was then worth not to exceed $17,000 and that said sum was as much as she could possibly sell it for, and if the jury also believes from the evidence that defendant was not familiar with real estate values in said city and did not know the value of said property; that she relied upon the representations so made to her by said Gardner, and on the faith thereof entered into and signed the said contract authorizing said plaintiff to sell said property at the price of $17,000; and if the jury further believes from the evidence that said property was then in fact worth much more than $17,000, and that that fact was then known to the said Gardner, then the said contract was not binding on the defendant, and the jury should find for the defendant. When fraud or misrepresentation is relied on as a defense, it must be proved by clear and convincing evidence."

[3, 4] So that the only issue submitted to the jury upon that evidence and instruction was whether or not the defendant was relieved from the obligation of her contract by the fraud and misrepresentation of the company's agent in inducing her to enter into it. While the evidence of intentional fraud may be doubtful and unconvincing, at the same time there was evidence sufficient to justify the submission of the issue thus raised to the jury. Real estate agents occupy a fiduciary relation to their clients, and so long as that relation continues the agent is under a legal obligation, as well as a high moral duty, to give to his principal loyal service and the benefit of his information as to the property entrusted to him for sale. Under such circumstances the principal is frequently at a disadvantage, and hence is entitled to the utmost frankness, fidelity, and fair dealing from the agent. It is not surprising that under this very proper instruction, and with this evidence, the jury found in favor of the defendant. The trial court, however, set aside their verdict, and this is also assigned as error. What we have said is sufficient to indicate that we think the court's first impression, when giving the instruction, was correct, and that afterwards, when the verdict was set aside, apparently upon the ground that the instruction was not justified by the evidence, the defendant was denied a substantial right.

Our conclusion, therefore, is to reverse the judgment, which was in favor of the company, and to enter judgment here upon the verdict in favor of the plaintiff in error.

Reversed.

AMBROSE v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
March 17, 1921.)

1. Criminal law §1159(3)—Verdict on conflicting evidence will not be disturbed.

A verdict on conflicting evidence will not be disturbed.

2. Larceny §1—Taking of husband's automobile with consent of wife, to obtain funds to elope with her was larceny.

Where defendant, who was planning to elope with a married woman, as part of the scheme, with her consent, took the husband's automobile, intending to sell it to obtain funds to finance the elopement, he was guilty of larceny.

3. Criminal law §834(3)—Modification of instruction in prosecution for stealing automobile proper.

In a prosecution for the theft of an automobile, where defendant contended that it belonged to a married woman, and that she entrusted it to him for sale, and requested an instruction that, if such woman intrusted the machine to him for sale and if not to return it, and that, he having failed to sell the car, he was returning it, he could not be convicted, an addition that, if defendant received the automobile fraudulently and was knowingly aiding the woman in depriving her husband of his property, they should find him guilty, was not error.

4. Criminal law §829(1)—Refusal of requested instruction covered by one given not error.

The refusal of a requested instruction covered by one given is not error.

5. Criminal law §823(4)—Error in instruction in prosecution for larceny harmless.

In a prosecution for the theft of an automobile which defendant claimed belonged to a married woman who had intrusted it to him, error in the state's instruction, to the effect that an oral gift of the automobile by the husband to his wife, etc., would not pass title, was harmless, where the instruction later informed the jury that though the woman was not the owner, yet if defendant honestly thought she was, and acted on that belief, he could not be convicted.

Error to Hastings Court of Portsmouth.

F. M. Ambrose was convicted of larceny and he brings error. Affirmed.

R. H. Bagby and Jno. W. Happer, both of Portsmouth, for plaintiff in error.

Jno. R. Saunders, Atty. Gen., and J. D. Hank, Jr., Asst. Atty. Gen., for the Commonwealth.

BURKS, J. F. M. Ambrose, the plaintiff in error, was convicted of stealing an automobile, the property of F. J. Schmoele, of the value of $1,000, and sentenced to confinement in the penitentiary for two years. A writ of error was awarded to the judgment of conviction, and we are asked to review it.

The petition for the writ of error states that from the record two questions arise:

"(1) Was the automobile alleged to have been stolen the property of F. J. Schmoele or the property of his wife, Holmes Pretlow Schmoele? and

"(2) If it was the property of F. J. Schmoele, could petitioner be legally convicted of larceny under the facts in this case?"

[1] Without going into the details of the evidence, it is sufficient to say that F. J. Schmoele, a witness for the commonwealth, testified positively that the automobile was his property. His wife testified for the defendant that it was her property, and that she delivered it to the defendant and asked him to sell it for her. The verdict of the jury settled the conflict in favor of the commonwealth, and that verdict cannot be disturbed.

[2] In answer to the second question propounded in the petition, it may be said that the evidence was such that the jury was well warranted in believing that the defendant and Mrs. Schmoele, wife of F. J. Schmoele, had planned an elopement and partially carried it out, and that the sale of the automobile was a part of their scheme to finance their plan. If, therefore, the automobile was the property of F. J. Schmoele, the defendant could "be legally convicted of larceny" thereof, and there is ample evidence in the record to sustain his conviction.

The defendant asked for three instructions which the court refused to give. The refusal to give his instruction No. 3 is not assigned as error.

[3] Instruction No. 1 was as follows:

"The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence that the defendant received the automobile mentioned in the indictment from Mrs. Schmoele, the wife of F. J. Schmoele, to sell for her under instructions to pay to her the money from the sale, if made, and if not made to return to her the automobile, and, not having made the sale he went to Raleigh, N. C., where Mrs. Schmoele then was, for the purpose of returning the car, then they must find the defendant not guilty."

This instruction the court refused to give as asked, but added the following:

"But if they find from the evidence that the defendant received the automobile fraudulently, and was knowingly aiding Mrs. Schmoele in permanently depriving her husband of his property, then they should find the defendant guilty; but the jury are further told that, in order to convict the accused, they must find him guilty under the evidence beyond all reasonable doubt."

There was no error in making the addition, which correctly stated the law.

[4] Instruction No. 2 was as follows:

"The court instructs the jury that they cannot convict the accused, unless they believed from the evidence beyond all reasonable doubt that he came into possession of the car in question by fraudulent means, or that he intended to convert it to his own use."

If it be conceded that the instruction correctly stated the law, it was not error to refuse it, as it was fully covered by instruction No. 4, given for the commonwealth. It is not desirable to multiply instructions, and is not error to refuse even a correct instruction on a point upon which the jury has already been fully and correctly instructed.

[5] Exception was taken to the giving of instruction No. 4 at the instance of the commonwealth. This instruction was as follows:

"The court instructs the jury that chattels and personal property, when the donor and donee reside together, can only be conveyed by deed or will, and that if they believe from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that F. J. Schmoele made an oral gift of the automobile in this case to his wife, with whom he was living at the time, it did not operate to pass the title, and the property remained that of F. J. Schmoele; but the court further instructs the jury that 'intent' is the essence of the crime of larceny, and if they believe that the defendant honestly thought the automobile was the property of Mrs. Schmoele, and that she had full right to dispose of the same and receive the proceeds, and that he was not merely aiding her in wrongfully carrying away her husband's property, and that he was without guilty knowledge of any wrongful or illegal purpose on the part of Mrs. Schmoele towards her husband in placing the automobile in his possession, then they should acquit him; but if they believe from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant acted with dishonest intent in carrying the automobile away, thereby fraudulently contriving to deprive the said F. J. Schmoele permanently of his property, then they should convict him."

The sole objection to this instruction is that the jury were misled by the statement in the first part of the instruction:

"That if they believe from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that F. J. Schmoele made an oral gift of the automobile in this case to his wife, with whom he was living at the time, it did not operate to pass title, and the property remained that of F. J. Schmoele."

Conceding the error of the words quoted, the jury could not have been misled by their use, for the instruction proceeds at once to tell the jury that, although Mrs. Schmoele was not the owner, yet if the defendant honestly thought she was, and acted on that belief, they should acquit him.

We find no error to the prejudice of the plaintiff in error, and the judgment of the hustings court will therefore be affirmed.

Affirmed.

WHITE v. WHITE.(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
March 17, 1921.)

1. Libel and slander §94(5)—Plea of justification to part only of defamatory charge not a complete defense.

A plea of justification in a slander suit cannot operate as a complete defense if it pleads the truth of a part only of the defamatory charge.

2. Libel and slander §55 — Defendant may justify one or more of separate libelous or slanderous charges.

Where the defamatory matter is divisible and contains several distinct libelous or slanderous charges, defendant may justify one or more of the separate charges.

3. Libel and slander §94(5)—If part of charge sought to be justified is actionable in itself, it need not be of a different offense from the remainder.

On a plea of justification in a slander suit to part only of the defamatory charge, the imputation covered need not be of a different offense from that imputed by the rest of the words charged, provided the defamatory matter is itself actionable.

4. Libel and slander §94(5)—Justification to a part of charge not in itself actionable not a good plea.

In a slander suit a plea of justification to part of the charge not in itself actionable held not a good plea.

5. Libel and slander §94(5)—Charge covered by plea of justification held not severable as actionable in itself.

A statement by defendant in a slander suit relative to a man's visit to plaintiff, who was a married woman, and that defendant asked her about it, "and she acknowledged it," held not to convey any meaning of insult or tend to violence and breach of the peace, and therefore was not in itself actionable, and hence not severable from the rest of the charge under a plea of justification.

6. Libel and slander §94(4)—Plea neither denying plaintiff's construction was true nor justifying words as used in ordinary meaning held insufficient.

In a slander suit a plea of justification to alleged charge of adultery neither denying that plaintiff's declaration puts the true construction on the admitted words nor justifying them as having been used only in their natural and ordinary meaning held insufficient.

7. Libel and slander §54—"Truth" admissible as defense is truth in sense words charged ordinarily understood.

The truth which is admitted as a defense in a slander suit is the truth of the alleged words in substance and in fact in the sense in which they were used and intended to be understood or were reasonably understood in accordance with the usual construction and common acceptation of the meaning of the words as used, in the light of all the surrounding circumstances.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Truth.]

8. Libel and slander §100(3)—Truth as defense not admissible under general issue.

Truth of defamatory matter charged in a declaration in a libel suit is not admissible under a plea of the general issue.

9. Appeal and error §867(2) — Illegal evidence on which new trial was granted may be complained of by plaintiff in error.

The rule that on a writ of error to an order setting aside a verdict and awarding a new trial plaintiff in error cannot, to have such order reversed, complain in the appellate court of the admission of illegal evidence, improper instructions or error in the reception of a special plea on which the jury gave no recovery over held inapplicable, where the trial court set aside the verdict on inadmissible evidence establishing the truth of the matter charged in a slander suit.

10. Trial §296(7)—Instruction held not erroneous as imposing undue burden of proof in view of another instruction given.

In a slander suit an instruction for defendant if words covered by plea of justification "and such inferences and insinuations as may be drawn therefrom according to the usual construction and common acceptation of such language" were true held not erroneous in view of another instruction that the words must be construed in their plain and popular sense.

11. Libel and slander §112(2) — Evidence supporting finding that defendant intentionally charged plaintiff with adultery.

In a slander suit based on a charge of adultery, evidence held to sustain a verdict that the slanderous statements were made by defendant with the intention to charge adultery.

12. Evidence §593—Setting aside verdict in slander case on ground that evidence established truth of charge erroneous where such evidence inadmissible.

In a slander suit, where a special plea of justification as to part of the charge was improperly admitted, and the truth of the defamatory words was inadmissible under the remaining pleadings, it was error for the trial court to set aside a verdict for plaintiff on the ground that the truth of the words admitted by the special plea was established by the evidence.

Error to Circuit Court, Accomack County.

Action by Mamie C. White against Thomas Bernard White. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed and rendered.

This is an action for slander. It was tried in the court below on the second and sixth counts of the declaration, which charged the speaking and publishing by the defendant of insulting words under the statute.

The plaintiff in error was the plaintiff, and the defendant in error the defendant, in the court below, and they will be herein-after referred to as plaintiff and defendant in accordance with their positions as parties in that court.

The defendant pleaded not guilty and filed a special plea of justification as to the speaking and publishing of a part of the words set out in the second count of the declaration.

Thereupon the plaintiff demurred to said special plea, and, on the grounds that such plea "is not coextensive and as broad as the defamatory charge made in the declaration [and] attempts to justify a part of the charge only which in itself imports no slander and omits no attempt to justify the slanderous part of the said charge," moved the court to reject such plea.

Such demurrer and motion were overruled. Whereupon there was a trial by jury, which resulted in a verdict for the plaintiff for the sum of $1,000 damages. Thereupon the defendant moved the court to set aside the verdict and grant him a new trial on the grounds that the verdict was contrary to the law and the evidence, for misdirection by the court of the jury, and also because the damages awarded by the verdict were excessive. This motion the court sustained upon the grounds that the verdict was contrary to the law and the evidence, and because the verdict was excessive in the amount of the damages awarded. The court refused, however, to sustain such motion on the ground of misdirection of the jury. The opinion of the court, giving the reasons for such action, is in writing, filed and made a part of the record.

Thereafter, upon the calling of the case for a new trial, neither the plaintiff nor defendant demanding a jury, and the plaintiff having declined to introduce any evidence, judgment was entered by the court for the defendant, and the plaintiff brings error.

The assignments of error of the plaintiff (so far as material to the decision of the case) are mentioned below in the opinion of the court.

The defendant assigns as cross-error the action of the trial court in giving a certain instruction which appears below in the opinion of the court.

The insulting words alleged in the second count of the declaration as having been spoken and published by the defendant, together with the innuendoes there alleged, are as follows:

"'Edgar Smith and Mamie' (meaning the plaintiff) 'were sitting in the dining room' (meaning the dining room of plaintiff's home) 'talking, and the children' (meaning plaintiff's children) 'were in the cook room' (meaning the cook room of plaintiff's home), 'and afterwards the children come in the dining room, and I' (meaning the defendant) 'had not been home long before the children' (meaning the plaintiff's children) 'come to my house' (meaning the defendant's house). 'I' (meaning the defendant) 'asked the children' (meaning plaintiff's children) 'where their mother' (meaning the plaintiff) 'was, and they' (meaning the plaintiff's children) 'said she' (meaning the plaintiff) 'had gone over to Mrs. Sallie White's. Then I' (meaning the defendant) 'goes back' (meaning to plaintiff's house) 'to see if Irving' (meaning plaintiff's husband, Irving White) 'had come home about putting the hay away. When I' (meaning the defendant) 'got there' (meaning to plaintiff's house) 'I' (meaning the defendant) 'heard somebody in the hall' (meaning the hall of plaintiff's home). 'All at once Smith' (meaning Edgar Smith) 'come out of the hall door' (meaning the hall door of plaintiff's home) 'and went down town way. Mamie' (meaning the plaintiff) 'blew the light cut and went over to Mrs. Sallie White's. We' (meaning the defendant and his wife) 'sent for her' (meaning the plaintiff) 'and asked her' (meaning the plaintiff) 'about it, and she' (meaning the plaintiff) 'acknowledged it' (meaning the plaintiff acknowledged she had committed adultery with Edgar Smith), 'and got down on her' (meaning the plaintiff's) 'knees to us' (meaning the defendant and his wife) 'and said it was the first time she' (meaning the plaintiff) 'ever did it' (meaning it was the first time plaintiff ever committed adultery with Edgar Smith) 'and would never do it again' (meaning the plaintiff would never commit adultery with Edgar Smith again), 'and she' (meaning the plaintiff) 'said she' (meaning the plaintiff) 'had rather see Irving' (meaning the plaintiff's husband, Irving White) 'dead than for him' (meaning the plaintiff's husband, Irving White) 'to know it, and she' (meaning the plaintiff) 'promised not to let him' (meaning Edgar Smith) 'come any more.' (Italics supplied.)

The plea of justification embraces only that part of the words and innuendoes above set out which are not italicized. The plea alleges the truth of such part of such words, merely with the meaning that they constituted a true narrative of what is stated by the words as having occurred and as having been said, but does not allege that they were used with that meaning only, nor deny that the declaration put the true construction on them.

The insulting words alleged in the sixth count of the declaration as having been spoken and published by the defendant, together with the innuendoes there alleged, are as follows:

"'He' (meaning the defendant) 'went over there' (meaning plaintiff's home) 'when the children' (meaning plaintiff's children) 'were sent to his' (meaning defendant's) 'house. He' (meaning the defendant) 'suspicioned something was wrong, the curtains were down, and he' (meaning the defendant) 'saw motions. That old snooter' (meaning Edgar Smith) 'was hanging around there' (meaning plaintiff's home)."

S. James Turlington, of Accomac, for plaintiff in error.

Roy D. White, of Parksley, and Stewart K. Powell, of Onancock, for defendant in error.

SIMS, J. (after stating the facts as above). The questions presented for our decision by the assignments of error will be disposed of in their order as stated below.

1. Is or is not the plea of justification interposed by the defendant a good plea?

This question must be answered in the negative.

It is urged in behalf of the plaintiff that the plea is bad in two particulars: (1) Because it admitted a part only of the defamatory matter charged in the second count of the declaration, and so was not as broad as the charges; and (2) it does not justify the admitted words with their natural and ordinary meaning according to the usual construction and common acceptance of such language, nor deny that the plaintiff's declaration puts the true construction on such words, and hence also is not as broad as the charge of such words in the declaration.

With respect to the first-mentioned particular, this should be said:

[1] It is true that a plea of justification cannot operate "as a complete defense" to the action if it pleads the truth of a part only of the defamatory charge. 25 Cyc. § 3, p. 460; note in 31 L. R. A. (N. S.), p. 138; Gault v. Babbitt, 1 Ill. App. 130; Woodruff v. Richardson, 20 Conn. 238; Sanford v. Gaddis, 13 Ill. 329; Thompson v. Pioneer Press Co., 37 Minn. 285, 33 N. W. 856; Fero v. Ruscoe, 4 N. Y. 162.

[2] But "where the defamatory matter is divisible and contains several distinct libelous or slanderous charges, defendant may justify one or more of the separate charges." 25 Cyc. (K) p. 464; Townshend on Slander and Libel (4th Ed.) pp. 311, 319; note in 31 L. R. A. (N. S.) p. 137; Odgers on Libel and Slander (1st Am. Ed.) p. 176; and other authorities above cited.

As said in Odgers on Libel and Slander at page 176:

"So he may justify as to one part, and demur or plead privilege as to the rest, or deny that he ever spoke or published the rest of the words. But in all these cases the part selected must be severable from the rest so as to be intelligible by itself and must also convey a distinct and separate imputation against the plaintiff."

[3] The imputation referred to in the quotation just made need not be of a different offense from that or those imputed by the rest of the words charged. The defendant may justify as to any part of the defamatory matter which is of itself actionable.

[4, 5] Therefore the plea in this case would not be bad merely because it is not as broad as the whole of the charges in the second count of the declaration. It does not purport to be that broad. It does not interpose a complete defense to the action, but only a partial defense, to wit, to the action in so far as based on that part of the words charged which are admitted by the plea to have been spoken. This would be permissible if such words were of themselves actionable. It is plain, however, from a reading of them that these words do not of themselves, without the innuendo following them, which is not covered by the plea, convey any meaning of insult or tend to violence and breach of the peace, and hence they were not of themselves actionable. It is only when they are read in connection with the residue of the defamatory words charged in that count of the declaration that their meaning of insult and their tendency to violence and breach of the peace become apparent. Therefore the words covered by the special plea, in the sense in which they were admitted by the plea to have been spoken, were not severable from the rest of the words charged in the second count, and hence the plea was bad.

[6] We are also of opinion that the plea is bad in the second particular urged against it in behalf of the plaintiff above mentioned, namely, in that it does not either deny that the plaintiff's declaration puts the true construction on the admitted words, or justify them as having been used only with their natural and ordinary meaning according to the usual construction and common acceptance of such language.

In Odgers on Libel and Slander, at page 176, this is said:

"Again, where the words are laid with an innuendo in the statement of claim, the defendant may justify the words either with or without the meaning alleged in such innuendo, or he may do both; that is, he may deny that the plaintiff puts the true construction on his words, and assert that, if taken in their natural and ordinary meaning, his words will be found to be true, or he may boldly allege that the words are true even in the worst signification that can be put upon them. But it seems that a defendant may not put a meaning of his own on the words, and say that in that sense they are true; for, if he deny that the meaning assigned to his words in the statement of claim is the correct one, he must be content to leave it to the jury at the trial to determine what meaning the words naturally bear."

[7] The truth which is admitted as a defense in such an action as this is the truth of the alleged words in substance and in fact, in the sense in which they were used and intended to be understood, or were reasonably understood in accordance with the usual construction and common acceptance of the meaning of the words as used, in the light of all the surrounding circumstances.

We are therefore of opinion that the trial court should not have admitted the plea of justification to be filed over the aforesaid objections of the plaintiff.

[8] As the only other plea of the defendant was the plea of the general issue, no evidence of the truth of any of the defamatory matter charged in the declaration was properly admissible in evidence; and we must consider the record as if there was therein no issue and no evidence upon the question of the truth of the defamatory words charged in the declaration.

[9] It is urged before us in behalf of the defendant that, notwithstanding the filing of the defendant's plea of justification, as the verdict was in favor of the plaintiff, and the latter is content with that verdict as rendered, as is shown by the plaintiff's seeking on appeal to maintain such verdict, the defendant is entitled to the benefit of the rule established by the following authorities, namely: Ruffner v. Hill, 31 W. Va. 428, 7 S. E. 13; 2 Barton's Law Pr. (2d Ed.) pp. 724, 725; Chapman v. Va. Real Estate Co., 96 Va. 177, 31 S. E. 74; Sutherland v. Wampler, 119 Va. 800, 89 S. E. 875—which rule bars the plaintiff's right to have the appellate court consider whether there was error in the action of the trial court in admitting such plea to be filed. These authorities establish the general and correct rule that, upon a writ of error to an order of a trial court setting aside the verdict of a jury and awarding a new trial, the plaintiff in error cannot, for the purpose of having such order reversed, complain in the appellate court that the trial court admitted illegal evidence, or gave the jury improper instructions, or erred in the reception of a special plea of the defendant on which the jury gave no recovery over against the plaintiff. But, as appears from such authorities, this general rule is applicable only where it is clear that the plaintiff in error has not been prejudiced by the rulings of the court with respect to these matters. Where, as in the case before us, it appears from the opinion of the trial court, as will be hereinafter mentioned, that he set aside the verdict in question solely as the result of his conclusions from what he considered was the evidence in the case on the question of the truth or falsehood of certain of the defamatory words charged in the declaration, when, as we must regard the case as aforesaid, there was no issue and no evidence whatsoever on this subject which could have been properly considered by the trial court, it is at once apparent that the general rule aforesaid invoked by the defendant is inapplicable.

We will next consider the question arising on the cross-assignment of error of the defendant to the action of the trial court with respect to instructions, namely:

2. Was there error in the action of the trial court in giving the following instruction to the jury on the first trial of the case, to wit:

"Instruction 01. The court instructs the jury that, if they believe from the evidence that the language and words justified by the defendant's special plea of justification, and such inferences and insinuations as may be drawn therefrom according to the usual construction and common acceptance of such language, were true, then they must find for the defendant to the extent of such special plea." (Italics supplied.)

The defendant asked for this instruction without the words which we have italicized.

The trial court modified the instruction as asked by inserting the italicized words, and gave it as so modified. It is of this that the defendant complains. It is contended that such language was misleading and imposed upon the defendant the burden of proving "the truth of any inference, without limit or restriction, whether proper or improper, fair or unfair, reasonable or unreasonable, that may be drawn from the language used according to its usual construction and common acceptance." In support of this position the case of Williams Printing Co. v. Saunders, 113 Va. 156, 73 S. E. 472, Ann. Cas. 1913E, 693, is cited, and the following part of instruction 10 approved by the court in that case is referred to, namely, "But as to this article, as to buying votes in Manchester, the jury are instructed that the language used means, in its fair interpretation, according to the usual construction and acceptance of the language that," etc. (stating the construction given by the court to the language there involved according to the usual construction and common acceptance of it).

The instruction in question in the case before us was not, however, the only instruction given on the subject. Instruction 1 given by the court at the request of the plaintiff was as follows:

"(1) The court instructs the jury that, in determining whether or not the language complained of in the declaration is insulting and tending to violence and breach of the peace, the words and sentences must be construed in the plain and popular sense in which the rest of the world would naturally understand them; that is, they are to be construed according to their usual construction and common acceptance. The charge or insult need not be in express terms; it may be by insinuation."

[10] In view of the fact that this instruction was also given to the jury, we are of opinion that there is no merit in the contention of the defendant with respect to instruction C1, involved in the question under consideration.

We come now to the question for our consideration presented by the plaintiff's chief assignment of error, which is as follows:

3. Did the trial court err in setting aside the verdict of the jury on the first trial of the case on the grounds that the verdict is contrary to the law and the evidence and is excessive?

This question must be answered in the affirmative.

[11] There was no material variance between the allegations of the declaration and the proof introduced in evidence in behalf of the plaintiff as to the speaking and publishing of the defamatory words, in the sense in which they were alleged to have been used and intended to be understood, both as charged in the second and sixth counts of the declaration, on which the case was tried. There was ample evidence before the jury to support their verdict in so far as it was based on the finding that all of such words were spoken and published by the defendant as alleged. As alleged in the declaration and as shown by the proof, there was an interval of some 10 months between the publishing of the words alleged in the second count of the declaration and the publication of those alleged in the sixth count, which in substance repeated the charge of the same offense as having been committed by the plaintiff. There is in evidence also a letter written by the defendant and his wife to the husband of the plaintiff about 11 months after the publishing of the words covered by the second count of the declaration and about one month after the publishing of the words covered by the sixth count of the declaration, which in substance reiterated the charge that the plaintiff had been guilty of adultery. There is also in evidence the testimony of a witness for the plaintiff to the effect that after this action was instituted and before the trial the defendant repeated to him, in substance, the same charge, to wit, that the plaintiff had been guilty of adultery. The defendant, it is true, in his testimony denies that he used on this occasion many of the words in question, and claimed that he did not use the words he admits having then used with the meaning alleged by the plaintiff. This indeed was the claim of the defendant in his testimony with respect to the words used by him according to the testimony for the plaintiff, on all of the occasions of publication above mentioned, and with respect to the contents of the letter aforesaid; but that was a question for the jury in the light of certain admissions made by the defendant himself in his testimony and of all the other evidence in the case; and there was ample evidence to sustain the verdict of the jury based on a finding contrary to such claim of the defendant. Further, on the first trial of the case the defendant in testifying with respect to what he saw and heard on the occasion in March, 1918, referred to in the words alleged in the second count of the declaration, and in connection with his testimony that "it didn't look good to me right at that time," added the following statement before the jury, namely:

"She" (meaning the plaintiff) "had been accused of two parties and they are in this house" (meaning the courthouse) "to-day, and that would lead it right into my mind if nothing was done wrong right there—what I had seen."

There was therefore ample evidence before the jury on subjects mentioned in the next preceding paragraph to support the verdict in question to the extent of its full amount. It appears, indeed, from the opinion of the court below in the record, that the learned trial judge entertained that opinion on those subjects. As appears from his opinion, he did not set aside the verdict for any lack of evidence to support it in those particulars.

In the opinion of the trial judge this is said:

"The court concedes that, if from the evidence the jury were justified in basing a verdict upon the theory that the words spoken by the defendant, and which he admits in his plea that he spoke, were utterly and absolutely false, 'a frame-up' on the part of the defendant and his wife 'to blacken the character' of the plaintiff, then the court would not set aside the verdict on the ground that the damages were excessive; and the court does not believe that the jury would have given such damages, except upon that theory. But can it be said they were justified in basing a verdict upon such theory?"

The italics and the subquotations are those of the opinion of the court below, and the words embraced therein have reference to the position taken by counsel for plaintiff with respect to all of the defamatory words alleged in the declaration, particularly in his closing argument before the jury, to which reference is made in a preceding part of the opinion of the court below. It is there stated that in the opinion of the court such position, and certain violent denunciations on the part of such counsel in urging it with great vehemence, "were not justified by the evidence, aroused the 'passion' and 'prejudice' of the jury against the defendant and his wife; and the law is that, if the court believe that the amount of the verdict is so out of the way as to evince 'passion' or 'prejudice' on the part of the jury, it should be set aside."

As to the violent denunciations on the part of counsel for the plaintiff, it appears from the opinion under consideration that they were considered by the judge of the trial court as improper and misleading to the jury only because, in his view of the case, they were "not justified by the evidence" on the issue of the truth of the words sought to be justified by the special plea aforesaid. No other position has been taken in behalf of the defendant in the brief of counsel or in oral argument before us. And it further appears from said opinion that the trial court set aside the verdict in question as excessive and as contrary to the law and the evidence solely on the ground that the evidence in the case established the truth of the words admitted by the special plea aforesaid to have been spoken by the defendant.

[12] In view of our conclusion expressed above that the special plea aforesaid was improperly admitted, and that we must regard the case as if there was no plea of justification therein, and hence no issue upon and no evidence of the truth of any of the defamatory words alleged and proved to have been spoken by the defendant, which could properly be considered by the jury or by the trial judge, it is at once apparent that the trial judge was in error in his conclusion that the truth of the words admitted by the special plea was established by the evidence, and hence he was in error in setting aside the verdict. There being no issue properly in the case except the general issue, under which the truth of the words could not be proved, there was nothing upon which the trial judge could base the conclusion on which he set aside the verdict. The presumption of falsehood which the law attaches to all defamatory words was un rebutted, and that they were false was the conclusion which the jury and the trial judge were compelled to reach as their only conclusion upon all of the evidence properly in the case.

Such being our view of the case, it is entirely unnecessary for us to review the authorities on the subject, which are cited in argument, or to set forth here the rules governing our action where there is conflict in the testimony, and where we are asked to reverse the action of a trial court in setting aside a verdict and granting a new trial, as distinguished from cases in which we are asked to reverse the action of the trial court in refusing to set aside a verdict and grant a new trial. These rules are now well established by the decisions of this court, and none of them are applicable so as to uphold the action of the trial court in setting aside the verdict in the case before us; for none of such rules warrant a trial court in setting aside a verdict upon an issue of fact which is not properly in the case, nor upon a conclusion of fact to support which there is no evidence whatever properly in the case.

There are other assignments of error by the plaintiff, but, in view of our above-stated conclusions, they become immaterial, and will therefore not be dealt with in this opinion.

The case will be reversed and judgment will be entered in favor of the plaintiff upon the verdict of the jury rendered on the first trial of the case.

Reversed.

TUCKER SANATORIUM, Inc., v. COHEN.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
March 17, 1921.)

1. Negligence ⚡108(1)—Requisites of declaration stated.

A declaration in a negligence case should contain sufficient allegations of material facts to substantially inform the defendant of the nature and character of the demand against him, so that he may know how to present his defense, and should state such facts as would enable the court to say, if they are proved substantially as alleged, whether they establish a good cause of action, under Code 1919, § 6118.

2. Hospitals ⚡8—Declaration held to sufficiently allege negligence of hospital.

A declaration in an action by a patient for damages for a burn caused by hot-water bags upon his back held to contain sufficient allegations to inform defendant of the nature and character of the demand, and such facts as would enable the court to say, if they were proved, that they establish a good cause of action, in view of the nature and extent of the burn alleged, under Code 1919, § 6118.

3. Hospitals ⚡8—Evidence of burning by hot-water bag held prima facie case of negligence against hospital.

Testimony, showing that an excessively hot-water bag was negligently placed at plaintiff's back by the attending nurse, a servant of the hospital, when the physician had not directed it, and while plaintiff was in a semi-conscious condition, which could not have occurred if the heat of the bag had been tested by the nurse, as was customary, and such bag was allowed to remain until it burned him seriously a half an inch deep, made a prima facie case of actionable negligence against the hospital.

4. Appeal and error ⚡1002—New trial ⚡71—Finding of jury on conflicting evidence conclusive on trial court and appellate court.

A finding by the jury, based upon conflicting evidence involving the veracity and credibility of respective witnesses, is conclusive on the trial court and the appellate court.

5. Hospitals ⚡8—Evidence sufficient to sustain finding that condition of patient was natural result of negligent burn.

In an action against a hospital to recover damages for loss and suffering occasioned by negligent burn caused by hot-water bag, evidence held sufficient to sustain a finding that condition of plaintiff's back and loss and suffering of which he complained at time of trial was natural result of burn received, and was not due to infection occurring from lack of care of the burn by plaintiff's physician.

6. Hospitals ⚡8—Instruction held properly refused as misleading.

Where plaintiff in action against hospital was seeking damages for negligent burn and natural consequences thereof, court properly refused as misleading defendant's requested instruction, predicated on the assumption that plaintiff was seeking to hold defendant liable for negligence of physician or nurses in failing to take proper precautions to protect the burned place.

7. Hospitals ⚡8—Modification of instruction as to cause of suffering from burn in negligence case held proper.

In an action against hospital for damages for alleged negligent burn by a hot-water bag, court did not err in modifying defendant's requested instruction by inserting the words, "is not the natural result of the burn received, but," so as to read, "that if the present condition of the plaintiff's back and the loss and suffering of which he complains is not the natural result of the burn received, but is due to infection occurring from the lack of care with respect to said burn in the operation performed by Dr. H. prior to the plaintiff's leaving the hospital of the defendant, or to reinfection after he left said hospital, the defendant cannot be held liable."

8. Hospitals ⇨8—Whether burned patient exercised good faith in not undergoing operation before trial held for jury.

In an action against a hospital for damages and suffering caused by burn on back from hot-water bag, good faith of plaintiff in not undergoing a surgical operation before the trial, or lack of good faith in that particular, and whether he more probably would or would not have been cured by the time of the trial if he had undergone the operation, held peculiarly questions for the jury.

9. Appeal and error ⇨1002—Finding of jury on conflicting evidence not disturbed on appeal.

Conclusion of the jury upon a conflict of evidence sufficient to sustain a verdict either way will not be disturbed on appeal.

Error to Hustings Court of Richmond.

Action by Henry Cohen against the Tucker Sanatorium, Incorporated. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

This is an action instituted by the defendant in error, Cohen, for damages alleged to have been occasioned, while he was an inmate of a hospital conducted by the plaintiff in error, by the negligent application or failure to remove hot-water bags from the back of Cohen, as the result of which negligence he received, as alleged, a serious burn on the back.

The respective parties will be hereinafter referred to as plaintiff and hospital.

There was a demurrer to the declaration which was overruled by the trial court.

The declaration contains two counts. After stating the facts concerning the receiving of the plaintiff by the hospital as an inmate, as a patient, for care and treatment, for a certain reward paid in that behalf to the hospital, from which relationship of the parties the duty of the hospital arose (about the extent of which there is no question raised in the case), to wit, the duty to use ordinary or reasonable care under the circumstances to provide proper care and treatment for the plaintiff while said relationship existed, the first count contains the following allegations, the sufficiency of which is challenged by the demurrer, namely:

" * * * The said defendant * * * did not use due, proper, and ordinary care to provide proper care and treatment for the said plaintiff, but on the contrary the said defendant and its duly authorized servants so negligently and carelessly behaved and conducted themselves in that respect that afterwards and whilst the said plaintiff so abided in the said hospital, as aforesaid, to wit, on the 10th day of December, 1918, the said defendant's duly authorized servants did negligently and carelessly apply hot-water bags to the back of the said plaintiff, whereby the said plaintiff's back was cruelly burned and scalded, to a great extent, to wit, about nine inches by four inches, and to a great depth, to wit, one-half inch," etc.

The second count contains practically the same allegations as those of the first count, except that the negligence alleged is stated to have consisted in this, to wit, that—

"The said defendant and its duly authorized servants negligently suffered, permitted, and allowed hot-water bags to be carelessly and negligently applied to the back of the said plaintiff, whereby the said plaintiff's back was cruelly burned and scalded to a great extent," etc., setting forth the same extent as is alleged in the first count, etc.

There was a trial by jury, which resulted in a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $2,000.

The hospital moved the court to set aside the verdict on the grounds that it was contrary to the law and the evidence and without evidence to support it, that the court misdirected the jury, erred in refusing to give and also in changing instructions asked for by the hospital, and because the damages assessed by the jury were excessive. This motion the court overruled, and entered judgment for the plaintiff in accordance with the verdict, and the hospital appeals.

After the evidence both for the plaintiff and the hospital was all in, the hospital moved the trial court to instruct the jury as follows:

(1) "That the defendant cannot be held liable in this case for any act, neglect, or failure to take proper precautions to protect the injured or burned place on the plaintiff's back after discovery thereof and before the operation by Dr. Henson, nor afterwards, whether such act, neglect, or failure was due to the nurse, Miss Wright, Dr. Vanderhoof, Dr. Henson, or some nurse employed by the defendant."

(2) "That under the case made by the declaration and evidence here, the question for them to consider is whether a bag or bottle of hot water was negligently placed under the back of the plaintiff at the time mentioned in the declaration, by some nurse employed by the defendant and placed in charge of the plaintiff, and that from a burn so received he suffered the loss and suffering of which he now complains.

"That it is incumbent upon the plaintiff to prove by affirmative evidence and by a preponderance of all the evidence in the case:

"(1) That one of the nurses employed by the defendant placed a bag or bottle of hot water under the back of the defendant at the time mentioned; and

"(2) That when it was so placed the said nurse knew, or by the exercise of ordinary care should have known, that it was so hot as to have caused the injury complained of.

"If the plaintiff has failed in either of the respects above mentioned, then they must find for the defendant."

(3) "That if the present condition of the plaintiff's back and the loss and suffering of which he complains is due to infection occurring from the operation performed by Dr.

Henson prior to the plaintiff's leaving the hospital of the defendant, or to reinfection after he left said hospital, the defendant cannot be held liable in this case."

(4) "That if they believe from the evidence that the plaintiff's back was at the time mentioned in the declaration, December 10, 1918, burned by a bag or bottle of hot water placed there by the plaintiff's wife, they must find for the defendant; and they must also find for the defendant if from the whole evidence before them it is just as probable that the said bag or bottle was placed by the plaintiff's wife as by one of the nurses of the defendant."

But the court refused to give said instructions as offered, and instructed the jury as follows:

(1) "That if the defendant accepted the plaintiff, Cohen, as a patient, and undertook to give him such care, nursing, and attention as was reasonably necessary in view of his known condition, and negligently failed to keep and perform its undertakings, then in that case the defendant is liable for any injury which naturally resulted to the plaintiff from such failure."

(2) "That if they believe from the evidence in this case that the plaintiff intrusted himself to the defendant's hospital for treatment, then the plaintiff, while under the care of the defendant had a right to expect of the defendant and its employees in charge of the institution ordinary care and skill in nursing and treatment such as his case required, and such degree of ordinary care and diligence should be in proportion to the physical or mental ailments of the patient; and, if they further believe from the evidence in the case that said hospital, its servants or employees, did not exercise such ordinary care and diligence as was required by the condition of the plaintiff's health, and either negligently applied or permitted to be applied to his person a hot-water bag which resulted in injury to him, that they must find for the plaintiff."

(3) "That if they believe from the evidence in this case and the instructions as to the law that the plaintiff is entitled to recover damages, then in estimating the same they may take into consideration the amount of money spent for medicine and nursing and medical bills, and what the evidence shows he may have to expend in being cured; also fair compensation for loss of time he sustained by reason of the said injury; also the impairing of his earning capacity, if any; also the bodily injuries sustained, including his mental and physical suffering and the effect on his health, and the probable duration of the injury, whether the same is likely to be temporary or permanent. Not to exceed the sum sued for, to wit, $10,000."

(4) "That under the case made by the declaration in evidence here, the question for them to consider is whether a bag or bottle of hot water was negligently placed, or permitted to be placed, under the back of the plaintiff at the time mentioned in the declaration by some nurse employed by the defendant and placed in charge of the plaintiff, and that from a burn so received he suffered the loss and suffering of which he now complains.

"That it is incumbent upon the plaintiff to prove by affirmative evidence and by a preponderance of all the evidence in the case:

"(1) That one of the nurses employed by the defendant negligently placed, or permitted to be placed, a bag or bottle of hot water under the back of the defendant at the time mentioned; and

"(2) That when it was so placed, or permitted to be placed, the said nurse knew, or by the exercise of ordinary care should have known, that it was so hot as to have caused the injury complained of.

"If the plaintiff has failed in either of the respects above mentioned, then they must find for the defendant."

(5) "That if the present condition of the plaintiff's back and the loss and suffering of which he complains is not the natural result of the burn received, but is due to infection occurring from the lack of care with respect to said burn in the operation performed by Dr. Henson prior to the plaintiff's leaving the hospital of the defendant, or to reinfection after he left said hospital, the defendant cannot be held liable in this case." (Italics supplied.)

(6) "That if they believe from the evidence that the plaintiff's back was at the time mentioned in the declaration, December 10, 1918, burned by a bag or bottle of hot water placed there by the plaintiff's wife, without the knowledge or consent of the defendant, they must find for the defendant; and they must also find for the defendant if from the whole evidence before them it is just as probable that the said bag or bottle was placed by the plaintiff's wife as by one of the nurses of the defendant."

Further reference is made in the opinion of the court to the issues and to the evidence in the case.

Scott & Buchanan, of Richmond, for plaintiff in error.

J. R. Lenahan and D. O. O'Flaherty, both of Richmond, for defendant in error.

SIMS, J., after making the foregoing statement, delivered the following opinion of the court:

The questions presented for our decision by the assignments of error will be disposed of in their order as stated below.

1. Does the declaration set out sufficient facts alleged concerning the negligent acts of commission and of omission of the hospital, in order to render the declaration valid under the rule on the subject established in this state by the decisions prior to the going into effect of section 6118 of the Code of 1919, beginning with the Hortenstein Case, 102 Va. 914, 47 S. E. 906?

This question must be answered in the affirmative.

[1] The rule referred to requires two things as essential to the validity of a declaration in a negligence case in the allegations of the imputed negligent acts of commission or of omission, namely: (1) That it should contain sufficient allegations of material facts to substantially (but not necessarily completely) inform the defendant of the nature and character of the demand against him, so that he may know how to prepare his defense; and (2) that it should state such facts as would enable the court to say, if they are proved substantially as alleged, whether they establish a good cause of action.

The cases of Lynchburg Traction Co. v. Guill, 107 Va. 94, 95, 57 S. E. 644, Newport News, etc., Co. v. Nicolopoolos, 109 Va. 168, 63 S. E. 443, and Hunter v. Burroughs, 123 Va. 128, 129, 96 S. E. 360, are cited and relied on for the hospital as sustaining the position that the declaration in the case in judgment does not contain the essential allegations of fact required by the rule of the Virginia decisions aforesaid.

[2] Touching the consideration of whether the declaration is sufficient in the essential particular (1) above mentioned, we think it a pertinent fact that the hospital did not ask for a statement by the plaintiff of the particulars of his claim, as the statute entitles a defendant to ask, if the declaration of a plaintiff is deficient in its allegations of the particulars of the claim. As a matter of fact, the declaration in the instant case seems to have efficiently performed the office of informing the hospital of the nature and character of the demand against it, so that it knew how to prepare its defense. At least, we find nothing in the record to indicate the contrary.

And looking merely to the declaration, in our view of it, it is valid under the rule above referred to. As is said in the opinion of this court in Houston v. Lynchburg T. & L. Co., 119 Va. 136, 89 S. E. 114, delivered by Judge Kelly:

"And it is * * * well settled that while it is not sufficient merely to allege negligence in general terms as a conclusion of law, it suffices if such facts are alleged as to show that the accident was not one that would ordinarily have occurred if the defendant had exercised reasonable care."

The first count of the declaration alleges the situation and circumstances surrounding the plaintiff from which the duty of the hospital arose, the breach of which is alleged as giving rise to the cause of action; and, with respect to the conduct of the hospital which is relied on as constituting such breach of duty, this count of the declaration alleges that the injury was caused by the conduct of the servants of the hospital in the application of the hot-water bags to the back of the plaintiff, stating the nature and extent of the injury, and alleging that such conduct of such servants, with such result, constituted actionable negligence for which the hospital is liable in damages to the plaintiff. The second count is substantially the same in its allegations, except that the conduct of the hospital alleged as constituting the breach of its duty is the allowing, i. e., the omission to prevent the application of the hot-water bags to the back of the plaintiff by the servants of the hospital.

We think that both counts of the declaration allege such facts as to show that the accident was not one that would ordinarily have occurred if the hospital (or what is the same thing, its servants having the care of the plaintiff) had exercised reasonable care. It seems plain to us that a burn of such character and extent, under such circumstances, would not have occurred unless the person having the care of the patient had been guilty of negligence in the matter of the application or removal of the hot-water bag or bags which caused the burn. The declaration notified the hospital that the demand of the plaintiff was based on the charge that the conduct of the servants of the hospital who had the care of the plaintiff, was in the matter in question negligent, and constituted actionable negligence for the result of which the hospital was liable in damages to the plaintiff. Hence the declaration was sufficient to inform the hospital of the nature and character of the demand against it, and stated such facts as would have enabled the court to say, if the facts were proved as alleged, that they established a good cause of action. This is not a case in which the nature of the injury alleged is such that ordinarily its cause would be obscure, or where the allegations of the declaration left that matter in any doubt. The declaration is explicit on that subject. The facts as alleged made a prima facie case against the hospital. If the hospital did in fact exercise reasonable care, and such accident occurred notwithstanding, the circumstances must have been very different from those alleged in the declaration, or there must have been other explanatory circumstances which do not appear from the allegations of the declaration, all of which were matters of defense, and doubtless could and should have been shown in evidence by the hospital at the trial, if they existed. So far as the declaration is concerned, it was therefore good on demurrer.

Such being our conclusion, it is unnecessary for us to construe the new provisions of the statute referred to in the question above stated (Code 1919, § 6118), and we therefore express no opinion on that subject at this time.

[3] 2. Was there evidence before the jury sufficient to sustain the verdict upon the issue of whether the hospital was guilty of the negligent acts of commission or omission alleged in the declaration?

This question must be answered in the affirmative.

Of the evidence we deem it sufficient to say that, while conflicting on the subject under consideration, there was ample testimony to warrant the jury in concluding that a hot-water bag was negligently placed at the back of the plaintiff by the attending nurse, a servant of the hospital, when the physician had not directed any hot-water bag to be applied to the back of the patient, and while the plaintiff was in a semiconscious condition, due to the high fever accompanying pneumonia, with the water in the bag excessively hot, which could not have occurred if the heat of the bag had been tested by the nurse, as the uncontroverted testimony in the case showed was customary and usual; and such excessively hot bag was allowed by the nurse to remain against the back of the plaintiff until it burned the back of the plaintiff seriously, practically to the extent alleged in the declaration.

[4] This proof undoubtedly made a prima facie case of actionable negligence against the hospital upon the issue of whether the hospital was guilty of the negligent acts of commission or omission alleged in the declaration. Houston v. Lynchburg T. & L. Co., supra, 119 Va. 136, 89 S. E. 114. See, also, as a similar case to that in judgment, Williams v. Pomona Valley Hospital Association, 21 Cal. App. 359, 131 Pac. 888. To rebut this prima facie case, the sole defense of the hospital upon this issue was that the nurse aforesaid did not place the hot-water bag at the back of the plaintiff, and did not know it was there until the plaintiff complained of its burning him, but that the wife of the plaintiff filled and placed the hot-water bag at his back when the nurse was not present. There was direct testimony for the hospital to sustain this defense, but there was also the direct testimony of the wife that she did no such thing. This conflict involved the question of the veracity and credibility of the respective witnesses for the plaintiff and the hospital. The verdict of the jury resolved this question in favor of the plaintiff, and this finding upon such an issue was conclusive upon the trial court, and is also conclusive upon us.

[5] 3. Was there sufficient evidence before the jury to sustain the conclusion, which is involved in the verdict, that the condition of the plaintiff's back and the loss and suffering of which he complained at the time of the trial was the natural result of the burn received, and was not due to infection occurring from lack of care with respect to said burn in an operation performed by Dr. Henson prior to the plaintiff's leaving the hospital, or to reinfection after plaintiff left the hospital?

This question must be answered in the affirmative.

The matters in question now under consideration involve the issues of whether the plaintiff, or Dr. Henson, who was employed by the plaintiff, or others who were employed by the plaintiff, were guilty of a lack of ordinary or reasonable care in the treatment of the burn after it occurred, and of whether, if there was such lack of care, it was the whole cause of the condition of plaintiff's back and suffering aforesaid.

We deem it sufficient to say on this subject that the lack of care in question does not affirmatively appear from the evidence for the plaintiff. The most that could be said is that the evidence for the plaintiff does not exclude the possibility that such lack of care might have existed. There is, however, in the evidence for the plaintiff and for the hospital, testimony to the effect that, after the wound from the burn had on two occasions entirely healed, the tissues subsequently broke down and ulcerated, which warranted the jury in inferring that the breaking down of the tissues at other times and the condition of the back of the plaintiff and his loss and suffering aforesaid were due to the recurring breaking down of the tissues caused by the lasting effects of the burn, and not to any infection from lack of care in its treatment at any time. And with respect to the testimony for the hospital on this subject this is true: It introduced two physicians, who are distinguished experts, and neither of them testified to the opinion, nor was there any testimony for the hospital tending to show the affirmative fact that the condition of the back of the plaintiff and his loss and suffering aforesaid were in any degree due to lack of care in the treatment of the burn having caused infection. And while the testimony of the two expert physicians, who were witnesses for the plaintiff, is to the effect that they would not say that the breaking down of the tissues on one occasion may not have been due to infection, this is not inconsistent with the inference which the jury were warranted in drawing, as we think, as aforesaid, that the breaking down was not due to infection at any time.

[6] 4. Was there error in the action of the trial court with respect to the instructions?

This question must be answered in the negative.

(a) The hospital complains of the refusal of the trial court to give instruction No. 1, asked by the hospital, which is copied in the statement preceding this opinion.

This construction as asked was predicated on the assumption that the plaintiff was seeking to hold the hospital liable for some negligence of the physician or nurses mentioned in failing to take proper precautions to protect the injured or burned place on the plaintiff's back. This assumption is negated by the plaintiff's declaration, and it would have misled the jury to give them such an instruction, by diverting their attention to an issue not in the case.

[7] (b) The hospital complains of the refusal of its instruction No. 3 as asked, and the giving of it as modified in instruction No. 5, as given, by the insertion by the court of the words italicized in the instruction as copied in the statement preceding this opinion. This modification of the instruction was plainly proper, and we find no merit in this complaint.

(c) The hospital complains of instruction No. 1, as given on motion of the plaintiff, as being "a general abstract statement of certain duties of the defendant, with no reference whatever to the cause of action set out in the declaration or the evidence in support thereof, and complains of instruction No. 2, as given, also on motion of the plaintiff, as containing merely "a more extended statement of the same character," and because it "then instructed the jury that if they believed from the evidence that the defendant failed in those duties, and either negligently applied, or permitted to be applied, the hot-water bag to the plaintiff, they must find a verdict for him." The basis for these complaints, as set out in the petition, is the position taken for the hospital that—

"There was * * * neither a charge in the declaration, nor any evidence which tended to show in the most remote degree that there was any lack of 'ordinary care and skill in nursing and treatment' of the plaintiff by the defendant, nor any lack of care 'such as his case required,' a degree of care which 'should be in proportion to the physical and mental ailments of the patient.'"

As appears from our conclusions above expressed, we do not consider the position mentioned as tenable, and hence we are of opinion that there is no merit in either of the complaints under consideration.

The sole remaining question for our consideration is the following:

5. Did the court below err in not setting aside the verdict on the ground that it was excessive?

This question must be answered in the negative.

The position of the hospital on this subject as set forth in the petition is, in substance and as presently quoted in part, that the evidence shows that the plaintiff was (a) guilty of lack of ordinary care in having his wound treated, and (b) that the Johns-Hopkins expert witnesses for plaintiff, who examined him in October, 1919, shortly previous to the trial in the lower court (which took place in January, 1920), testified that—

The wound on plaintiff's back "should then, with proper treatment, have been healed in the course of a week at a cost of $100 and hospital fees," and "that the plaintiff was careful not to pursue this treatment. He evidently preferred to wait so that he could show to the jury his burn aggravated by some cause for which the defendant was not responsible, and thus enhance the damages which he expected to recover."

With respect to the position (a), just mentioned, we find no merit in it, for the reasons given in connection with question 3 above considered.

[8, 9] With respect to the position (b), just mentioned, we think it is also without merit.

The Johns-Hopkins expert witnesses for plaintiff testified that in October, 1919, the wound in question did not show "any tendency to heal at all"; that a surgical operation was necessary, and was indicated as the only method of cure, but that cure by that method was not certain; that if that method was pursued the wound "might heal up in the course of a month, or it may not heal up at all," as stated by one of such witnesses, Dr. Lord. The most that can be said in favor of the position of the hospital under consideration is that there was evidence in the case tending to support it. But there was also evidence in the case for the plaintiff to the contrary. The good faith of the plaintiff in not undergoing the surgical operation before the trial, or his lack of good faith in that particular, and whether he more probably would or would not have been cured by the time of the trial if he had undergone the operation, were all peculiarly questions for the jury, and their conclusion, upon a conflict of evidence, sufficient to sustain a verdict either way, will not be disturbed on appeal.

The case will be
Affirmed.

TRIPP v. CITY OF NORFOLK.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
March 17, 1921.)

1. Municipal corporations \S 763(1) — City must keep streets in reasonably safe condition.

It is the duty of a city to keep its streets in a reasonably sound, safe, and serviceable condition for public use and travel.

2. Damages \S 26—Rule as to responsibilities of wrongdoer for negligent act stated.

A negligent person is liable for all the consequences which naturally flow from the wrongful act, regardless of whether they could have been reasonably anticipated; the test being whether, viewing the case retrospectively, the consequences were so improbable or unlikely to occur that it would not be fair and just to charge a reasonably prudent man with them.

3. Municipal corporations \S 800(1) — Rut in street held proximate cause of injuries to pedestrian.

Negligence of city in permitting rut in street held the proximate cause of injuries to pedestrian struck by wheel of truck, detached from truck because of the force of the impact when wheel of truck dropped suddenly and with great force into the rut.

Error to Circuit Court of City of Norfolk.

Action by Queenie Tripp against the City of Norfolk. Demurrer to declaration sustained, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed and remanded.

H. C. Nicholas and L. S. Parsons, both of Norfolk, for plaintiff in error.

R. W. Peatross, of Norfolk, for defendant in error.

SAUNDERS, J. This case is brought before us by a writ of error to a judgment of the circuit court of the city of Norfolk, sustaining a demurrer to the declaration of Queenie Tripp, plaintiff in an action of assumption against said city.

The plaintiff was injured on Holt street in the city, supra, under the following circumstances: She was walking on the sidewalk of said street when a heavy automobile fire truck traveling in her direction dropped its front wheel or wheels into a rut in the street. The force of this impact detached a front wheel of the truck from the axle. The wheel thus detached rolled forward, mounted the sidewalk, struck Miss Tripp, and inflicted injuries alleged to be of considerable severity.

The plaintiff's case is set out in detail in her declaration, which herewith follows:

"Queenie Tripp, plaintiff, complains of the city of Norfolk, a municipal corporation duly chartered and created under the laws of the state of Virginia, defendant, of a plea of trespass on the case for this, to wit:

"That heretofore, to wit, on and before the grievance here complained of, the city of Norfolk was a municipal corporation duly chartered and created under the laws of the state of Virginia, and as such a corporation, at the time of the grievance hereinafter mentioned, was clothed with the power and subject to the duty, among others, of keeping sound, safe, and serviceable for public use and travel its public streets, alleys, walks, and gutters, and particularly it was the duty of the defendant to keep sound, safe, and serviceable for public use and travel a certain public street in said city, known and designated as Holt street, in order that persons using the said Holt street for travel might not be injured. And also at the time of the grievance herein mentioned the defendant was the owner of certain trucks and apparatus, used and operated by the defendant for the purpose of extinguishing fires, and more particularly a certain fire apparatus, the same being a heavy and powerful automobile truck and more particularly designated as combination No. 1, which said combination wagon No. 1 was operated over and upon the public streets of the defendant en route to and returning from fire, and more particularly the said combination wagon was operated over and upon the said Holt street in said city en route to and returning from fires in that section of said city.

"And yet the said defendant, disregarding its duty as aforesaid, willfully, negligently, and unjustly permitted and allowed the said Holt street to become in a dangerous and unsafe condition, in that the said defendant, before and at the time of the grievance herein mentioned, suffered, permitted, and allowed a certain rut or defect to be in said street, the same extending about ten feet across the said Holt street, about two feet in width and about eight inches deep, the same being located on the said Holt street at or near the intersection of another public street in said city known and designated as Chapel street; and the said rut or defect is particularly dangerous, in that the same is situated in the said Holt street at such an angle that persons traveling along the said Holt street in vehicles in the nighttime were unable to see or ascertain the dangerous character of said rut until within such close proximity to the same that striking the same was unavoidable, of all of which the said city then and there had notice, or by the exercise of reasonable care should have had notice. And on or about the 5th day of February, 1919, at about the hour of 10 o'clock p. m., the said combination wagon was being operated over and upon the said Holt street, and, though operated with reasonable care, the same was brought violently, suddenly, and with great force against the said rut or defect, and by reason of the force and violence of the contact, and the dangerous condition of said rut and its liability to damage and injure traffic over the same, one of the front wheels of the said combination wagon became detached and wrenched therefrom, and by reason of the momentum created by the forward movement of the said combination wagon, the said wheel, after having become detached and wrenched from the said combination wagon, was propelled with great force and speed over, upon, and along the said Holt street and also up on and upon the sidewalk of the said Holt street, where the plaintiff was then and there, in the observance of due care on her part, lawfully walking, and, continuing its progress, did with great force and violence crash into and against the plaintiff, by reason whereof the plaintiff was knocked violently to the ground and greatly sprained, bruised, cut, and maimed, and her nervous system greatly shocked and permanently disordered and otherwise permanently injured, to the damage of the plaintiff in the sum of $3,000, and therefore she brings this suit."

The defendant city demurred to this declaration, and assigned the following grounds of demurrer:

"First. That the declaration shows on its face that the condition of the street complained of was not the proximate cause of the plaintiff's injury.

"Second. That the declaration shows on its face that the injury complained of was not the natural and probable result of the condition of the street, and could not have been foreseen and guarded against by the defendant.

"Third. That the declaration shows on its face that the alleged injury was caused by the fire department of the city of Norfolk, which is a governmental department of the said city, for whose negligence no right of action lies against the city."

The circuit court sustained the demurrer generally, and the plaintiff applied for and secured a writ of error.

The gravamen of the first two grounds of demurrer is that the condition of the street was not the proximate cause of the plaintiff's injury, so that upon the case stated there was no liability upon the city.

[1] Unquestionably it was the duty of the municipality to keep its streets, including Holt street, in a reasonably sound, safe, and serviceable condition for public use and travel. This duty, the plaintiff asserts, was not discharged. The declaration alleges that the city negligently allowed Holt street to "become in a dangerous and unsafe condition," in that it permitted and allowed a rut, or defect, across said street of the following dimensions, to wit, about ten feet long, two feet wide, and eight inches deep. Further, it is alleged that this rut, or defect, is "particularly dangerous, in that the same is situated in Holt street at such an angle that persons traveling along said Holt street in vehicles at nighttime were unable to see, or ascertain, the dangerous character of said rut until within such close proximity to the same that striking the same was unavoidable, or all of which the city had notice, or by the exercise of reasonable care should have had notice." In addition, the declaration alleges that about 10 p. m., on February 5, 1919, a heavy and powerful fire truck was being operated with reasonable care on the above street, when it was brought violently and suddenly against the rut in the street. In other words, the front wheels, or a front wheel, of the moving vehicle dropped violently into the rut, or defect, described in the declaration. The consequences of this unexpected impact are described substantially in the following terms in the declaration:

"* * * By reason of the force and violence of the impact and the dangerous condition of said rut * * * one of the front wheels of the combination wagon [i. e., automobile truck] became detached and wrenched therefrom, and by reason of the momentum created by the forward movement of said wagon, the said wheel thus detached was propelled with great force and speed over, upon, and along Holt street and thence upon and along the sidewalk of said street, where with force and violence it crashed into and injured the plaintiff."

The proximate cause and causal chain relied on by the plaintiff to support her claim for recovery may be described as follows: (1) The city negligently maintained a dangerous rut, or defect, in Holt street; (2) moving vehicle, operated with reasonable care, dropped one or both front wheels into this rut; (3) the violence of this blow detached a front wheel of the vehicle; (4) the wheel thus detached moved forward under natural laws; and (5) in its forward movement the wheel, probably in consequence of a twist given it at the time of detachment, mounted the sidewalk and struck and injured Miss Tripp, who was using said walk in the exercise of due care. Hence the plaintiff contends that the city, being responsible for the defect, was responsible for the accident to the vehicle which this defect occasioned. Upon the basis of the latter responsibility, the plaintiff maintains that the city is liable for her injury, which followed in due sequence from the accident to the vehicle.

The defendant insists, by way of defense, that the injury complained of was not the natural and probable result of the condition of the street, and could not have been foreseen and guarded against by the defendant. This defense of the city rests upon the rule of "foreseeability," as it is sometimes styled.

Widely different contentions have been advanced with respect to responsibility for tortious negligence. One contention has been that the proper rule in such cases is that the defendant should not be held responsible for any damages except such as he could have foreseen in the exercise of reasonable foresight as the probable consequences of his act. This statement of the rule of liability is obviously far too favorable to the party guilty of negligence, since there are many negligent injuries flowing very naturally and inevitably from the original negligent act, or omission, which would require prescience to anticipate. The ordinarily prudent and intelligent man may possess in a measure the power to estimate likelihood, but he is not endowed with prescience. Apparently the defendant appeals to the rule as stated supra, since its second ground of demurrer is that "the injury complained of could not have been foreseen and guarded against by the defendant."

Another statement of the rule is that a defendant should be held responsible for all damages which in fact result from his wrongful act, whether they could have been anticipated or not. A strict application of this rule would result in fixing responsibility in many cases, when the relation between the initial negligence and the subsequent injury was of the most tenuous character, and no human being, however prudent and intelligent, when acquainted with the circumstances and apprised of what actually did happen, would regard the ultimate injury as a likely present or remote consequence of the original negligent act.

[2] Virginia holds a middle ground with respect to the rule of liability in these cases. The latest statement of the principle in this respect in the Virginia Reports will be found in the case of N. & W. Ry. Co. v. Whitehurst, 125 Va. 263, 99 S. E. 568, Burks, J., delivering the opinion:

"We have discussed the subject of proximate cause in a number of cases, and it is not to be expected that the discussion shall be repeated in every case of tort brought to this court. * * *

"The 'foreseeableness,' or reasonable anticipation of the consequences of a wrongful or negligent act is not the measure of liability of the guilty party, though it may be determinative of the question of his negligence. When once it has been determined that the act is wrongful, or negligent, the guilty party is liable for all the consequences which naturally flow therefrom, whether they were reasonably to have been anticipated or not, and in determining whether or not the consequences do naturally flow from the wrongful act, or neglect, the case should be viewed retrospectively; that is to say, looking at the consequences, were they so improbable or unlikely to occur that it would not be fair and just to charge a reasonably prudent man with them. If not, he is liable. This is the test of liability, but, when liability has been established, its extent is to be measured by the natural consequences of the negligent or wrongful act. The precise injury need not have been anticipated. [Italics ours.] It is enough if the act is such that the party ought to have anticipated that it was liable to result in injury to others."

See, also, the cases cited, 125 Va. 264, 265, 99 S. E. 568.

To the same effect is Coolidge v. Hallauer, 126 Wis. 244, 105 N. W. 568, which says:

"It is not necessary, in order to constitute proximate cause, that the precise injury should have been foreseen or apprehended as certain to occur. It is sufficient if an ordinarily careful and prudent person ought, under the circumstances to have foreseen that an injury might probably result from the negligent act." (Italics ours.)

Discussing proximate cause, in Pulaski Gas Light Co. v. McClintock, 97 Ark. 576, 134 S. W. 1189, 1199, 32 L. R. A. (N. S.) 825, the court says:

"It is not necessary that the particular injury should have been foreseen."

And in Foster v. Chicago, etc., Co., 127 Iowa, 90, 102 N. W. 424, 4 Ann. Cas. 150, the court declared that—

"Doubtless the particular situation might not have been foreseen, but this was not essential to making out a charge of negligence. Accidents as they occur are seldom foreshadowed. Otherwise many would be avoided. If the act or omission is of itself negligent and likely to result in injury to others, then the person guilty thereof is liable for the natural consequences which occurred, whether he might have foreseen them or not. In other words, if the act or omission is one which the party ought, in the exercise of ordinary care, to have anticipated was likely to result in injury to others, then he is liable for any injury proximately resulting therefrom, although he might not have foreseen the particular injury which did happen."

[3] An ordinarily careful and prudent person, conversant with the consequences to swiftly moving wheeled vehicles of a sudden and forcible drop into a rut of the dimensions given, would, if confronted with such a rut in a street of a populous city, readily foresee that accidents would result from its maintenance. Such a person, when advised of the circumstances of the accident in the case in judgment, as described in the declaration, would pronounce the plaintiff's injury to be a natural consequence of the city's negligence. And why not? Admittedly the city was at fault with respect to the rut in Holt street, which is alleged to be particularly dangerous, in that travelers on Holt street in the nighttime (and this accident occurred in nighttime) were unable "to see or ascertain its dangerous character until within such close proximity that striking same was unavoidable, of which the city had notice." A powerful automobile truck, carefully operated, dropped "violently, suddenly, and with great force" into the above rut. The force of this impact wrenched off one of the front wheels of this truck. Under the impulse of its momentum, this wheel would naturally roll until the friction of the street's surface, or collision with animate or inanimate objects, would bring it to a standstill. It did roll forward. Unfortunately for the plaintiff, she crossed, without fault on her part, the course of the moving wheel, was struck down and injured. All of the consequences in this little tragedy followed in unbroken sequence. There was no intervening efficient cause. The chain of cause and effect is complete, and the city's negligence is established as the proximate cause, the causa causans, of the plaintiff's injury.

In the view of this court, the declaration clearly stated a case which should have been submitted to the jury.

If the defendant desired to be further informed as to the details of the accident, that information could have been secured through a bill of particulars.

In the opinion of this court, the trial court erred in sustaining the demurrer to the declaration, and for that error its judgment is reversed, and this cause is remanded for a new trial to be had not in conflict with the views herein expressed.

Reversed.

BIBBS v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. March 17, 1921.)

1. Infants $\S 20$ —in prosecution for causing girl to commit fornication, held not error to exclude evidence to prove her bad general reputation.

In a prosecution, under Acts 1914, c. 228, for causing and encouraging a girl under 18 to commit fornication with accused, there was no error in refusing to permit accused to introduce evidence to prove her bad general reputation for chastity.

2. Infants $\S 20$ —It is an offense to encourage a child to commit a misdemeanor, and participation in fornication with her makes accused guilty.

It is not essential to an offense, under Acts 1914, c. 228, making it a misdemeanor for a person over 18 to "cause or encourage" a child under that age to commit a misdemeanor, that accused should have "caused" prosecutrix to commit the misdemeanor, and he is guilty if he encouraged her to do so, and participating in fornication with her encourages her, and makes him guilty, though she may have made the first advance.

Error to Circuit Court, Orange County.

William Bibbs was convicted of encouraging a minor under the age of 18 years to commit a misdemeanor, and he brings error. Affirmed.

Omitting the formal parts, the warrant in this case charged that the accused—

"did unlawfully and feloniously cause and encourage Clara Stuart, she being under the age of 18 years, to commit a misdemeanor, to wit, fornication with him, * * * he being over the age of 18 years, to wit, the age of 30 years. * * *

The warrant was issued under the statute (Acts 1914, c. 228), which, so far as material, is as follows:

"* * * Any person over eighteen years of age who shall cause or encourage any child under the age of eighteen years to commit any misdemeanor * * * shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be subject to punishment by a fine of not more than five hundred dollars, or by imprisonment in jail for a period not exceeding one year, or both."

There was a trial by jury, which resulted in a verdict and judgment finding the accused guilty and fixing his punishment at six months in the county jail.

It appears from the record that the accused was over 18 years of age, to wit, "over the age of 30 years"; that the prosecutrix "was under the age of 18 years, to wit, of the age of 15 years"; and that the accused "admitted that he had carnal intercourse" with the prosecutrix. The record further shows that there was a conflict between the testimony of the accused and that of the prosecutrix as to which made "the first advance"; the accused testifying, as certified in the record:

"That the first advance as between the accused and said Clara Stuart was made by her, in this: That she sat in his lap and hugged and kissed the said Bibbs, but Clara Stuart testified that he made the first advance."

It is further certified in the record that:

"The defendant introduced witnesses to prove the character of the said Clara Stuart, and on the objection of the commonwealth the defendant stated to the court that the object of the evidence was to show that the said Clara Stuart was a strumpet of the very worst sort, and had been long before the time and after the offense charged in the warrant, and further stated that the further purpose of such testimony was to negative any inference or evidence that the said Clara Stuart was caused or encouraged by the accused to commit the act alleged in the warrant."

The court refused to allow the evidence last mentioned to be introduced, the accused excepted to this ruling of the court, and the action of the trial court in this particular is the sole assignment of error on this appeal.

Will A. Cook, of Madison, and Geo. L. Browning, of Orange, for plaintiff in error. John R. Saunders, Atty. Gen., and J. D. Hank, Jr., Asst. Atty. Gen., for the Commonwealth.

SIMS, J., after making the foregoing statement, delivered the following opinion of the court:

[1] It does not appear from the record whether the excluded evidence was concerning specific acts of, or the general reputation of the prosecutrix for, unchastity. By the great weight of authority, even if under the statute involved the accused had been entitled to introduce in his defense the bad character of the prosecutrix for chastity, the accused would have been restricted to proof of the general reputation of the prosecutrix in that regard; no evidence of specific acts of unchastity being admissible even in such case. We therefore assume that the excluded evidence offered by the accused was directed to the proof of such general reputation of the prosecutrix. So considering the matter, the sole question presented by the record in this case for our decision is the following:

1. Did the trial court err in refusing to permit the accused to introduce evidence to prove the bad general reputation of the prosecutrix for chastity?

This question must be answered in the negative.

[2] That the accused should have caused the prosecutrix to commit the misdemeanor mentioned in the warrant is not an essential element of the offense of which the accused was convicted. Under the statute involved, if the accused, who was over 18 years of age, encouraged the prosecutrix, who was under the age of 18 years, to commit the misdemeanor, he was guilty of the statutory offense. Now it appears from the record that the accused "admitted that he had carnal intercourse" with the prosecutrix. He therefore, in any aspect of the case, was a willing participant with her in the commission of the misdemeanor aforesaid. Such participation, in itself alone, as we think, encouraged the prosecutrix to commit such misdemeanor, and made the accused guilty under the statute. Even if it were true that the prosecutrix made the first advance, that did not justify the accused in encouraging her to commit the misdemeanor by yielding to her solicitation. When read along with other humane statutes of the state on the subject of the reclamation of those of an age making that effort possible of success in some cases, it is apparent that the general purpose of the statute involved in this case is one in aid of such reclamation. One of the specific mischiefs and evils against which the statute is directed is manifestly the aiding or abetting, by any one who has reached the age of discretion named in the statute of over 18 years of age, the commission of "any misdemeanor" by a person who has not reached that age. The more depraved the latter person may be and the greater the disposition and inclination of the latter to commit the misdemeanor, the greater the need that all other persons, and certainly those who have reached an age of discretion, should not in any way encourage the immature person in the depraved conduct, least of all by participating in such conduct.

The assignment of error under consideration is based upon the mistaken position that although the prosecutrix was a child of the immature age mentioned in the statute, and the accused was of the age of discretion mentioned therein of over 18 years (being, indeed, 30 years of age), if she was so depraved as to make the first advance toward the commission of the misdemeanor, the child must be regarded as having caused or encouraged the commission of the misdemeanor and not the accused. This position regards the parties as of equal years of discretion, and as fitted to deal with each other on equal terms, and ignores the purpose of the statute aforesaid.

It is not claimed for the accused that there is any authority directly in point sustaining the assignment of error aforesaid; but the cases of Brown v. State, 72 Md. 468, 20 Atl. 186, and State v. Gibson, 111 Mo. 92, 19 S. W. 980, are relied on as strongly analogous. We do not consider these cases as in point. As appears from a reading of them, the statutes there involved were very different from the Virginia statute under consideration, and the offenses created by those statutes are different from that of which the accused, in the case before us stands convicted. The Maryland statute (Code, art. 27, § 1) involved in the Brown Case made it a crime to "entice or persuade" a girl under the statutory age "from the custody and control of her parents for purposes of prostitution"; whereas the Virginia statute makes it a crime to "encourage" any child under the statutory age "to commit any misdemeanor." The Missouri statute involved in the Gibson Case, as therein held, made the previous chaste character of the prosecutrix an essential element of the offense.

The judgment under review will be Affirmed.

WENNER v. GEORGE et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
March 17, 1921.)

1. Wills §—656—Whether a condition is subsequent or precedent is not determinable by technical words used.

There are no technical words to distinguish between conditions precedent and conditions subsequent; the distinction being a matter of construction.

2. Wills §—823—Devisee accepting life estate held personally liable to pay charge imposed.

Where testator devised lands to his son for life with remainders over on condition that the son should pay his sister the sum of $4,000 within 10 years, interest to commence five years from the probate of the will, which further declared that any legatee who signified his intention not to abide by its provisions should forfeit any benefits, the son who accepted the life estate becomes personally liable for payment of the charge.

3. Wills §—821(6)—Life estate held subject to lien to secure payment of charge, but remainder not.

Where testator devised land to his son for life, provided the son should pay to his sister a fixed sum of money, and the will further provided that any beneficiary not accepting the conditions should forfeit all interest under the will, the son who accepted the life estate became not only personally bound to pay the charge, but the life estate itself was subject to the lien of the charge, though the remainders over were not.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Loudoun County.

Bill by Leah Elizabeth Wenner against Ashland C. George and others. From the decree complainant appeals, and the named defendant appeals. Amended and affirmed.

Wm. H. Martin, of Leesburg, for appellant.

E. E. Garrett, of Leesburg, and M. J. Fulton, of Richmond, for appellee.

PRENTIS, J. The appellant filed her bill against Ashland C. George and others, the object of which was to establish a legacy under the will of her father, Samuel W. George, Sr., as a charge and lien upon the corpus of certain real estate which had been devised by her father, Samuel W. George, Sr., to her brother, Ashland C. George, for life, with remainder to his heirs at law.

Two of the children of Ashland C. George answered the bill, and denied that the legacy was a lien upon their interest in the property. The circuit court entered a decree, the substantial part of which reads thus:

"On consideration whereof, the court is of the opinion that the sum of $4,000, required in the will of Samuel George, deceased, to be paid to Leah Elizabeth Wenner by Ashland C. George, is a mere personal charge on the said

Ashland C. George, and is in no wise a lien or charge upon the land devised the said Ashland C. George for life, nor on the interest in remainder.

"And, further, the court is of the opinion that the true construction of the following clause of the will of Samuel George: 'I will and bequeath to my son Ashland Clay the farm on which he at present resides known as the Hamilton farm, also to the said Ashland C. George the mountain lot known as the Hamilton and Cole land on the east side of Short Hill, provided the said Ashland C. George pays to his sister Leah Elizabeth Wenner the sum of $4,000 within ten years, interest to be paid by the said A. C. George on any part of this sum that remains unpaid at the expiration of five years from the probating of this will'—is that this devise to the said A. C. George was subject to a condition, namely, the payment of the sum of $4,000 to Leah Elizabeth Wenner within 10 years, and the payment thereof was a condition precedent to the said Ashland C. George taking any interest in the land. But it appearing to the court from the admissions in the pleadings that the said Ashland C. George has been in the occupancy of said land since the death of the testator, and has been in receipt of the rents and issues of the said land, the court is of the opinion that by his acceptance of the benefits of and the occupation of said land he, the said Ashland C. George, should in equity and good conscience be required to pay to the said Leah Elizabeth Wenner the said sum of $4,000 with interest from September 9, 1918, until paid, and accordingly the court doth order and decree that said Ashland C. George do pay to Leah Elizabeth Wenner $4,000 and interest from September 9, 1918, and her costs, and she shall have execution on this decree."

From this decree both Leah Elizabeth Wenner and Ashland C. George have appealed.

[1] The briefs raise questions as to whether the devise to Ashland C. George created a vested or contingent estate, was on condition precedent or subsequent, and direct attention to those subtle distinctions which have for so long taxed the intellects of the sages of the law, and continue to confound those of lesser men. We do not think it necessary in this case to undertake to solve all of the possible questions which might have arisen, because no useful purpose would be thereby accomplished. A careful and succinct summary of the doctrine as to such conditions may be found in Graves' Notes on Real Property, §§ 251, 252, and Riely, J., thus clarifies the subject in Burdis v. Burdis, 96 Va. 84, 30 S. E. 462, 70 Am. St. Rep. 825:

"There are no technical words to distinguish between conditions precedent and conditions subsequent. The distinction is matter of construction. The same words may indifferently make either, according to the intent of the person who creates the condition. If the language of the particular clause, or of the whole will, shows that the act on which the estate depends must be performed before the estate can vest, the condition is precedent, and, unless it be performed, the devisee can take nothing. If, on the contrary, the act does not necessarily precede the vesting of the estate, but may accompany or follow it, and this can be collected from the whole will, the condition is subsequent. Finlay v. King, 3 Pet. 346; Martin v. Ballou, 13 Barb. 119; and 4 Kent's Com. 124."

[2] It is only necessary to consider the will of Samuel W. George, Sr., so as to ascertain and effectuate his intention. That will apparently disposes of his entire estate, giving his lands to his sons, and requiring them to pay his daughters specific sums of money. He did not intend to die intestate as to any part of his estate, or to withhold the possession, occupation, and use of the land here involved from his son Ashland C. George, who then resided upon the farm devised, and the language of the will clearly shows that he intended him to pay the legacy to his sister, Leah Elizabeth Wenner, within 10 years. In order to accelerate its payment, he provided that after 5 years the sum remaining unpaid should bear interest. The specific clause here involved is quoted in the decree, and the will also contains this language:

"Any legatee named in the foregoing will who may signify his or her intention not to abide by its provisions, shall be declared outside and I hereby ordain that he or she shall forfeit any or all of its provisions."

The conduct of these parties clearly shows that they accepted all of the benefits conferred by this will, which was probated September 9, 1889. Ashland C. George has continued in possession of the real estate devised ever since that time. He has never paid any part of the principal, but has paid the interest on the $4,000 legacy to his sister up to September 9, 1918, and until this suit was instituted in April, 1919, the legatee has not asserted the right to charge her legacy as a lien upon the real estate.

Under these circumstances it seems to us that the decree complained of is substantially right; that the testator intended that his son, Ashland C. George, should personally pay the $4,000 legacy seems to us uncontrovertible. His language is too plain to be misunderstood. Ashland C. George is by name directed to pay the amount, and when the testator disposes of the remainder, after the expiration of the life estate, there is no suggestion, in the language used and hereinbefore quoted, that the interest of the remaindermen is charged with any part thereof. At that time Ashland C. George was about 37 years old, and the will directed that the legacy should be wholly paid within 10 years, certainly a period well within his natural expectation of life according to the mortality tables. So that, in our view, the decree of the trial court which exonerated the remainder enforced the true intent of the testator.

Ashland C. George also appeals from the decree upon the ground that he is held personally liable for the legacy, insisting that the legacy should be adjudged to be a lien upon the corpus of the estate, and that the interest of the remaindermen should be charged with their just proportion thereof.

It appears from what we have previously said that we think the trial court rightly refused to sustain this contention. Ashland C. George took the life estate devised to him subject to the burden which the testator imposed upon him. He cannot now, and could not at any other time, have sustained his view. He was under no obligation to accept the life estate which was devised to him by his father, but when he accepted it he assumed therewith the obligation so clearly imposed by the will personally to pay the $4,000 legacy.

[3] It is perhaps immaterial in this case that the trial court failed to hold that the legacy constituted a charge against the life estate of Ashland C. George, because the record appears to indicate that Ashland C. George is financially able to pay the amount. The trial court, however, should have followed the precedents indicated by the cases of Jackson v. Updegraffe, 1 Rob. (40 Va.) 114, and Cockerille v. Dale, 33 Grat. (74 Va.) 45, and held that the life estate devised to Ashland C. George was an auxiliary security for this legacy, and charged therewith as the only property indicated by the testator for its payment.

The decree will therefore be amended so as to show that the life estate vested upon the death of the testator, and that the legacy is a lien thereon; and, as thus amended, it will be affirmed.

Amended and affirmed.

COMMONWEALTH v. KERNOCHAN.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
March 17, 1921.)

1. Taxation ¶93(1)—Intangible property of nonresident insane person may not be taxed.

The commonwealth cannot recover alleged omitted taxes on intangible property of an insane person where the domicile of such person was in another state.

2. Taxation ¶93(1)—Domicile, not residence, fixes situs of intangible personal property.

Domicile, as distinguished from residence, in the more ordinary and usual sense fixes the situs for the taxation of intangible personal property.

3. Taxation ¶320—Burden of proving change of domicile of owner of intangible property upon the party alleging it.

In a proceeding to tax the intangible personal property of an insane person, the burden of proving the change of domicile from another state to this is upon the plaintiff, commonwealth, alleging it.

4. Domicile ¶4(2)—Mental capacity requisite to change domicile.

Where an insane person's domicile was clearly in New York at the time of her commitment to a hospital in Virginia, her domicile remained in the former state, notwithstanding her presence in the other, unless changed by some competent or authorized person or tribunal, since she lacked the mental capacity to make such change.

5. Domicile ¶4(2)—That of insane person must be changed by committee or courts.

Any power to change the domicile of an insane person, which must be independent of such person's own will, must be found in her committee or the courts having jurisdiction of her person.

6. Domicile ¶5—Guardian who is not parent cannot change domicile.

A guardian or committee of an insane person other than one occupying the position of a parent has not power to change his ward's domicile from one state to another.

7. Taxation ¶93(1)—Whether intangible estate of nonresident insane person should be taxed depends on the rights of the forum state alone.

In a proceeding to tax the intangible property of an insane person domiciled in another state but residing in this, the question for decision is, not whether the other state has been wrongfully deprived of taxes upon the estate, but whether this state has a right to claim and collect the tax.

Error to Circuit Court of City of Williamsburg and County of James City.

Action by the Commonwealth of Virginia against J. Frederic Kernochan, committee of Marie Marshall, an insane person, for collection of taxes on intangible property. Judgment for defendant, and the Commonwealth brings error. Affirmed.
